PREFACE.

THAT the history of the past should be commemorated, and that of the present placed on record, form a dual duty to civilization. A consideration of the people and events connected with the settlement and progress of any political or geographical division of this country must be a work of deep interest to the writers as well as to those who made subject for history; even more, it must be an enduring memorial, formed to give pleasure and instruction to the people who will come after us, teaching them the value and beauty of industry, and inciting them to excel in the labors which brought such rewards to the people of Montana within a quarter century after the era of progress was introduced. In local history is found the power to accomplish all this. Steel may wear away, rust efface the inscription on iron, wood decay, and even the marble rock break to pieces, but the page of history, once printed, is carried down the river of time unchanging and unchangeable.

Many of Montana's pioneers are in the homes of the silent, and the number remaining who can give all the details of the earliest settlement is not large. Fortunately their recollections are now preserved. A few more years, and the whole unwritten history of the Territory should remain unwritten—lost forever. Another few years, and the brilliant story of progress would have to be based on fragmentary relations—disconnected, unsatisfactory, aggravating. Local history comes forward to rescue ten thousand facts and names from oblivion, and place them where the historian of the future may grasp the whole Union and give to each of its parts a complete sketch. Not only should the history of pioneer times be treated fully and impartially, but also the present. The whole fabric of society,—the home, school, church, governmental and benevolent organizations, and all these industries and associations which bind men's interests together,—should be traced from the humble beginnings of the Territory down to our own days, making a record complete and impartial for the future.

In presenting this volume to the people we feel that a great and valuable contribution to the history of the United States has been added to the record of its settlement and progress. The first part is devoted to the general history of the Territory, and may be said to embrace names and items connected with the Territory as a whole. This part of the work is based almost entirely on official reports, public records, written statements of travelers and pioneers (founded on daily journals of their travels and experiences) and oral statements of early settlers.

The second part is devoted to the histories of the counties. This portion of the work is based on records (some of which were exhumed, so to speak, while others were found in well-kept record-books) and reminiscences. Commercial, military and political enterprises are detailed, and thus each name and deed is entwined with the history of the county.

The important branch of history known as Personal History and Reminiscences has, in this volume, assumed a character which such a country as Montana alone could bestow upon it. Almost every sketch is replete with incident, and ten thousand facts, of rare value, render the pages devoted to it both interesting and instructive. In a word, what has been omitted altogether, or merely mentioned in history, finds a place in these chapters, in direct connection with the persons who took part in the drama of settlement and development.

On account of the many vicissitudes through which this work has passed, a brief history of the enterprise is due to its patrons. When the late D. J. Stewart, of Anamosa, Ia., issued his prospectus for a work on Montana, he promised, simply, a biographical album of about 600 pages. After the death of that gentleman in 1883 the Territorial Historical Company was formed, a new prospectus was issued, and to the biographies and illustrations promised by the late Mr. Stewart a history of the Territory was to be added, making altogether a book of from 800 to 1,000 pages. This work Mr. M. A. Leeson was asked to collate and compile. A number of parties were engaged in collecting personal history and reminiscences, as well as in soliciting orders for the proposed volume. In July, 1883, Mr. Leeson entered on historical research in the Territory, first collecting items relating to the general history, and next, facts and figures connected with the history of the counties, dealing largely in official reports, records, written and printed documents, etc. Returning to Chicago he continued research among books of travel, military and other reports, and made the first compilation of the history in that city. Meanwhile, the gentlemen engaged in the canvass continued at work in the Territory, so that by the spring of 1884 a great collection of personal history and reminiscences was in their possession. Some time in May, 1884, a prominent Chicago firm entered on the publication of the book; but owing to business embarrassments, they, after a few months, were compelled to relinquish the undertaking. The work then passed into the hands of the well-known book-manufacturing house of Donohue & Henneberry, Chicago, and by them the task of lithographing and printing was assumed and pushed rapidly forward. In the early part of 1885 the work was taken up by the present publishers and has been by them completed; the entire editorial management being in the hands of M. A. Leeson, as provided for in the Prospectus of 1883. Notwithstanding the various changes, this book has been issued in as short a time as is usual in works of its magnitude and character. The promises made by Mr. Stewart of 600 pages, and by the Territorial Historical Co. of 800 pages, have been entirely eclipsed, and a book of nearly 1,400 pages has been placed before the people.

This volume contains a greater and more varied history than was ever before embodied in a work on the territories; it was compiled with great care, and the personal sketches were collated and rewritten; but with all this attention complete accuracy cannot be claimed, nor will he who expects to find absolute perfection be satisfied, for the difficulties attendant on the publication of a work of this class, as well as the number and variety of names and incidents, leave many avenues open to mistakes, precluding the possibility of absolute perfection. We trust, however, that the book will be received in that generous spirit which applauds conscientious effort, rather than in that captious mood which is only satisfied with unattainable accuracy. To the gentlemen of the press and public officials of the Territory, who aided the general historian so cordially and the publishers so materially, we express our gratitude, and to all the people who made the publication of a book of this magnitude possible, a hope that the history of their Territory may prove itself authentic and be acceptable.

TOPOGRAPHY AND NATURAL HISTORY.

WITH the exception of the southern townships of Beaverhead, Madison and Gallatin counties, south of latitude 45 N., Montana lies north of that line, extending to the International Boundary known as latitude 49 N. Her eastern limit runs a point west of longitude 27 W. and her extreme western limit to a point west of longitude 39 degrees W., the west line following the Cœur d'Alene mountains until it strikes the main divide of the Rocky Mountains at longitude 37 W., following the Divide to the western line of the National Park, north on that line to latitude 45 N., and east on latitude 45 to a point west of longitude 27 W. The mean length is 540 miles; greatest width, 305 miles, claiming an area of 145,776 square miles. The total population in 1870, excepting Indians on the reservations, was 20,595, including 18,306 whites, 1,949 Chinese, 183 Africans and 157 Indian citizens. These figures were increased by 1880 to a total of 39,159, including 35,385 whites, 1,765 Chinese, 346 Africans and 1,663 Indian citizens. The total population to-day approximates 145,000, or one to every square mile of the Territory.

The Northern Boundary question is a subject which has claimed the attention of the American people since the day success waited on the arms of the soldiers of the Revolution. Franklin, while a member of the Boundary Commission, after the Revolutionary War, studied the descriptions of the northern country by Boucher of Paris (1640) and other works published by the Jesuit fathers from 1666 to 1667. Such descriptions led him to insist upon the line between Isle Royale in Lake Superior and the northern shore, thence by the chain of waters extending from the Great Lake to the Lake of the Woods, and thence due west. While such a line was understood, there was no definite mention of it until 1846, when a treaty was negotiated, fixing the line of latitude 49 degrees N. as the northern boundary of the United States. For almost a quarter of a century the limited knowledge of the Hudson's Bay Co's employes was satisfied with observing the treaty in its broadest sense, and this led to other complications in 1870. In April, 1870, the United States officers, engaged in locating Fort Pembina, discovered that the boundary line, as acknowledged by the ordinary travelers, was 4,700 feet south of the forty-ninth degree, and that the line, if run on the true boundary, would leave the Hudson's Bay Company's post within the United States territory. This fact was communicated to the British government, when a request was made by that government to permit the Hudson's Bay Company to occupy the post temporarily, until the true line would be fixed. In the President's message to Congress dated December 5, 1870, many reasons are given for determining this line, and accordingly a joint resolution was introduced and passed the House of Representatives, appropriating $100,000 for this work, but owing to delays, did not pass the Senate. During the session of 1871–2, an act appropriating $50,000 for the purpose of surveying the Northern Boundary, was passed, which received the executive approval, March 19, 1872, on condition that such survey should be done by United States engineers along the line from the Lake of the Woods to the Rocky Mountains. Under this act, Captains F. N. Farquhar, W. J. Twining, and Lieutenants James F. Gregory and F. V. Greene were commissioned to act as engineer officers. They arrived at Fort Pembina September 5, 1872. The British Commissioners, Captain D. R. Cameron and Captain S. Anderson, British Chief Astronomer, arrived at the fort on September 16 and 18 respectively. On October 19, the survey was begun at the N. W. point of the Lake of the Woods. The sum of $125,000 was appropriated to further the work by the Congress of 1872–3.

In 1873 Captain Farquhar was relieved from duty at his own request, and Major Twining appointed chief astronomer. Major Twining passed the winter of 1873–4 at Fort Buford, and entered upon the survey of the north line of Montana early in the latter year, completing the work August 20, 1874, at the monument on the summit of the Rocky Mountains, near Chief Mountain, erected under authority of the Treaty of 1846. The iron pillars marking the line were placed, and this work completed October 7, 1875.

From the beginning of work to August 16, 1874, the prospect of the British Commissioner agreeing with the U. S. Commissioner, that the northwesternmost point of the Lake of the Woods should be considered the beginning of the line, was doubted; but on this latter date Captain Cameron stated that his government had directed him to acknowledge that point, and he also agreed to adopt the astronomical rather than the mean parallel, as the boundary line. Within the following year the boundary question was settled.

Centers of Settlement.—The older cities and villages of Montana were located with a view to convenience as trading posts or markets rather than to beauty of situation. A gulch was sometimes selected for a town site, so that where the gold was found, there also could be purchased supplies, without subjecting the hard-worked miner to a walk into the valley. In later years, however, the location of town sites on a broad plain has proved the rule rather than the exception, so that now, as in the case of Glendive, villages are found within Montana only 2,070 feet above sea level, or only 1,470.8 feet above the present water line of Lake Superior. The altitudes of the many of the principal towns and villages of the Territory are set forth in the following table:—

Argenta	6,337	Carroll	2,247	Jefferson	4,776

Into these settlements the mountain streams are led through circuitous ditches, affording a good supply of the purest water. In the midst of summer, breezes from the mountains sweep over each town in cooling waves, and when the sun begins to set beyond the valleys, the inhabitants do not fear the approach of night; for within this mountain bound land the nights are cool, and the mosquito, so industrious in less favored regions, follows the sun to the Pacific.

The names given to the centers of settlement in Montana are:—Glendive, The East Gate City; Miles, The Ring City; Billings, The Magic City; Livingston, The Gem City; Bozeman, The Beautiful City; Helena, The Queen of the Mountains; Deer Lodge, The Pioneer City; Butte, The Silver City; Missoula, The West Butte City; Benton, The River City; Dillon, The South Gate City. The name of the territory indicates what it is in reality—Country of the Mountains, from the Indian—Tay-a-be-shock-up.

Rivers and Streams.—The rivers and streams of Montana, which contribute so much, in fact all, to the prosperity of the Territory, claim a first place in the natural economy of the entire West. Here the great Missouri and the vagrant Columbia have their sources, and from Montana rush forth in torrents to give drink to half a world.

The southwestern districts of the territory are watered by the Big Hole, Beaverhead, Madison, Jefferson, West Gallatin, East Gallatin, Ruby, Red Rock, and Boulder rivers; Horse Prairie, Black-tailed Deer, Fish, Silver Bow, Warm Spring, Crow, Prickly Pear, French, Middle, and Mill creeks, and the Nez Perces and Ross forks of the Bitter Root river, together with hundreds of mountain streams and spring creeks, to which names have not been given. Big Hole, or Wisdom river, has its source at the foot of the divide southwest of Bannack City, whence it flows northeast to French creek, where it forms the southwest boundary of the new county of Silver Bow, thence southeast along the southern boundary of that county to the line of the U. & N. railroad, where it forms the bend before flowing north to join its waters with the Beaverhead and Ruby, near Silver Star, south of Deer Lodge pass. The Beaverhead river may be said to have its source in Red Rock lake, with which it is connected by Red Rock creek, although its acknowledged head is located in the southeastern part of Beaverhead county, whence it flows in a general northerly course to its confluence with the Ruby, and thence to the head of the Jefferson. Into this river the once famous Grasshopper creek empties, while hundreds of other streams make it a receptacle for their waters. The Ruby river rises northeast of Red Rock lake, in Madison county, with tributaries from the gulches in the vicinity of Virginia City. The course of this stream is northwest, to its confluence with the Beaverhead, and south of Silver Star. The Jefferson river, formed by the waters of the Big Hole, Beaverhead, and Ruby rivers, assumes the name at Iron Rod, a few miles north of the junction of the Beaverhead and Ruby, and flows northeast, by the south line of Jefferson and the southeast line of Gallatin counties, to its confluence with the Madison and Gallatin rivers, near Gallatin City. There these rivers form the Missouri, which flows in a generally northern course, forming the boundary between Jefferson and Lewis and Clarke counties, on the west, and Meagher county, on the east, to a point near the entrance of the Sun river. Philosophy river, named by the explorers of 1805, flows into the Beaverhead.

The Madison river has its source in Madison lake, near Yellowstone lake, in the National park, with a fork running south toward Wyoming territory. From its headwaters to a point north of Red Rock lake it receives numerous streams, and onwards to its confluence with the Jefferson and Gallatin, at Gallatin City, its current is continually increased by mountain streams, such as Meadow creek, etc. The Gallatin river gives its name to one of the most favorably known counties in the new northwest. It is formed by the West and East forks, the latter rising in the Grosfoot hills, northeast of Bozeman, and the former in the northwest corner of the National park. Both forks pursue a northwesterly course to their confluence north of Hamilton, and thence to the Three forks of the Missouri, near Gallatin City. Mill creek and Middle creek are tributaries of the East Gallatin, both flowing into that stream near Bozeman. Mystic lake, near Fort Ellis, is an expansion of the Gallatin, while hundreds of other lakes and ponds swell the currents of these great water courses. The canon of the West Gallatin ranks with the most picturesque scenery in the world. At a point near the mouth of this canon, above Salesville, the canal of 1883 was begun. The Boulder river has its source northwest of Boulder City, whence it flows southeast to the Jefferson, uniting with it a point west of the longitude 35 W. Whitehall creek and an unnamed stream run parallel with the Boulder, southwest of its course, and unite with the Jefferson.

The rivers of the northwestern portion of Montana are numerous, and a few of them large. Tobacco creek, one of the Kootenai feeders, rises in the range between the waters of Maple and Clarke's Fork rivers. For a distance of twenty miles its course is through an open country. The Kootenai river flows through a country of rolling land, forming a valley from five to fifteen miles wide. Kootenai lake is an expansion of this river. How long the lake is to be in existence is to be determined by modern enterprise, which now has set itself the task of tunneling the mountain between the Kootenai and Columbia rivers, and by this means turn the waters of the lake into the Columbia. This project, if carried out, would give about 160,000 acres of rich bottom-land to the United States, and about 60,000 acres to Canada. Maple river is one of the tributaries of Flathead river, and runs through a heavily timbered country, its valley being little wider than the river channel. Jocko river runs through the most beautiful valley in the west. It takes its rise northeast of St. Ignatius mission, flows south to the Agency, and thence northwest to its junction with the Flathead river, which has its headwaters a point north of the 49th parallel, whence it flows through Flathead lake to its confluence with the Missoula and Clarke's fork, just east of Horse plains. This river below the lake is from 100 to 150 yards wide, and has a fall of about ten feet to the mile. Hot Spring creek, which has its source west of Flathead lake, falls into the Flathead river opposite the Pen d'Oreille mission. St. Mary's or the Bitter Root, which is formed by the Nez Perces and Ross forks, on the southern line of Missoula county, and the Lo Lo fork, running east from the Cœur d'Alene, flows into the Missoula a few miles northwest of Missoula City. The Big Blackfoot rises in the main range, just north of the 47th parallel, near the line of Lewis and Clarke and Deer Lodge counties, flows in a westerly course, and enters the Hellgate river east of the point where that river takes the name of Missoula. The Hellgate is a continuation of the Deer Lodge, the name pertaining to that portion of the river from Bearsmouth to a point west of the mouth of the Blackfoot. This flows through one of the most picturesque valleys on the continent. The Missoula is a continuation of the Deer Lodge and Hellgate river, beginning west of the Big Blackfoot and flowing in a northwesterly course to a point east of the headwaters of the St. Regis de Borgia, thence northeasterly to its confluence with the Flathead, both of which rivers form Clarke's fork of the Columbia, which flows northwest from the mouths of the Missoula and Flathead rivers, through Lake Pen d'Oreille, thence northwest for a thousand miles to its great bend, whence it pursues a southerly course, to join the Lewis fork of the Snake river. Stony creek is a rapid stream, 20 to 25 yards wide, flowing in a tortuous course northwest to Hellgate river, which it enters opposite the settlement called Pineland. Flint creek rises in the southern part of Deer Lodge county, flows in a northeasterly course, and enters the Deer Lodge river at New Chicago. Middle Fork, Weeping Child, Willow, Burnt Fork, Bogues, Three Mile, Six Mile, Shalkaho, Fish, Five Mile, Stillwater, Flathead, Glacier, Vermillion, Crow, Cedar, North Branch, and Martino creeks; Yahk, Bull, Thomsons, St. Regis de Borgia, Nez Perces, Ross, and Badger rivers, with Flathead lake, Blaine lake, and a few smaller bodies of water, complete the list of rivers, creeks and lakes in the northwestern portion of the Territory.

The rivers and streams east of the Big Belt Range, and of the Main Divide of the Rocky mountains above latitude 46 degrees 35 minutes 37 seconds, include the Missouri, Yellowstone, Sun, Milk, Muscleshell, Shield's, Smith's, Big Horn, Custer, Rosebud, Tongue, Poplar, Powder, Teton, Marais, Badger, Judith, Dearborn, Tullock's, and St. Mary's rivers; Cottonwood, Cut Bank, Birch, De Ponte, and Dry River flowing into the Marais river; Muddy and Gravel creeks flowing into the Teton; Sandy, West, East, Snake, People's, Woody Island, Dry Fork, Frenchman's, Beaver, Little Rocky, Antelope, Brazil, and Porcupine, together with a large number of smaller streams, into Milk river; Willow creek into Sun river; Ross, Wolf, Warm Spring, Lewis into Judith river; Big Elk, Lake, American, Fish, Elk, Folson, Big Coulee, Buffalo, Flatwillow, Stanley, Carroll, Northfork, Sweetwater, and Crooked creeks into the Muscleshell; Ten Mile and Prickly Pear, Washington, Bird, Little Muddy, Meagher, Curtis, Franklin, Benton, Walker, Key's, Eagle, Arrow, Choteau, Birch, Cow, Armels, Little Rocky Mt., Squaw, Fisk, Marquette, Sioux, Crabbs, Big Dry, Galpin, Fort Charles, Elk Prairie, Poplar, Big Muddy, and Chartreuse creeks flowing into the Missouri; Flat creek into the Dearborn river; Hell Roaring, Pelican, Verendrys, Emigrant, E. Mill, Skull, Hunter's, Boulder, Big Timber, Sweet Grass, Bridger, White Beaver, Kiser, Little Rosebud, Rosebud, Bandin's, Rocky and Clarke's forks, Canon, Razor, Pryor's or Nez Perces fork, Arrow, Pompey's Pillar, Buffalo, Great and Little Porcupine, Emmell's, Keogh, Sunday, Broad, Gun, Custer, Maynadier, O'Fallon's, Bad Route, Cabin, Tullock's Fork, Cedar, Glendive, Lingley, Deer, Deep, Newion, and Fox creeks into the Yellowstone. Forks of the Little Missouri, Powder, Tongue, Rosebud, Tullock's, Big Horn, and the headwaters of the Little Missouri traverse the territory south of latitude 46 degrees north, so that only limited areas of this immense country can be considered wanting in rivers or streams.

The Missouri assumes its name at the meeting of the three rivers, near Gallatin City, and there enters upon its tortuous course to the Mexican gulf, receiving, within this territory, the waters of the creeks named, together with many great rivers, such as the Yellowstone, Muscleshell, Milk, Sun, Marias, Big Horn, Tongue, and Powder, and also its headwaters, comprised in the Big Hole, Beaverhead, Red Rock, Ruby (Passamari), Madison, Gallatin and Boulder rivers. The highest points of this great watercourse are on the Yellowstone at the lake, 7,564 feet above sea level; the second at Red Rock lake, 6,500 feet; third at bridge, 5,695 feet; fourth, Big Hole river at the mouth of Camp creek, 5,499 feet; fifth, north fork of the Muscleshell, 5,063 feet, and sixth, on the Madison, opposite Virginia City, 5,026 feet. The Missouri river, from the estuary of Sun river to Portage creek, a distance of fifteen miles, forms one of the most sublime freaks of nature on the continent. In that fifteen miles the waters rush over fifteen rapids and thirteen falls, making a descent of about 400 feet. In the following table the length of each rapid in rods, descent in feet, and the altitude of each fall are given in numeral order from fall No. 1 to fall No. 15, respectively.

Descent in feet.	Length of Rapid.	Altitude of Falls in feet.	Descent in feet.	Length of Rapid.	Altitude of Falls in feet.	Descent in feet.	Length of Rapid.	Altitude of Falls in feet.

3	102	19	3	340	4	10	280

Fall No. 1 is known as the Cascade; No. 2 as the Black Eagle; No. 4 as the Rainbow; No. 5 as Crooked falls, and No. 8 as Great falls.

For 100 miles above the falls, to the point named, Stubbs' Ferry, the river is navigable. It courses through a land of giant nature, where scenery partakes of that majesty which can alone be found in the Rocky mountain region. Expansions of the river, islands and islets, towering banks of rock, mountains springing from the very waters to a great height; these, considered with the wild hunters to whom the valley once offered a home, rear up a thousand thoughts and teach ten thousand lessons.

The Yellowstone river has its source in Yellowstone lake within the National Park, whence it flows, in a tortuous course, round the western foot-hills of the Big Belt range to its confluence with Shield's river, near Livingston. From this point it pursues a generally northeasterly course to its confluence with the Missouri at Fort Buford, a point south of latitude 48 degrees N., and east of longitude 27 degrees west of Washington, D. C. Shield's river rises in the Crazy mountains, north of the south line of Meagher county, and flows southward to its junction with the Yellowstone, east of Livingstone. Clarke's fork of the Yellowstone has its source south of the south line of the Territory, whence it flows north by east and enters the river below the rapids west of Billings. Big Horn river flows north from Wyoming, and unites with the Yellowstone immediately west of the Tullock river, east of Terry's Landing. At Fort Custer it receives the waters of Custer river, and above old Fort C. F. Smith the waters of numerous small streams.

The Rosebud river runs north from a point near the northern line of Wyoming, and empties into the Yellowstone at Rosebud village. The name of this stream will be for ever identified with the history of Custer's campaign. Tongue river has its headwaters south of Montana, flows north through the Mauvaises Terres, and enters the Yellowstone near Miles City. Powder river rises in Wyoming, whence it runs north, in two forks, to Montana, forms the main stream about latitude 45 degrees 27 minutes N., receives the waters of Mizpah creek in the Mauvaises terres, and enters the Yellowstone near the Terry settlement of 1882. The Little Missouri flows through the southeast corner of the Territory. The main fork of this river takes its rise in Custer county, southwest of the mountain known as the Rock-with-a-hole-in-it. Milk river has its headwaters in the northern basin, east of the Main Divide in latitude 48 degrees 50 minutes N., longitude 36 degrees 55 minutes W. Flowing northeast through the Canadian territory round the Sweet Grass hills, it re-enters Montana in longitude 33 degrees 40 minutes W., flows southeast to Powers' Post, and thence in a general southeasterly course to the Missouri, which river it joins east of Fort Galpin. *Marais river has its south fork in the Main Divide, east of the south shore of Flathead lake. West of the Blackfeet agency, this fork receives a large number of streams, and there it loses the name Badger river to assume that of *Marais or Marsh river. Its general course is east by south to its confluence with the Teton river, and both flow due east to enter the Missouri north of the Horseshoe Bend, below Fort Benton. The Teton river has its source west of the old Blackfeet agency, southeast of the basin of the Milk and Marias rivers. Flowing easterly it unites with the Marias, and with that river enters the Missouri. The Sun river rises in the Main Divide, east of St. Ignatius Mission, and pursuing a tortuous course easterly enters the Missouri at the falls of that river. The elevation above sea level of the valley at this point is about 3,573 feet. Smith's or Deep river rises north of the Crazy mountain divide, south of White Sulphur Springs, whence it flows north by west to the Missouri, entering that river above the falls. The Judith river has its source in Ross Fork, just north of the main pass of the Judith mountains, flows in a general northerly course, and enters the Missouri at Camp Cook. The Muscleshell river rises near Copperopolis, in the valleys between the Crazy and Judith mountains, flows in a general easterly course to Coal creek, and thence northeast to its confluence with the Missouri, near Muscleshell settlement.

Mountains of Montana.—Like her rivers and valleys, Montana must also boast of her mountains. Within her bounds the old Rocky mountain system seems to have concentrated much of its wealth of ores and native metals; and further to have played many of those serious freaks of overgrown nature, which change the physical face of a country in an instant, and leave behind, as reminders, ten thousand evidences of its revolutionary doings. The width and elevation of important divides are shown in the following table, compiled from United States geological reports:—

	Width miles.	Elevation feet.
Between Atlantic and Pacific, near Junction station	5.89	6,430
" Black-tailed Deer Cr. and Stinking Water (Ruby) River	6.40	6,657
" Alder Creek and Ruby River	1.31	6,492
" Madison and Jefferson Rivers	2.97	6,857
" Madison and Gallatin	5.24	4,834
" Atlantic and Pacific Oceans near Bridger	2.58	7,255
" Horse Plain Creek and Red Rock River	2 77	7,405
" Yellowstone Lake and Madison River	—	7,911

The altitudes of various peaks within the boundaries of Montana and also of the principal passes are given in the subjoined table:—

Bridger's Peak	9,002	Pleasant Valley Pass	6,030
Bridger's Pass	6,147	Skiotah Peak	7,200
Cloud Cone	7,300	Sphinx	10,880
Cadotte's Pass	6,167	Three Buttes (highest)	6,700
Deer Lodge Pass	6,200	Wedge Mountain	10,342
Emigrant Peak	10,629	Ward's Peak	10,371
Electric Peak	10,992	Mt. Washburn	10,105
Engle Peak	7,500	Cœur d'Alene Mission	2,280
Flathead Pass	6,769	Cœur d'Alene Pass, summit of	5,089
Kishnehna Peak	8,574	Sohin's Pass (Mullan Road)	5,000
Lewis and Clarke's Pass	6,519	Mt. Sheridan	10,156
Liberty Peak	9,162	Sailor Mountain	10,046
Little Blackfoot Pass	6,250	Togwotee Pass	9,621
Mt. Blackmore	10,134	Mountain southwest of Pass	10,150
Mt. Delano	10,200	Summit of Main Chimney	11,853
Mt. Powell	10,500	Fremont's Peak (Wind river range)	13,570
McCloud's Peak	7,500	Camp Stambaugh	7,767
Mullan's Pass	5,980	Camp Brown	5,498
Madison Pass	6,911	Grand Teton Mountain	13,835
Mt. Cowan	10,351	Mt. Moran	12,800
Mt. Ellis	8,419	Deer Lodge Pass	6,200
Lewis and Clarke's	6,323	Flathead Pass	5,459
Old Baldy	9,711

Many of these peaks bear evidences of forest growths in the past; but owing to the process of lifting up, to which nature subjects them, they have been raised above the timber line, and instead of their former covering—pine, they are now crowned with snowy caps.

The Valleys of the Territory.—The valleys of Montana, which are now being cultivated, or are destined in the near future to hold an important place among the grain producing districts of the New Northwest, are Bear Lake, Bear River, Beaverhead, Big Hole, Black-tailed Deer, East Fork of Yellowstone, Firehole, Flathead, Gallatin, Horseplain, Madison, Round, Shield's, Ruby or Passamari, Trail Creek, Yellowstone, Hellgate, Missoula, Deer Lodge, Sun River, Missouri, Milk River, Bitter Root, Prickly Pear, Jefferson, Tongue River, Powder River, Rosebud, Big Horn, Muscleshell, Judith, Columbia, Boulder and Jocko. Numerous canons, through which mountain streams course down to the rivers, afford sites for many happy homes; while the advances made in the knowledge of agriculture and the various means of irrigation proposed or in operation, give promise that within our own time even, the foot-hills of the Territory will become subject to the agriculturist.

The altitudes of the valleys are best shown by a table, dealing with the heights of river-beds above the sea, prepared from reports by Professors Hayden, DeLacy, Gannett and other authorities. Such a table must be useful in many respects. In a measure it enables one to make a theoretical calculation of the weight of the atmosphere at certain points, and to deduce the direct influences of altitude on such points; therefore it is given as follows in feet:—

Flathead Lake	2,800	Big Horn river at Big Horn mountains	3,584
Red Rock Lake	6,500	Sun river, near Fort Shaw	3,930
Big Hole River at mouth of Camp creek	5,499	Sun river Forks	4,114
Bitter Root River near Missoula	3,318	North fork of Muscleshell	5,063
Jefferson River at mouth of Beaverhead	4,888	Yellowstone Lake at outlet	7,564
Madison, opposite Virginia City	5,026	Three forks of the Missouri	4,132

All these valleys are south of Lat. 49 N., and west of Long. 27 degrees; a few of them, unlike the valleys and plateaus of other districts, are closed against the northern chilling breeze, while all are open to the southwest trade winds or to the Japan current, and capable of being irrigated.

For the purposes of comparison, the following table of altitudes is given, to show that in this connection the valleys of the northern mountains are far below those of lower latitudes:—

South Pass City	7,857	Denver, Colo	5,300
Santa Fe, New Mexico	6,840	Albuquerque, New Mexico	5,032
Green River at R. R. crossing	6,140	Fort Laramie	4,519
Sweet Water river at Independence Rock	5,998	Salt Lake City	4,350

It is unnecessary to dwell on the advantages which the horticulturist and agriculturist claim for these points. The inhabitants of that strip of country from New Mexico to Utah speak of it as a garden. Why? It was on the route to the Pacific, was settled and reclaimed from the wilderness state before the name Montana was known, and now yields up the fruits of years of labor, perhaps in a lesser degree, than this new Territory may be able to yield when her valleys become the homes of an agricultural people.

The National Park.—In the history of explorations, it is stated that Colter and Potts, members of the Lewis and Clarke expedition, met an old trapper named Dixon, and both set out upon that hunting trip which resulted in the death of Potts and the fearful race for life and escape of Colter. Dixon related to Colter stories of Geyser Land; Colter repeated such stories at the Portuguese post on the Yellowstone, from which point they were carried south and east, yet did not receive a public notice until Fisher's book was published in 1812. Previous to 1810, the reports of Hennepin and La Hontan had attracted much attention; but as their descriptions of this wonderland were founded upon statements made by the Indians, the impression prevailed that they were no more worthy of credence than Gulliver's voyage to Lilliput. Thus was the country left unexplored—unknown to the white man until our own times. James Bridger and Robert Muldrum looked into the valley of the Upper Yellowstone, and in 1849, the former attempted to describe the magnificence of the scene to a Missouri journalist, but so much did the recital appear to the latter a western yarn, he absolutely refused to publish the old guide's fable, a mistake for which he apologized in 1879 in a letter addressed to James Bridger, Westport, Mo., the home of the guide's old age.

Ten years later (1859), the famous Rocky Mountain guide informed Captain Reynolds' exploratory party that a crow could not enter the mysterious valley without taking plenty of provisions with him. In the reports made to the War and Interior Departments by General Warren and Captain Reynolds (See Doc. 1, Sess. 40, Con. Doc. 77), reference is made to the country adjacent to the park. After a description of the Big Horn, Clark's Fork and Big Rosebud rivers, the report continues:

"Beyond this is the valley of the Upper Yellowstone, which is as yet a terra incognita. My expedition passed entirely around, but could not penetrate it. My intention was to enter it from the head of Wind river, but the basaltic ridge, previously spoken of, intercepted this route and prohibited the attempt. After this obstacle had thus forced us over on the western slope of the Rocky Mountains, an effort was made to recross and reach the district in question; but although it was June, the immense body of snow baffled all our exertions, and we were compelled to content ourselves with listening to marvelous tales of burning plains, immense lakes and boiling springs, without being able to verify these wonders. I know of but two white men who claim to have ever visited this part of the Yellowstone—James Bridger and Robert Muldrum. The narratives of both of these men are very remarkable, and Bridger, in one of his recitals, described an immense boiling spring that is a perfect counterpart of the Geysers of Iceland. As he is uneducated, and probably never heard of the existence of such natural marvels elsewhere, I have little doubt that he spoke of that which he had actually seen."

The first authentic information regarding the great natural wonders of the park was derived from a prospecting party under the leadership of Captain W. W. De Lacy, who visited the lower geyser basin in 1863. Captain De Lacy left Montana to prospect on the upper waters of the Snake. The prospecting did not prove successful, and part of the men returned to Montana, but others, following up the Snake and Lewis fork, discovered Shoshone and Lewis lakes and the Shoshone and lower geyser basin.

"In the latter part of the spring of 1866," says Topping, "George Huston, George Hubbard, Rube Libby, Ksusse,—Lewis and a Mexican, started from Virginia City and went up the Madison river to Fire Hole and up that to the geysers. They stayed in the upper basin for several days and were probably the first to see the great geysers, all previous exploring parties having gone up the Fire Hole no further than the lower basin."

Early in the summer of 1867, Lou Anderson (who it will be remembered was at the geysers with Kit Carson and Jim Bridger in 1850) with Hubble, Reese, Caldwell and another man, went up the river on the east side. They found gold in a crevice at the mouth of the first stream above Bear, and named it in consequence, Crevice gulch. Hubble went ahead the next day for a hunt, and upon his return he was asked what kind of a stream the next creek was. "It's a hell roarer," was his reply, and Hell Roaring is its name to this day.

In the summer of 1870, an expedition under the lead of General Washburne, was organized in Montana, to explore the upper part of the Yellowstone and Madison valleys, and report to the world whether or not the tales of hunters, trappers and prospectors were correct. While this party was on its journey, there appeared in the Pick and Plow, a weekly newspaper then published in Bozeman, Montana, the first account ever printed of these wonders. This party made extensive explorations on the Yellowstone and Madison rivers. Passing up the Yellowstone by the well-known trail they traveled completely around the lake. The following year, 1871, Captains Barlow and Heef, of the United States army, made a trip through the country, and presented the result of their observations in a brief report and map of their route. In the same year Prof. Hayden made an extended tour through the park, and the results of this work were published in the annual report for that year. This was sufficient to fix the attention of the public on the wonderful region, and when Prof. Hayden presented to Congress a proposition to reserve this section from settlement as a national park, it was adopted with little opposition. In 1872, Prof. Hayden* continued his explorations, and since then scarcely a year has passed without a government report by some of the various parties which have explored the region under semi-official sanction. Not the least interesting of these documents have been the reports published by General Sheridan, who has made the trip annually for four or five years past. During the summer of 1872, an excursion party from Bozeman visited the park. They were guided by Mr. Topping to the Upper Basin. Among the party was Mrs. Stone, and to her belongs the honor of being the first white woman who saw the park. Congress, by a unanimous vote of both houses, by an act approved March 1, 1872, "withdrew from sale and occupancy,

*With him was Moran, the celebrated painter, who made a picture of the Yellowstone Falls and Cañon, for which Congress paid $10,000. The coloring was severely criticized by untraveled critics, one of whom, Bierstadt, visited the park in 1881, declared Moran's work as perfect as man could render it, and apologized to the great artist for former criticism. Muhlenberg, N. P. R. R. engineer, ran his lines to Pryor creek, and Captain Jones, of the Engineer Corps, to the park about this time.

and set apart as a National Park, or perpetual public pleasure-ground, for the use and enjoyment of the people," the area before-mentioned, with boundaries designed to include the chief wonders of the region, and described as follows, to wit: "Commencing at the junction of Gardiner's river with the Yellowstone river, and running east to the meridian, passing ten miles to the eastward of the most eastern point of Yellowstone Lake; thence south along said meridian to the parallel of latitude passing ten miles south of the most southerly point of Yellowstone Lake; thence west along said parallel to the meridian passing fifteen miles west of the most western point of Madison Lake; thence north along said meridian to the latitude of the junction of the Yellowstone and Gardiner's rivers; thence east to the place of beginning."

According to statements made by James Gourley, W. D. Cameron and John Lansing, who visited the Geyser region in 1878, there are souvenirs of visitors to the Park of whom no account is extant. Fifty men are supposed to have encamped on the north fork of Stinking Water river in Wyoming long years ago. Evidences of their stay are provided in the number of stumps around the corral which they erected. These stumps are from 10 to 12 inches in diameter, and are now decaying.

In July, 1872, Prof. Hayden made his second trip to the Park. He was accompanied by N. P. Langford, who the next winter was appointed Superintendent of the National Park, and a foreign gentleman, whose wife died in the neighborhood and was buried at Bozeman. Another branch of Hayden's survey party entered the Park via Snake river the same year,—all returning via the Fire Hole and Madison river valleys to Virginia City. Dwight Woodruff and E. S. Topping visited the Park the same year, and discovered the Norris basin on the Gibbon fork of the Fire Hole river.

The Geysers—these magnificent evidences of the powers of nature, which still stay with us, to entertain and instruct—come up, as it were, from the bowels of the earth, and like stage artists, remain a few minutes to plunge us in astonishment. French, Italian and German philosophers have inquired into the direct causes of these springs, and from such inquiries, aided by their own scientific knowledge, deduce the following explanation:— "Suppose that by the entrance of steam from the ducts near the bottom of the tube, the geyser column is elevated six feet, a height quite within the limits of actual observation; the water at A is thereby transferred to B. Its boiling point at A is 255 degrees, and its actual temperature is 251 degrees; but at B its boiling point is only 249 degrees, hence, when transferred from A to B, the heat which it possesses is in excess of that necessary to make it boil. This excess of heat is instantly applied to the generation of steam; the column is lifted higher, and the water below is thus relieved of pressure and its boiling point lowered. More steam is generated; this lifts the column still higher, and compels the generation of more and more steam, until the whole upper portion of the column bursts into ebullition, and the water, mixed with steam-clouds, is projected into the atmosphere, and we have the geyser eruption in all its grandeur."

On the west side of the valley of the Stinking Water, south of Virginia City, a short distance above the canon, is the Limestone Maker spring, called so on account of the great limestone beds, 70 to 110 feet in thickness, which its water has deposited. This deposit shows in its first stages a solid white limestone, while in its more modern parts it is exteriorly soft if not spongy.

The Yellowstone Park contains 2,301 square miles, or 1,472,000 acres, or 116,000 acres more than the State of Delaware, and nearly twice as many acres as the State of Rhode Island. In size it exceeds all the national parks of the world combined. If it were all arable land, susceptible of settlement and successful cultivation, it would afford homes of 100 acres each for 14,721 families. This large tract, while referred to by the French explorers, was unknown to them, save from accounts given by the aborigines. It is an area of wonders unparalleled in the whole natural history of the world. This region is from 5,000 to 10,000 feet above sea level, and therefore within the zone of two seasons. The elevations are marked as follows:—

	FEET.		FEET.		FEET.
Beula Lake	7,525	Upper Geyser Basin	7,390	Mammoth Hot Springs of Gardiner's river	7,085
Lewis Lake	7,828	Lower Geyser Basin	7,360	Head of Grand Cañon	8,162

Shoshone Geyser Basin	7,880	Yellowstone Falls	7,700

	FEET.		FEET.		FEET.
Second Cañon of the Madison.	6,570	Crater Hill Springs	7,979	Top of Lower Falls of the Yellowstone	7,485
Mount Blackmore	10,134	Mouth of Tower Creek	6,207
Mount Washburne	10,388	Devil's Slide	5,160	Divide between the Yellowstone and Madison	8,164
Red Rock Pass	7,271	Madison Lake	8,301
Henry's Lake	6,443	Mouth of Gardiner's River	5,360

Here, high up in the mountains, are the greatest geysers of the world, a large lake and a number of ponds, the sources of the Yellowstone, Gallatin, Lewis fork of the Columbia, and other streams, all fed from that hidden reservoir, which finds an outlet in such a high altitude.

Near the stalactite caves in the National Park, there is a poisonous gas tube very properly named Stygian cave, where birds drop dead in merely flying over its mouth. It is most beautiful to the eye. The crystalline pendants are of a deep emerald. But the sulphurous gases are inimical to life. Small animals taking shelter therein perish immediately. One of Dr. Gates' party went down into it in June, 1883, and without any very painful sensation became faint with a rushing as of water in his ears, indicating the first stages of asphyxia.

The eight great geysers of the world find also a place in this mysterious land, viz: Giant.—Diameter, 7 feet; height, 140 feet; lasts three hours. Giantess.—Diameter, 18 feet; height of small jet, 250 feet; lasts 20 minutes. Beehive.—Diameter, 2 feet; height, 219 feet; lasts 20 minutes. Grand Geyser.—Diameter, 20 by 25 feet; height, 250 feet; lasts 20 minutes. Old Faithful.—Diameter, 6 feet; height, 200 feet; lasts 20 minutes. Grotto.—Diameter, 4 feet; height, 60 feet; lasts 30 minutes. Castle.—Diameter, 5 feet; height, 50 feet. Fan.—Height, 60 feet; lasts 10 to 30 minutes.

Together with these outpourings of the inner world, there are many less pretentious mud and water volcanoes, geysers and springs, scattered throughout the territory, each bearing a part in that grand spectacle which has been reserved for the present; and all having their origin in the same causes which take the form of the volcano or the earthquake in less favored portions of the globe.

On the 10th of March, according to the authority given by Congress, the Secretary of the Interior leased to the Y. N. P. I. company ten acres at an annual rent of two dollars per acre, for a period of ten years. It is provided that none of the spots selected shall be within a quarter of a mile of any geysers or falls. At the expiration of the lease, or termination by failure to comply with its provisions, the government is to purchase all improvements at an appraised value. The company shrewdly selected small tracts in the immediate neighborhood of the principal springs, and in December, 1882, entered on the work of improvement. The Yellowstone National Park Improvement Company was organized in 1882 under the laws of New Jersey, with a capital of $2,000,000. Its incorporators include Rufus Hatch, Roscoe Conkling, Gen. James A. Williams, of Boston; R. T. Merrick, of Washington; Fred. Church, the distinguished painter; J. H. Houston, president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; Aaron Vanderpool, Judge John R. Brady, Samuel Watterton, of Chicago; C. M. Loring, of Minneapolis, and other well-known men in various parts of the country. The officers are: Rufus Hatch, president; C. T. Hobart and M. Church, vice-presidents; C. E. Quincy, treasurer. At the Chicago meeting in the fall of 1882 a number of directors were elected. The executive committee then appointed comprised Aaron J. Vanderpool, John B. Gilfillan, Henry F. Douglas, Gen. James A. Williamson, Charles E. Quincy, P. H. Kelly, John Clay, jr., John B. Lyon, James S. Huntington. Mr. Hobart, of Fargo, has been elected vice-president. General Sheridan opposed the lease, while Governor Crosby pointed out that the object of Mr. Hatch was to get a monopoly of the accommodations for tourists, out of which he would make a good revenue, and at the same time convert the remainder of the park into vast cattle ranges, on which other stockmen could not trespass.

The dimensions of the Grand hotel in the National Park are 420 feet long by 60 feet wide, with a wing on each end 360x60 feet. A hall twenty feet wide, the whole length of the building, is the same for all the stories. There are 520 rooms, among which are 250 reception and club rooms and parlors for ladies.

Geology.—Owing to the regularity of nature, men seldom entertain the idea that the earth is subjected daily to changes, by magnificent disturbances of this very nature, which they consider so conservative—so seldom subject to interruption or change. The Rocky Mountain region fosters new thoughts in this connection, and presents, as it were, an open book, where the history of nature's wars is written in ten thousand grotesque characters, and where the speculative philosopher may study to the end of time to unravel the mystery which surrounds this giant confusion of mountain and hill and valley. In tracing the geological history of the country, it will be only necessary to revert to the era when the accumulated sediments of the ocean were being formed into masses of rock. Geology teaches that the continents of the world were once beneath the ocean, even as Scripture implies that a sea of mud, resembling in substance a South African river, was arranged by an Almighty hand, and the liquid separated from the solids contained therein. The inequalities in the ocean bed, corresponding with the hills and valleys of our land, point out the comparative truth of geological science. The recent deep sea soundings reveal mountains and hills, valleys and tablelands. The greatest depth reached was over 29,000 feet, which exceeds the height of the loftiest peak of the Himalayas. Some of the mountains springing from the bed of the ocean are steeper and more abrupt than any on the face of the earth. In the Irish Sea and the British Channel the depth changes, within a radius of ten miles, from 600 to 12,000 feet, and it is very common, within a few miles of our coasts and islands, for the depth of the waters to change suddenly from a few hundred to many thousand feet. In other cases, as in the bed of the Atlantic between Spain and the United States, there are plateaux extending hundreds of miles, with very slight undulations, so that the mysterious race that once occupied this continent may have sailed in galleons over the Territory, and sounded the depth of waters above its great mountains in precisely the same manner as the mariners of our own day cast the sounding line into the great lakes and oceans. It may be concluded that the Territory, like all the rest of the continent, was totally submerged at the beginning of the corniferous period. At the close of that epoch a great upheaval of sea-bottom formed a line of solid earth across the continent, spread out gradually, and formed many of the great plateaux about the beginning of the coal-deposit era. The geological age—the Mesozoic—dates from this time. It was marked by activity in the animal and vegetable kingdoms; by mild climates and myriads of reptiles, which swarmed in rivers and over land. The Tertiary period succeeded the Mesozoic. It was the age of beautiful climates and high development of mammals. Animals greater than the mastodon roamed over the land, through magnificent forests, meeting their enemy—man—and ultimately falling beneath his repeated attacks. The glaciers came to destroy all this gigantic beauty, the snow and ice came on, burying all nature in their whiteness, and robbing the land itself of life. It was the beginning of the Glacial period, the duration of which is lost in mystery. Springtime came, and under the influence of its season, the sea of ice which covered land and water, began to break up—to dissolve, when the solids held within its grasp fell down and formed a bed of rocky fragments or boulder drift. This rocky conformation must not be confounded with the partial drift of after years, evidences of which are given in many sections of the country.

Prof. Hayden maintains that during the latter portion of the Tertiary age, the entire northwest seems to have been a freshwater lake, with vast numbers of mountain elevations occupying a greater or less area, not unlike some of our inland lakes at the present time, with the more elevated points and mountain ranges rising above the surrounding waters. These modern deposits have been elevated also to a certain extent, as there is in many instances an inclination of the strata from 1 degree to 5 degrees. These cover the porphyries which were effused at a period far back in the past, subsequent to the deposition of the modern basalt, capping rocks and Tertiary rocks. The forces which operated to lift the gneissose rocks must have acted long prior to those great elevatory movements which affected the sedimentary strata, and although the porphyries seem to have flowed out over the gneiss since the strata have been elevated to their present position, it is not possible to give the precise geological period when those events occurred. Usually either Silurian sandstone or Carboniferous limestone rests upon the metamorphic rocks. In a few instances the inclination of the Paleozoic beds above conform with the granite rocks below in such a way that the dynamic movements, which affected both groups, were synchronous.

The greater portions of the surface of the high divides are covered with basaltic rocks. They cap the hills, forming a sort of plateau or bench, and along the sides of the gulches show steep sides, 100 feet or more in height, with the appearance of stratified layers in a horizontal position. The effusion of the basalt is a modern event, occurring for the most part near the beginning of our present period, after the entire surface reached nearly its present elevation. Hence, we find points of effusion in numerous localities. The igneous lavas flowed out in layers, and inasmuch as a considerable amount of erosion of the surface has taken place since, the sides of these basaltic accumulations have been worn down, so as to show with clearness the edges of the different sheets of basalt as it cooled. The Gneissose formation, consisting of alternate beds of true gneiss, white quartz, quartzites, mica schist, is well developed throughout the country drained by Black-Tailed Deer creek. The effusions of basalt conceal large areas of metamorphic rock, the sides of which, however, are visible, showing a separation from the Pliocene conformations. The feldspathic quartzite area, west of Wild Cat cañon, has been proof against the erosions of time, and so forms to-day one of the most sublime views and studies ever presented to the traveler. The variegated porphyries of the pyramid region near Black-Tailed Deer valley, have been poured out through the original gorge over the metamorphic rocks, below the marks of the local drift on the high mountain sides.

In Dr. Hayden's report of January, 1872, he states, there is a somewhat peculiar feature about all the ridges east of the Rocky Mountain divide, in Beaverhead county, and that is the evidence from their external appearance, of comparatively recent elevation. The outcropping edges of the strata appear as if they had been lifted up, without any of the usual proofs of wearing away by atmospheric influences, and the debris on the sides and about the base would indicate that the elevation had been prolonged up to the present period. On the summit of these ridges are great quantities of dead pine trees, scattered around without any trace of younger trees or shrubs to take their places." The change which has contributed to this wholesale decadence of the hardy mountain pine leads him to agree with others that the altitude now exceeds the point of pine growth, and consequently, that the great limestone ridges have been lifted up into an atmosphere where even this hardy ornament of the mountain ceases to live.

The country along the Stinking Water and Sweet Water creeks presents in many places a porphyric formation of great height, and as unique in abruptness as such rocks are, and showing beyond all doubt, that the effusion of the porphyries over the gneiss strata filled up all interstices in the slanting, broken surface of the quartzite rock, in just the same manner as a mass of molten lead would fill in and bind the inequalities and atoms of such a conformation. West of the Jefferson, the foothills show a great thickness, 600 to 800 feet. The silicified wood that is found occasionally in these deposits, is more beautiful than any I have ever seen from any other formation. It is pure silica, and must have been aided in its silification by proximity to hot springs. Portions of it look like opal or fine chalcedony, and in some portions the rings of growth are well shown. As cabinet specimens they are especially sought for, and must always be rare. The high mountains west and north of the Mystic Lake gorge rise in cones to an elevation above the valleys, of from 1,200 to 1,500 feet. The hearts of these cones are supposed to be compact basalt, with a deep exterior of volcanic matter. High up on the sides of these peaks are sundry evidences of volcanic eruptions, some ancient and some modern, while in the valleys the shattered rock tell the history of the atmospheric ravages and the changes to which time has subjected these great Belt Mountains. (Hayden, 1871.)

The valley of the Gallatin varies little in its origin from that of other valleys throughout the Territory. The sheet of waters under which it rested for centuries has left its marks, and these marks are to-day visible in the pliocene hills around Fort Ellis, Bozeman, Gallatin, and other settlements. Upon the eminences are many evidences of the drift, while modern deposits are scattered all along the foot-hills, and sometimes are found high up on the sides of the Belt mountains. In the geological report of 1872, it is stated that in the Flathead Pass, Bridger and Bozeman Passes, the limestones are remarkably well shown, in some instances inclining 80 degrees, with the upper edges of the strata a line of rugged columns. The more yielding beds have been removed from the limestones, leaving them on either side of the canon like walls, while atmospheric agencies have worn out the upturned edges into the most picturesque jagged forms. The canon, two miles above Fort Ellis, carved out by Mill creek, forms an interesting study. On the west side of the canon the modern beds are seldom visible, giving place to the metamorphic series, or rocks of the carboniferous age. High up in Bridger and Bozeman Passess may be seen 1,200 to 1,500 feet of strata belonging to the coal series. Near the head of Spring canon, three miles east of Fort Ellis, a coal bed was worked previous to 1871, and an opening made to a depth of 180 feet. This mineral is known to underlie about 30,000 square miles of the Territory, and is destined to take a leading place among her great industries.

The origin of the placer gold is undoubtedly due to the erosion of the rocks in which it was originally precipitated; and inasmuch as the gold is found altogether in the gneissose strata, its existence in the various gulches among the sand and gravel, is due to the grinding up by water of the surface of the metamorphic rocks in the vicinity. Instances have been given where very rich placer diggings have been found in gulches, but the rocks which appear to have given origin to the float gold yielded no rich lodes. This may be accounted for on the ground that the upper portion of the lodes contained all the rich ore, and that in the process of erosion this ore was all ground up; while the remainder that is left is lean or contains no gold at all. * * * Around Virginia City there is a thick series of stratified granitoid rocks at the base, in which the precious metals were originally located; upon them rest the quartzites and limestones of the carboniferous age, and filling up some of the inequalities of the surface are the modern tertiary beds, and covering all over restricted areas, are beds of basalt. T. H. Kleinschmidt, assistant cashier of the First National Bank of Helena, has a very rare cabinet of some fifty different specimens of gold crystals, for which he was awarded a diploma and letter by the Centennial Exposition in 1876. They were collected during twelve years of observation and dealing in gold. These crystals would show growth, on the theory above mentioned, viz: gold in solution, and were all obtained from placer gold. Still, crystallized placer gold is only found in a few gulches in the Territory. Gold in quartz does not in its original form show crystallization, but when melted into a mass and then broken, its crystallization is wondrously beautiful. Placer gold is always found in "free" or pure form from mere dust to pieces or nuggets, varying in value from $3,200 down to a single dollar, and varying in fineness from 600 to 990—1,000 being standard purity. In the First National Bank of Helena is a single gold nugget, found near that city in June, 1879, that weighed 47 70-100 ounces, containing a value of $943.64 in gold, and $2.16 of silver. In 1878, a nugget was found within six miles of Helena, valued at $1,145.80. They have been found in Montana of as high a value as $3,200. All gold, in its original metallic form, carries silver from a simple trace to fifty per cent. It is rarely that silver carries gold even to a trace. The greatest amount found was fifteen parts in one thousand.

Silver ores are found in quantities which seem inexhaustible. Owing to the attention given to gold mining and the want of proper machinery, silver mining was comparatively ignored until within the last few years. The rich silver mines of Butte, Phillipsburg, Glendale and Wickes districts are now being worked; while the known richness of other silver deposits will lead shortly to their development.

Prof. W. P. Blake, writing in 1882 on mines and minerals, says: "I obtained from Dr. Hill much important information respecting the distribution of tin ore. It is found at many places along a belt of country some two miles wide, and having a general northeast and southwest course, or east a little north. It crosses the Missouri a little above Benton, extending toward Salmon City on the Snake. It is found at French Bar, sixteen or eighteen miles from Helena; at the head of Ten-Mile, in the 'Basin,' and on the Blackfoot. So far it has been found in more abundance in Basin gulch. It is believed that all the streams crossing the belt of country indicated, carry tin ore. Dr. Hill states that he reduced some of the tin ore and ran out a bar of the metal about six inches long and two inches wide and sent it to the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia in 1876.

P. W. Norris, Superintendent of the Yellowstone National Park, in his lecture on the natural curiosities of the region, described, as among the most notable, a mountain and a road of glass. This mountain, which is of pure obsidian or volcanic glass, is near the foot of Beaver Lake, and rises in columns and countless huge masses, many hundreds of feet high, from a hissing hot spring. The steep, smooth surface was, of course, a barrier to the progress of the explorers, not even an Indian or game track being discoverable over it. Great fires were built on the glass, to thoroughly heat and expand it, after which cold lake water was dashed on it, causing the glass to cool, and large fragments to break off from the surface. These were broken into small pieces with sledges and picks, and thus was constructed the only glass wagon road on the continent. The glass is very hard, and is used by the Indians for making unequaled arrow-heads, weapons and tools. The eastern palisade of the Grand Canon of the Gibbon river, for about two miles, also consists of vertical pillars, hundreds of feet high, of this glistening black, yellow, mottled or banded volcanic glass.

In a letter dated Missoula, July 15, 1883, Dr. Emil Henke speaks of the iron resources of the neighboring country: "Hæmatite (hydrated oxyde of iron) is found in banks of such thickness that it needs but quarrying, whilst coal of good quality and limestone are deposed above and below, with strata of good white fire clay dividing the different mineral zones. This formation occurs in a large park, many miles in extent, overgrown by an immense forest which decks also the mountains that hem this park on all sides. A hard but easily-worked white sandstone crops out here and there along the low hills around the park, with strata of coal immediately above. The writer, who spent but a few days in this vicinity seventeen years ago, had then neither the opportunity nor the inclination to investigate the minerals in situ, but the vast quantity and fine quality impressed it upon his mind that there, in the dim future, would be located the first Montana iron-plant. But a few miles from this spot, and divided by a low divide, he found himself upon the brink of an abrupt ravine, nearly 200 feet deep, the sides of which disclosed a horizontally stratified slate deposit, extending to the very bottom, which proved to be a remarkably fine roofing-slate, which nowhere can be excelled in quality, with the strata deposed like the leaves of a book, and from one-sixteenth to four inches in thickness, of velvety dark-gray color, and so great a purity that, aside from the abrasion by water, the elements had no power over it despite the many ages it lay there exposed. How valuable this spot would be away down East! The accessibility of this remarkable slate quarry, and the great facility of working the mineral in shape (a never-failing water-power being at the bottom of it) should soon enable Montanians to use the best roofing material instead of the dangerous shingles. The limestone is highly fossiliferous in places, and where exposed, stood the disintegrating influence of the ages remarkably well; it would make a fine building stone, and, polished, would be of great beauty. He picked up in one place a large-sized piece of white marble of Carrara quality, but did follow this prospect to its source."

In 1865 Prof. H. A. Ward, of Rochester, discovered three beaver dams in a petrified state upon a creek which runs through Port Neuf Cañon into the Snake river. The dams are from 50 to 60 feet long, with a flow of from one to four feet of water over them. Lewis H. Morgan, in his description of these dams, states that these beaver works were not in a complete state of petrifaction, but so well encrusted and bound together by a lime formation that they are durable.

An extinct volcano was discovered in the vicinity of the Springs of Meagher county in June, 1883. It has long been well known to the residents here that there existed a belt of lava bed country on the head waters of the North Fork of Smith river, but most of them supposed that, like many other lava bed countries, the source of its origin was a mystery. George Grayson, who was hunting in that section, discovered an actual crater. This is a very ordinary looking mountain from a distance, but when reached bears unmistakable evidence of having once been a scene of a living stream of burning lava. At one place it has swept down the mountain side into the gulch, forming a basin, which is now a lake.

From the earliest settlement of the country to the present time the glacier and its action have manifested themselves to explorers. Rev. Father Giorda, S. J., described the glaciers as he saw them in early days from the head of Mission creek. The explorers Milney, Roberts, and Canby, when making the first surveys for the N. P. R. R., were informed at St. Ignatius Mission of the existence of these remnants of the ice-age, beginning above Elizabeth Falls and continuing to the greater glacier as seen by the members of the Northern Trans-Continental Survey Party in August, 1883. An account of this glacier and its vicinity was obtained from Prof. Canby August 16, 1883, which is given as follows: "On the 1st of August the party, after having left the upper Flathead river (about 80 miles above the lake), entered the gorge that leads up the mountain to the Pass. This is walled in by steep mountains which are crowned by rugged precipices thousands of feet in height, sometimes terminating in knife-like edges, and sometimes running up into sharp rugged cones, which make the skylines of the mountains most varied and picturesque. At the summit of the Marais Pass three main amphitheatres come together. They are nearly horseshoe in shape. From the Pass there are in full view ten or twelve high peaks, often running up into regular sharp rocky cones. Some ten or fifteen miles away, looking to the westward, a great mass of snow-covered mountains were in view, and below these summits was seen a true glacier, having a frontage of at least a mile, and in some places a face estimated at 500 feet in height. From underneath this glacier flows a stream of milky-colored glacier water. Prof. Pumpelly with the Indian guide penetrated the amphitheatre in which this glacier lies, and counted twenty-two cascades over 500 feet in height, besides seeing many smaller ones. The sides of the mountains which surround this amphitheatre are covered with deep bodies of snow which are the sources of the many streams flowing into the valleys below. There was but little snow on the pass, and with care it was not difficult to cross. In descending the eastern side of the mountains the gorge presents some remarkably lofty and stupendous precipices. Those gentlemen of the party who had visited the Yosemite valley, considered the scenery of Marais Pass to be of a more varied character and grander in every respect. The summit of the Pass was found to be 7,800 feet above the sea level."

The geological notes on Northern and Central Montana from the pen of O. C. Mortson (written in 1875, and published in Contributions, Vol. 1, 1876, of the Historical Society of Montana) are complete in their delineations of geological conformations, and point out unmistakably the minute attention which he bestowed upon this wonderful land from 1867 to the period when his paper was concluded, in April, 1875. Mr. Mortson casts aside the great geological divisions, and assumes seven periods, viz.: the Igneous, Metamorphic, Jurassic, Wealden, Cretaceous, Tertiary, and Post-Tertiary. Professor Hayden, who has been connected with the geological exploration of the Territory from the establishment of the Geological Survey to the present time, De Lacey, Powell, and others, have been more conservative in their division of geological epochs. The elaborate reports of Hayden and Powell, bearing on the conformations of the Territory, leave little or nothing unsaid, which their science reveals in the Rocky mountain region. Many others, citizens and travelers, have written on some special geological feature of this region.

The list of minerals and rocks, known in the economy of geology, produced by Montana, comprises almost every known class, and forms in itself, with a few additions, one of the best testimonials to the natural riches of the Territory. The list is given in the report of the geological surveyor (Hayden, 1872), and only comprises the leading minerals and rocks discovered during the exploration of 1871–2. Since that time almost the entire Territory has been explored, and the minerals specified as belonging to certain localities are found to exist in every county of Montana. This statement is borne out by the report of the U. S. Assayer at Helena for 1879, particularly in his references to the growth of quartz mining in gold and silver, and the opening of new and rich districts. The papers by O. C. Mortson and Emil Henke also point out the extent and character of mineral deposits in the region of the Little Belt and west of the Main range.

The United States Geological Survey of the Territories was organized in 1867 under authority of Congress, when Dr. F. V. Hayden was commissioned Chief Geologist. In 1871 the survey of the Yellowstone and portions of Montana was prepared, and a report, describing the geysers and other remarkable wonders of that region, was published by Congress. So great an interest did this report excite in the minds of the people and in Congress that this latter body was induced to set apart a district about the sources of the Missouri and Yellowstone rivers, comprising 3,575 square miles, as a national park, for the purpose of protecting these national wonders for the perpetual enjoyment of the people. This report contains 540 pages, octavo, of printed matter, four maps and two plates of objects of natural history, with about seventy wood-cut illustrations. Within five months from the time of the issue of the report by the public printer, the principal part of it was translated into German by the celebrated geographer, Dr. Augustus Peterman, of Gotha, and the maps and illustrations re-engraved. Extracts from the report were printed in every language of Europe, so that our great national park is now known to every civilized nation in the world. In the summer of 1872 the survey was again extended into that country. The seasons of 1873 and 1874 were passed in Colorado; again in the North, and so on until now the geologist con-

Archæology.—The territory is rich in its archæological treasures. Arrow heads, hammers, vases and stone pots have also been found in the villages of the Indians, and so closely do they resemble similar works ascribed to the progenitors of the Indian race, it is often found difficult to decide their original ownership. In September, 1867, a curious relic of antiquity was found about eighty feet below the surface, in Cement Gulch, about four miles from Diamond City, by Mr. Fuller while mining. The curiosity was most probably an instrument of warfare, or for hunting or fishing. It is about eight inches in length, tapering at both ends, and flattened in the center, with notches, probably for attaching to a pole with sinews. Its material is pure malleable copper, mostly covered with a coat of verdigris. Though exhibiting no great amount of artistic skill, not beyond the capacities of our Indians, yet it may be a relic of a more ancient race, many traces of which have come to light all over this continent. This valuable reminder of the past was presented to Cornelius Hedges, in trust for the Montana Historical Society, and may be considered the beginning of the collection of antiquities now in possession of that Society. The tracks in clay and sandstone found in excavating, afford the truest evidence of early occupation.

Remains of the Elephas primigenius were found in the gravel, 25 feet below the surface of Alder gulch. The remains included the elephant's tusk, ribs, teeth, and fragments of bones. These relics are now in the Smithsonian Institute. Fossil remains of a similar character were found in Last Chance gulch at Helena, and in other gulches throughout the Territory. In the neighborhood of Bozeman and throughout the Bitter Root, Yellowstone, Muscleshell and Missouri valleys, very many evidences of animals of the Mesozoic epoch have been brought to light.

Botany.—Flowers, shrubs and trees are nature's decorations. A lake, however beautiful the situation, is a dreary waste of waters, unless the groves or the forest are there to lend it beauty. A river with banks unclothed in these natural ornaments is not pleasing to the eye; the treeless prairie, however sublime in its extent and sealike level, is monotonous; the great ocean, which never showed a trail, can alone afford to be without a tree.

A list of trees and shrubs of Montana might be continued indefinitely. Her shrubberies and forests present to the botanist thousands of varieties, while to him as well as to the herbalist the mysterious fattening bunch grass, grasses, lichens and flowers offer an exhaustless subject for study.

The flora of the Territory comprise about 107 orders, represented by over 300 genera of about 800 species. New and beautiful flowers are added annually to the pioneer garden beds of the valleys; wild flowers appear and fade; many beautiful colors, well remembered by the old settlers, have disappeared within the last decade, and thus one of the most beautiful features of nature is undergoing marked changes.

Mammalia.—Wild animals in large numbers were found here by the old hunters of the Fur Companies. Although the number has been materially reduced under the continuous warfare waged against them by both Red and White hunters, representatives of the different classes are still to be found in the forests and mountain fastnesses of the Territory. The animals mostly to be found here were the deer, bear, wolf, lynx, wild cat, fox, lion, badger, fisher, porcupine, woodchuck, rabbit, mink and weasel. The skunk and rat did not make their appearance in the rural districts for some years after the first settlements were made. The leaders of the wild tribe at present are the buffalo, the black, cinnamon and grizzly bears, mountain lion, mountain goat, mountain sheep, mule, deer, elk, cayote, wolf, moose (visitor), and cougars or panthers. Almost every class of fur-bearing animal is represented, from the inoffensive rabbit up to the huge buffalo. Deer were at one time very numerous, and very little difficulty was experienced in killing them. The moose has almost disappeared, his favorite grounds being now far north of the Saskatchewan. Occasionally one of these noble animals visits the country of the Blackfeet, and sometimes proceeds farther south, to witness, as it were, the changes effected since his parent-moose played hide-and-go-seek with the Gros Ventres and all those bloodthirsty savages. The old-time sport of moose-calling was the method of capturing this beautiful timid creature.

The buffalo is almost an animal of the past; his numbers have decreased, and physically he is inferior to the proud bison, as seen by early explorers and as hunted by the trappers of the Fur companies and Indians. James W. Taylor, U. S. consul at Winnipeg, Man., contributed a paper on this subject, under date April 25, 1873, which was embodied in the description of the American bison, published in Memoir of the Museum of Comparative Zoology (J. A. Allen, Mass., 1876), and subsequently published at Washington in the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Territories (Hayden, Powell, 1877). The last of the great herds of buffalo on this continent, numbering 75,000 head, wintered in 1883–4 in the Mauvais Terres, south of the Yellowstone, between the Powder and Little Missouri rivers. This immense herd was surrounded by the red and white hunters, a few only escaping from the line of fire.

The grizzly bear of Montana is all that his name implies—a ferocious monster. The black and cinnamon bears cannot compare with him—they leave a district in hot haste the moment their tracks are discovered, and in their retreat, generally take an opposite course to that pursued by the master-savage of the mountains. The adventures with this grizzly animal have been many and desperate. Men living now in the Territory are said to have encountered in their day as many as thirteen of these ferocious beasts, and were always victorious in the terrific struggle. Such men are scarce indeed; while the bears, which they overmastered, have gone to afford pleasure to the savage in his happy hunting-grounds above the mountains. In the event of meeting a grizzly in your path, the question who shall pass? has to be decided at once. As a general rule, however, this animal is as anxious to avoid the traveler as the latter is to avoid him.

The black and cinnamon bears are stupid beasts, possessing little courage, always anxious to keep far from the highways, and never venturing near a settlement until driven thither by hunger.

The mountain sheep is a most interesting animal. While far superior to imported sheep in intelligence, he is equally far inferior to them in docility. The character of his former hunters, and his ignorance of the men who now surround his pasturage, conduces to his vagrant life among the mountains. The mountain sheep, like his neighbors of the wilderness, is fast disappearing. A few years more, and the memory of these peaceable old settlers of the mountain will, with their big horn, be all that will be left of them.

The mountain lion is a combination of wickedness and cowardice. He has a full inclination to do mischief if only his spirit were strong enough. He has lived among the mountains for ages, and grew up in their wildness, so that if he indulge in wicked deeds from time to time, his crimes must be credited to his nature. Stories of encounters with mountain lions are as plenty as gold nuggets in this Territory. The latest was told in August, 1883, by the Post, and, as it is characteristic of this animal, it is thus given:—"On Monday night last, about dark, while taking a walk around his flock to see that none were straying from the fold, Dick Argus was attacked by a mountain lion, which had probably been lying there waiting for an opportunity to attack the sheep. The young man's cries for help brought his companion to his aid with a gun, when the lion precipitately beat a retreat and made his escape in the darkness. Dick escaped with the loss of his shirt and a few slight flesh wounds." The lion of the Rocky Mountains bears the same relation to the great lion of eastern countries as does the prairie wolf to the most savage and powerful of his species.

The mountain or black-horned goat is an elegant little resident of Montana. His long, black, sharp horns and long fleece or fur give him an air of candor which the imported goat can never assume. There is no hypocrisy in his character—he means all his looks convey, and if brought to bay, is certain to escape at the cost of the attacking party, unless the latter is armed and can use such arms with precision and celerity. But the mountain goat is not savage by any means. If captured in his youth, he is capable of learning all the little mean tricks of the goat of civilization, and as his years grow apace so does his attachment to the new, and his aversion to mountain life increase.

Lewis H. Morgan, of Rochester, N. Y., while visiting the Yellowstone country in 1862, witnessed the disappointment of the Crows in their inability to trap the beaver of that district, or to rescue from the industrious little animals the small groves of cottonwood on which they relied for their winter's fuel. Westward of the main range of the mountains, the beaver is equally voracious in presence of a cottonwood grove. Father De Smet saw where they had cut down trees of this species thirty inches in diameter. The beaver is still a well-known habitant of the Territory, and continues to be an object for the red and white trapper. When Baptiste Ducharme hunted here in 1823, beaver were very common. The pocket gopher is a small rodent ten to twelve inches long, of a reddish-brown color above, pale beneath, and tinged plumbously along the vertebral region. His home is a burrow, where he moves with dignity—something which he seems to lose when he appears on the surface.

Grasshoppers are found in Montana, as well as in other States and Territories, but here they are in such limited numbers that the fisherman sometimes has to spend an hour in searching out one to use as bait. The history of the grasshopper in Montana is told in their ravages here during the years 1855, 1864, 1873, 1874, 1875 and 1876. The locust migrates from northern Montana, by the middle of July reaches southern Dakota, and in some cases probably Nebraska, and even Kansas, sometime in August or September. It takes generally from two to three seasons for them to reach these latitudes. They do not always deposit their eggs when they first light. Frequently they remain from one to three weeks, and then move further on before egg-laying is commenced. They have their uses, it is said, but what the precise nature of such uses are is left to speculation. The locust of the Rocky Mountain region does not possess the ability of the grasshopper to spread destruction, or the venomous instinct of the mosquito. She is innocent of all evil practices, and is wanting in most of all the qualities which lead to mischief.

Bees, the economical house-builders, are regular residents of the Territory. Here among the sheltering mountains they practice the teachings of their order, and economize space by constructing their six-sided cells, even as they do in older and more numerous bee colonies.

The reptile tribe claims a small representation in this Territory. The common grass snake is the leading tribal specimen. The rattlesnake is scarce; but where he does exist, is neither so shy or prudent as the reptile of the Central States. The two species found in Montana are small, seldom three feet long; and the color varies according to the color of the soil and rocks where they live. The prairie rattlesnake, so common in Kansas and Iowa, is rarely found in Montana; but the Missouri rattlesnake is very abundant in the southeastern part of the Territory, on the Yellowstone and its tributaries, and is found on both sides of the Rocky Mountains from British America to Mexico. In some parts of Montana the snake may be seen at all seasons.

The gray wolf is found throughout the territory, but the pure white wolf is now very rare, along the Upper Missouri.

Weasels, martens, skunks, badgers and otters, all of the mustelinæ, are found throughout the Territory.

An idea of the number of bears, lions, coyottes and wolves may be gleaned from the fact that in 1884 no less than $12,000 were paid out as bounty for the scalps of such animals.

Climatology.—This subject, so interesting in itself and so closely connected with the physical life of the people, becomes of greater importance, when it is considered that upon its present record the people of the future have to make their comparisons and draw their philosophical deductions. Extraordinary climatic change has, without doubt, accompanied every geologic age. In our own times changes are not uncommon, each reducing the severity of this northern climate, and bringing it up in the scale just so high as to render it fit for the higher development of man. For years the great majority of citizens looked toward Montana, and trembled to think of its dreary wastes; but as men cast aside their recent narrow views, and began to read the accounts given of the country by explorers, they realized the absurdity of their old ideas, and learned the great truths of Nature's climatic provisions.

HISTORY OF MONTANA.

CHAPTER I.

EXPLORATION AND OCCUPATION.

THE questions of America being contemporary with Asia or Europe in settlement, and that the Indians and Negroes, as direct descendants of Cain and Lamech, were scattered over this continent, are set at rest by the philosophy of Lafitan (Dissertation on the Gin-Seng, Paris, 1718), and by the Spanish Benedictine, Rev. F. B. Feyjoo (Theatro Critico, t. 5, Dis. 15, p. 320). The human race branched out from its cradle, and peopled the continents, as we know them to-day, in precisely the same manner as European and Asiatic emigrations set out to follow and meet the orb of day. America was explored and settled years after the first human society was organized, by peoples from Asia and Europe. The wrecks of Chinese or Japanese ships had been found on the American coasts, and the Indians relate a legend that foreign merchants, clothed in silk, visited this country in great ships. Again, the name Tartarax, King of Quivira, means the Tartar, while Montezuma, the name given to the old Mexican emperors, is nothing more than a form of Motazaiuma, which, according to Harnius, is a name given to Japanese sovereigns.

The Mexicans, as well as the ancient inhabitants of the northern States, wrote in little pictures framed with meal, on the barks of trees. These hieroglyphics were never understood by Europeans, although specimens of them were published by Wormius, of Copenhagen, and by John de Laat (Dis. Indiæ Occid. 1, 5, c. 10). Many annals of Mexico, thus written, are to be found in the Library of the Vatican; but the greater books were destroyed by the Spaniards, while under the impression that they belonged to the magician's art. The Mexicans calculated with the aid of grains of Indian corn, pebbles, and, in the higher ranks, nuggets of gold were used. The constitution of Mexico under the Incas was based on principles which would do credit to the Europeans of the present time, and their cities and homes and churches were so well governed as to be above comparison with any community of our own days. Their armies were numerous, and well equipped with bows and arrows, slings, stone hatchets, and flint-topped spears. The Spaniard came to abolish this happy state, and to introduce that civilization which resulted in the death or exile of the aborigines.

Spanish Exploration.—Long years before the zealous French missionary or the enterprising French trader found his way to the Mississippi and the mountain region, the Spaniard and Creole and Mexican had learned of this great northern country, and made plans for its exploration. Indeed, from interviews with the Indians, the early Spanish and French explorers heard from their new red friends that beyond, toward the ocean, the white man and the black man were known, and the soothsayer of each tribe had inculcated the belief that from the setting sun other whites would come, even as the Frenchman followed in its course. To lay before the reader the manner in which the country between the Mississippi and the Pacific ocean was discovered, the writer has deemed it just to preface the chapter, dealing with the exploration of Montana as we now know this territory, with an account of the discovery of the country lying east and west of longitude thirty-three degrees west from Washington, or a line running north and south about the center of Montana. This plan appears necessary, as the statements of explorers and their historians contain many items of information which go to confirm the belief that Spaniards were the first white men who visited Montana.

In 1507 Ferdinand commissioned the Indian Council to protect the Indians from the Atlantic westward against their Spanish masters, and prevent their exportation to the northern mountain regions, as well as their labors in the gold mines, as it was proven by the benevolent Dominican, Bartholomew Las Casas, that change of climate and work in the mines were fast reducing the Indians. This Council, and the just friendship which the members of it extended to Don Diego, the elder son of Columbus, may be said to be the beginning of Spanish efforts to treat the red man justly. Governor Ovando was recalled, and Don Diego Columbus sent out as Governor of Hispaniola. He, with his wife and followers and their wives, formed that circle in which Creole nobility had its origin. In 1510, Diego employed Velasquez to engage in the project of colonizing Cuba. This, as well as private enterprises of a similar character, resulted only in the establishment of the Panama settlement, under Balboa, the discoverer of the Pacific ocean (see Quintano, Yriarte, Da Costa), who assumed the title of Governor. The next year Pedrarias Davila was appointed Governor by Ferdinand, on the advice of the illustrious Ximenes. From 1513 to 1516, Las Casas, one of the first missionaries who came to this continent, viewed with displeasure the tyranny of Spaniards in imposing labors upon the Indians for which nature unfitted them, and which led to their decease by thousands. King Charles appointed a commission to inquire into this persecution of the Indians; but the members, while testifying to the truth of all the great Dominican's statements, also bore testimony to the hardship which the colonists would endure if deprived of their Indian slaves. Las Casas then proposed to extend to America the privileges of Europeans in the matter of hiring labor, and to ship Negro slaves to supply the place of Indians. This proposition was adopted, at the suggestion of the missionary, to save the Indian, and give the Negro the work which he had strength to perform.

In 1518 the same Velasquez—an old associate of Christopher Columbus, who was appointed by Diego Columbus, in 1510, to plant a colony in Cuba—was Governor of Cuba. He employed Fernando Cortez, in 1518, to undertake, in his name, the conquest of the Mexican empire, then discovered by the Spaniards. To him he gave command of eleven vessels and six hundred and seventeen men. Cortez, soon after leaving Cuba, forgot his service to Velasquez, and assumed the rôle of ambassador from Charles V. to the Mexican monarch. In this rôle he overruled the objections of the Mexicans to his advance; founded the settlement of Vera Cruz and gave it municipal government, when he was elected Chief Justice and Captain-General. This brought his six hundred and seventeen followers into the same crime of treason, and, to insure their aid, he burned the eleven ships. This done, his men had no alternative but to follow him. He next secured aid from the Chief of Tlascala, a jealous and powerful neighbor of Montezuma. With this force he entered the seat of government, and, taking possession of the country and its Emperor, became the first Spanish ruler in Mexico. The Mexican people now took up the sceptre of power and drove the daring Spaniard and his followers toward the sea, and they elected the warlike Guatimozin Emperor. In 1821 Cortez returned with a force of Tlascalans, the survivors of his own troops, and the men of Cuba (sent against him by Velasquez), who swore loyalty to him. In July of that year he re-entered the city of Mexico, sacked it, and sent a great treasure to the Emperor Charles as a surety of his exploits and discovery. This liberal donation and promises of greater tribute secured for Cortez the friendship of the Emperor and a commission as Governor of Mexico. Following Cortez was Francisco Pizarro, the conqueror and tyrant of Peru. The chiefs of the Spanish party in America followed in the inhuman paths of those soldiers for some years, until the natives and many Spaniards rose in rebellion. To inquire into the causes of these disturbances, the Regent of Spain dispatched the old priest Pedro de la Gasco to Mexico and Peru. This ambassador came without men or money, settled all differences in Peru, established a court of impartial justice, and gave similar laws to Chili, then conquered under his direction by Pedro de Valdivia. In Mexico he amended the laws of Las Casas, and rendered them even more humane than their originator thought possible. This accomplished, he returned to Spain in 1550, laid down the plans for the administration by Viceroys and defining provinces, and then entered upon his duties as Bishop of Palencia.

The reforms instituted by Las Casas and Pedro de la Gasco, were gradually infringed upon by the Spaniards, yet new efforts were put forth to deal justly by the natives, the Creoles and the whites. Mexico, however, was not restored to complete tranquility, though internally pacified by this concession to rebellion and misgovernment. To the north and west of that viceroyalty the Spaniards had continued their conquests along the Gulf of California, until they had at length come into collision with some tribes of warlike Indians. With these fierce champions of the independence of their country, the neighboring Creole settlers had for years been engaged in hostilities, and about this time the red warriors had so decidedly gained the advantage over the colonists, that the latter were obliged to apply to the Viceroy for aid. He sent the troops on hand; but even with this force the contest continued from 1761 to 1771, when the Indians smoked the peace pipe with the Spaniards. It was at this time that the rich mines of Sonora and Analoa were discovered and worked. In November, 1780, the insurrection raised by Tupac Amaru or Joseph Gabriel Condorcanki, extended to Mexico, and even was understood and participated in by the Indians of the North. (Bernardo, Sempére.) In 1810, about the time the Northern fur traders were establishing posts from the great lakes to the Pacific, the Spanish Government granted to the Indians all the rights and privileges hitherto enjoyed by Creoles, while denying to the Creoles the rights of Spaniards. In Mexico and her northern divisions, the Indians aided the Spanish troops in quelling the rebellion which this humane measure inaugurated. A few years later, the influences of the new Republic of the United States began to make themselves evident, and as a result the Spanish American Empire passed out of existence.

In 1535, Cabeza de Vaca, two soldiers, and the treacherous Moor—Estevanico, better known as Stephen, the Moor, left the city of Mexico for the avowed purpose of exploring the terra incognita of the North. This party returned in 1536, and from their descriptions and physical geography of the most remote point which they reached, it may be concluded that their travels led them to what is now known as the South Saskatchewan and Sun rivers, beyond the Missouri and Yellowstone.

The first missionary father who visited this northern territory, was John of Padilla, a Franciscan friar, who was a contemporary of De Niza. About the year 1537, the venerable Franciscan—Marcos de Naza or Niza—was dispatched by Coronado, who was then Governor of New Gallia, to explore the country referred to by Cabeza de Vaca. The unsuspecting friar selected Estevanico, the Moor, as guide. This Iago of the sixteenth century, preceded the Franciscan, and attempted to commit such depredations on the property of the natives, that they killed him, but permitted his Spanish fellow travelers to return. The priest met the refugees returning, heard their story with sorrow, but yet had resolution enough to push forward on his journey. It is recorded, however, that his resolution failed him on coming within sight of the Seven Cities of the North, and that he never entered the gorgeous city of the Cibolaeans or the Seven Cities of the Bull. In after years, several attempts were made by the Spanish-American armies to capture the settlement; but in their journeyings the troops found no fairy-land of gold and precious stones.

Francisco Vasquez de Coronado, the cavalier of Salamanca, came to Mexico, where he married Donna Beatrix, daughter of Estrada, who was then the virtual Governor of the country. In 1540 this adventurer set out in charge of an army corps, composed of eight hundred natives and three hundred Spanish mobiles, for the fabled land of the North, and according to the General's own statement, took possession of the entire country of the Missouri, south and north of the fortieth parallel, beyond the domain of the Emperor Tartarax in May, 1541. Previous to 1536 this soldier of fortune succeeded Nunez de Guzman in the government of New Gallia and all the territories along the Rocky mountains, and in 1540 was appointed General of this expedition by the Viceroy Don Antonio de Mendoca. The expedition cost sixty thousand pieces of gold, or about five hundred thousand dollars, according to the chronicles of Gomara. This Gomara gives the following quaint description of the buffalo, as he saw them: "These oxen," says Gomara, "are of the bigness and color of our bulls, but their horns are not so great. They have a great bunch upon their foreshoulders, and more hair on their fore part than on their hinder part, and it is like wool. They have, as it were, a horse mane upon their backbone, and much hair and very long from their knees downward. They have great tufts of hair hanging down from their foreheads, and it seemeth that they have beards because of the great store of hair hanging down at their chins and throats. The males have very long tails, and a great knob at the end, so that in some respects they resemble the lion, and in some other the camel. They push with their horns, they run and kill a horse when they are in their rage and anger. Finally, it is a fierce beast of countenance and form of body. Their masters have no other riches nor substance; of them they eat, they drink, they apparel, they shoe themselves; and of their hides they make many things, as houses, shoes and ropes; of their bones they make bodkins; of their sinews and hair, thread; of their horns, maws, bladders and calves' skins, budgets, wherein they draw and keep water. To be short, they make so many things of them as they have need of, or so many as suffice them in the use of this life."

In 1519 the ill-fated Portuguese Magellan started on the famous voyage that resulted in the discovery of the long sought route to the Indies: thus solving the maritime problem of the fifteenth century. Three years later his vessel returned to Spain with a log-book that contained a record of the death of that gallant commander at the Philippine islands, whose vessel, the Victoria, had been the first European craft to sail on the waters of the Pacific ocean, and the first to make a voyage around the world. It was this famous navigator that gave the name Pacific to our ocean, after having sailed into it from the straits of the "Ten Thousand Virgins," as he called it, now known as the Straits of Magellan.

California was discovered in 1534 by Ortun Ximenes, a mutineer, who headed an outbreak on board the ship of which he was pilot, that had resulted in the death of the captain and some of his officers. The expedition had been fitted up for exploration purposes by order of Cortez, and after the commander was thus killed Ximenes took charge and continued the search, discovered the peninsula of Lower California, and landed at a point somewhere between La Pas and Cape St. Lucas, where, while on shore, he and twenty of his men were killed by Indians. The remainder of the crew returned to Chametta, where they reported a country found numerously peopled, among whose shores were valuable beds of pearls. Up to this time the word California had not been applied to any part of the Pacific coast or its waters. In 1536 Cortez fitted up an expedition and set sail for the country found by the mutineers. He landed on the 1st day of May at the place where Ximenes was killed, giving the name of Santa Cruz to the bay. He established a colony there and sent back his four vessels for supplies and such of his party as had remained behind. But only one of these vessels ever returned and it brought no provisions. Cortez immediately embarked on the returned vessel and set out in search of his lost ships. These he found on the coast of Mexico hopelessly damaged. Procuring fresh stores he returned to his colony, that in his absence had been reduced to a famishing condition, many of whom died of starvation or overeating from the provisions he brought with him. The historian, Gomara, says (and mark the language), "Cortez that he might no longer be a spectator of such miseries went off for further discoveries and landed in California, which is a bay"; and Venegas, the California historian of 1758, referring to this passage in the work of Gomara says, that it "likewise proves that this name was properly that of a bay which Cortez discovered on the coast, and perhaps that now called De la Pax, and used to signify the whole peninsula." This was the first application of the name California to any definite point on what is called the Pacific coast. Cortez was soon recalled to Mexico on account of impending troubles and danger of a revolt in that country, glad to have an excuse for leaving a place that had proved fruitful only of disaster. Within a few months he was followed by the colony, and Lower California, with its rocks and wastes of sand, was left to the Indians, the cactus and the coyote. During the remainder of the sixteenth century there were four attempts made to explore the Northern Pacific coast by Spaniards.

The first recorded discovery of that Territory, of which Montana once formed a part—Oregon—was that by Juan Rodriquez Cabrillo, March 10, 1543, when his squadron anchored in one of the bays, in latitude forty-four degrees north. He named Cape Mendocino and the Fallarone Isles, and, returning, reported all he had seen among the northern Indians. The incentive that prompted all nations to discoveries and occupation along the Pacific coast is forcibly and plainly given by King Philip III. of Spain, in his message to his Viceroy in Mexico, in which he states the reason why he issues an order for the further exploration of the coast and its occupation. The document was dated August 16, 1606, and sets forth that "Don Pedro de Acunna, Knight of the Order of St. John, my Governor and Captain-general of the Philippian islands, and President of my royal audience there: You are hereby given to understand that Don Louis de Valasco, my late Viceroy in New Spain, in regard to the great distance between the port of Acapulco and those islands, the fatigue, hardships and dangers of that voyage, for want of a port where ships might put in and provide themselves with water, wood, meats and other things of absolute necessity, determined to make a discovery, and draughts, with observation of harbors along the coast from New Spain to these islands."

The communication goes on to give the successive events in the prosecution of the enterprise until after the return of Viscaino's expedition, in 1603, and then adds, speaking of the Indians found upon our coast, "That their clothing is of the skins of sea-wolves, which they have a very good method of tanning and preparing, and that they have abundance of flax, hemp and cotton, and that the said Sebastian Viscaino carefully informed himself of these Indians, and many others whom he discovered along the coast for above eight hundred leagues, and that they told him that up the country there were large towns, and silver and gold, whence he is inclined to believe that great riches may be discovered, especially as in some parts of the land veins of metal are to be found."

Thus the Spanish Crown gives the reasons for wishing to occupy the country, and it must be borne in mind that these inducements were equally strong with other powers that were hostile to Spain. Vuelgas gives the additional reasons, not mentioned by the King, why the opposing countries, Spain and England, should desire to possess it. He says: "That in the meantime the English should find out the so much desired passage to the South Sea by the north of America and above California, which passage is not universally denied, and one day may be found; that they may fortify themselves on both sides of this passage, and thus extend the English dominion from the north to the south of America on the South Sea beyond Cape Mendocino, or lower down on California itself. England would then, without control, reign mistress of the sea and its commerce, and be able to threaten by land and sea the territories of Spain; invade them, on occasion, from the east, west, north, and south, hem them in, and press them on all sides."

With all these causes at work to spur forward the different powers of the world, with all these visions of things imagined, that lay covered up in the land unknown, working upon the fancy, it could do naught else than dot the high seas with adventurers and the fleets of empires. Yet one hundred and sixty-three years had passed, after the first discovery, before a permanent settlement was made in any part of this fabulous land that held secreted for the coming generations within its limits the realization of all their wildest hopes.

There remains the record of but one Spanish navigator who passed up along the coast of California during the seventeenth century. His name was Sebastian Viscaino, who sailed from Acapulco, May 5, 1602. Passing north along the coast of Lower California he discovered the harbors of San Diego and Monterey, the latter being named by him in memory of his friend the Viceroy of Mexico. At this point he sent back his sick, then moved on up the coast, leaving Monterey harbor to slumber for one hundred and sixty-six years, disturbed only by the winds and balsas of the natives. His course was close in along shore, searching for harbors, where a station to supply the East India galleons might be established. Reaching a point a few miles below the bay that we now know as San Francisco, his evil genius sent him out to sea where he continued north, keeping the land in sight and thus passed that port. Coming opposite to what is now known as Drake's Bay, behind Point Reyes, where that notorious sea-king spent those thirty-six days when he landed and took possession of the country for England, he changed his course and put into shore in search of the cargo of a vessel called San Augustine, that had been wrecked there in 1595. The learned historian, Juan de Torquemada, writing in 1615, says: "He anchored behind a point of rocks called 'La Punta de los Reyes,' in the port of San Francisco. Finding nothing, he continued his voyage toward the north, keeping the land in view, until he had sighted Cape Mendocino, when a council of his associates was called to decide what it was best to do under the circumstances. But six able bodied men were left on the vessel; had there been fourteen, it was the general's intention to push on north to latitude forty-six degrees, where the Columbia river empties into the Pacific ocean. He believed from all that he could learn that it was the Straits of Anian, that at the time was supposed to separate Asia from America, and connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, through which he proposed to sail to Spain.

The condition of the crew is beyond the power of pen to describe; the following from that of Torquemada, who was writing of them, will give some idea of what the navigator of those early times had to contend with, having no means of preserving on shipboard, for long voyages vegetables for food to ward off the horrible disease—scurvy. After describing the progress of the disaster, he says: "Nor is the least ease to be expected from change of place, as the slightest motion is attended with such severe pains, that they must be very fond of life who would not willingly lay it down on the first appearance of so terrible a distemper. This virulent humor makes such ravages in the body that it is entirely covered with ulcers, and the poor patients are unable to bear the least pressure; even the very clothes laid on them deprive them of life. Thus they lie groaning, and incapable of any relief. For the greatest assistance possible to be given them, if I may be allowed the expression, is not to touch them, nor even the bedclothes. These effects, however melancholy, are not the only ones produced by this pestilential humor. In many, the gums, both of the upper and lower jaws, are pressed both within and without to such a degree that the teeth cannot touch one another, and withal, so loose and bare that they shake with the least motion of the head, and some of the patients spit their teeth out with their saliva. Thus they are unable to receive any food but liquid, as gruel, broth, milk of almonds, and the like. This gradually brought on so great a weakness that they died while talking to their friends. * * * Some, by way of ease, made loud complaints, others lamented their sins with the deepest contrition, some died talking, some sleeping, some eating, some while setting up in their beds." We must pass without further notice the details of this voyage, except to note that it returned to Mexico in March, 1603.

Much of what has been given here of the hardships of that celebrated voyage has been for the purpose of impressing upon the mind of the reader a knowledge of some of the obstacles that guarded the approach to our land, which, combined with the rocky shore and uncultivated soil, placed at the threshold against invasion a more formidable and dreaded defense than was the fabled winged serpent which guarded the approach to the Indies. In 1606 the King of Spain issued orders that a supply station for the East Indies be established at Monterey; but the order was never executed, and nothing further toward settlement was attempted until 1683, when Admiral Otondo headed an expedition, by water, to take possession of the country. He landed at La Paz, erected a church, and made that his headquarters. Father Kino was in charge as chaplain to the expedition, and set about learning the Indian language, and soon had translated into their tongue the creeds of the Catholic church. The effort lasted about three years; during the time they were visited with eighteen months' drought, and, before they had recovered from the blow, received orders to put to sea and bring into Acapulco safely the Spanish galleon, then in danger of capture by the Dutch privateers that were lying in wait for her. This was successfully accomplished; the treasure ship was conveyed safely in, but the act resulted in the abandonment again of the occupation of California, Oregon, Montana, and all the upper mountain country.

The society of Jesuits was then solicited by the Government of Spain to undertake the conquest, and was offered forty thousand dollars yearly from the royal treasury to aid them in the enterprise. But they declined the undertaking, and Spain was at last forced to abandon the attempt to occupy the country, though it was believed to be the rival of the legendary El Dorado, and a key to the defenses of her possessions already obtained in the New World. For one hundred and forty-seven years, since Cortez first established a colony on her coast, had the treasure of private citizens and the Government of Spain been poured out in unsuccessful attempts to hold the country by explorations and colonies; but the time had come when they were forced to yield its possession to its native tribes and acknowledge defeat.

French Exploration.—History has nothing more brilliant on her pages than the sufferings and labors endured by the French missionaries and explorers, while endeavoring to christianize the Great West, and to draw the Indians into intercourse with civilization. With what extraordinary energy did these travelers of olden time advance toward the setting sun. Every obstacle which savage nature could oppose, from Quebec to Lake Huron, was surmounted; and then, not content with all this, these missionaries and traders looked north and west, the one seeing in imagination many nations yet to be brought to adore the God of Christians, the other beholding lakes and rivers and valleys and mountains rich in all those treasures which constitute the wealth of the fur-trader. To the physical and mental powers of the priest and explorer, and to the remarkable energy and cupidity of the fur-trader, are due all the knowledge we have of the Mississippi valley and its tributaries from the beginning of the seventeenth to the middle of the eighteenth century.

To Jean Nicolet, next to Pere Le Caron and Frere Sagard, both Franciscan friars, belongs the honor of the first place in the history of the West. Nor is that honor due from mere accidental events, as is so often the case in discovery of new countries, for it was won by the deliberate accomplishment of a laborious and dangerous undertaking, the purpose of which was, so far as evidence can now be adduced, substantially accomplished. The sparse records of the life of this man contain but the barest outlines of his earlier days, though future research among original documents, it is to be hoped, will shed more light on the obscured details. It is known that he was of French nativity, born in Normandy, and that he emigrated to Canada in the year 1616, being a protégé of Champlain. The date of his birth is not preserved in any document extant. Upon his arrival in New France, he at once took up his residence at Allumettes island, on the Ottawa, that he might the better study the Indian tongue, and thereby fit himself for the office of interpreter. In 1622, but four years after his arrival, he is mentioned as having acquired an extensive influence over the Algonquin tribes. From 1623 to 1631, Nicolet lived with the tribes of the Nepissing. This is stated on the authority of his friend, Father Le Jenne, although other of the "Jesuit Relations" record that the period of his residence with the Nepissing tribes was from 1629 to 1632. It is determined by those who have made a special study of the subject, that Nicolet began his Western travels in the summer of 1634, and returned to Quebec in 1635. The nature of this work precludes the possibility of arguing this question, but as several hitherto accepted theories are controverted, the authorities governing this deduction are named, as follows: "Jesuit Relations, Discovery of the Northwest," "Melanges d' History et de Literateur." Parkman observes that "Nicolet was a remarkable man," and so he must have been, to win the confidence of the savage tribes to that degree which enabled him to penetrate into the remote regions of their homes, and there conduct a peaceful enterprise with the warlike savages, for the advancement of commerce in fur and peltry. The long journeying from Quebec was undertaken at the suggestion of Champlain, and in the official capacity of interpreter of the company of one hundred associates of New France, which was formed in 1627, with a view to the development of the immense resources of the western wilderness in furs. The mission of Nicolet was not to establish peace, as distinguished from warfare, between the Hurons and Peninsular savages, but was, rather, a mission of peace, to cement the friendly relations of these tribes, as well as the Nez Percés, or Ottawas, and other tribes in the general interests of the French. Nicolet visited the Hurons on his westward journey, at their home on the eastern side of the lake which bears their name, and negotiated with them. It is recorded by Parkman that, upon his arrival at Winnebago Town, he sent some of his Indian attendants to announce his coming, put on a robe of damask, and advanced to meet the expectant crowd with a pistol in each hand. The squaws and children fled, screaming that it was a manitou, or spirit, armed with thunder and lightning; but the chiefs and warriors regaled him with so bountiful a hospitality that one hundred and twenty beavers were devoured. One of the objects of Nicolet's visit to the Green Bay country was to smoke the pipe of peace with its savage occupants, and to counsel harmony among all the tribes of the upper lakes visited by him, to the end that all might be visited by the French from the St. Lawrence, for the purpose of trading for furs. Peace was promised; but the Winnebagoes, immediately after he left them, attacked the Nez Percés, located upon the eastern waters of Lake Huron, capturing and eating two of that nation. Five years subsequently, they were themselves attacked by the Illinois, from the widely-extended prairies of the south, and nearly exterminated. In 1641, the Pottawatomies left their ancient homes on the island of the upper lakes, seeking refuge among the Chippewas, at the Sault Ste. Marie, near the foot of Lake Superior, returning, however, some years afterward, and again visiting Michigan, spreading themselves through the peninsula from Sault de Ste. Marie to Grand river, and to the Huron and Lake Erie. Nicolet visited many of the surrounding nations. He retraced his way to the St. Lawrence in the summer of 1635, reaching Quebec in safety. The parish records of that city furnish the information that this brave man was occupied with various duties from 1635 to the day of his death, and shows conclusively that his journey must have been made at the date given, since he was not absent from Quebec long enough at any time to have performed the feat subsequent to 1635. Nicolet married Marguerite Coquillard, at Quebec, October 7, 1737. He lost his life while on a mission to save a poor Abenaqui from the Algonquins, by the capsizing of his boat, October 31, 1642. To this bold adventurer, whose knowledge of the Western tribes was gained by actual experience, must all praise be given for having opened to the devoted followers of the Cross the way to new fields of usefulness, and to the traders a country which continued to enrich them down to our own times.

There were none to follow Nicolet to the wild West until 1641, when a great "feast of the dead" given by the Algonquins in Huronia, gathered there all the kindred tribes to take part in the funeral games, the dances, chants, and mournful processions of those decennial rites. Among the rest came the Otchipwes from the rapids, which then closed to the vessels of men the entrance of the vast upper lake. These deputies, like the rest, were visited by the Jesuit missionaries, and so won were the good Otchipwes by the gentle, self-devoting ways of those heralds of the Cross, that they earnestly invited them to their cabins at the Falls of Ste. Marie, near the foot of Lake Superior, portraying, with all the lively imagination of the child of the forests, the riches and plenty that reigned in their sylvan abodes. Ever eager to extend their spiritual conquests, to enlarge the bounds of freedom in this western world, the missionaries joyfully accepted the invitation of the Otchipwes. By command of the Superior, two missionary Fathers, Charles Raymbault, a man thoroughly versed in the Algonquin customs and language, with Pere Isaac Jacques —no less complete an Indian scholar—were dispatched to visit them. On the 17th of June they launched their canoes at the mission house of St. Mary's, in the country of the Huron Indians, and for seventeen days advanced over the crystal waters of the inland sea (Lake Huron), amidst the beautiful islands which stretch across the lake, clustering around the lake gemmed Manitoulin, so hallowed to the Indian's mind. When they reached the Falls of St. Marie, they found two thousand Indians assembled there, and amid their joyful greetings the missionaries gazed with delight on the vast field which lay before them. They heard of tribe after tribe which lay around, and ever and anon of the terrible Mad-owesse (Sioux), who dwelt on the great river of the West (Mississippi). Earnestly did the Otchipwes press the two fathers to stay in their midst. "We will embrace you," said they, "as brothers; we shall derive profit from your words;" but it could not be so. The paucity of missionaries in the Huron country did not yet permit of the establishment of that distant mission. Raymbault and Jacques could but plant the Cross to mark the limit of their spiritual progress; yet they turned it to the South, for thither now their hopes began to tend. After a short stay, they returned to St. Mary's, and hopes were entertained of soon establishing a mission on Lake Superior; but Raymbault shortly afterward fell a victim to the climate, while Jacques began in his own person a long career of martyrdom, preluding the ruin of the Huron Mission, the death of its apostles, and the destruction of the tribe. The Jesuit missionaries located in the country of the Huron Indians, always wide awake to obtaining knowledge of the region lying to the westward and northward of Lake Huron, had, nevertheless, but meager accounts of the country even down to 1648. The pipe of peace which Nicolet smoked with the western tribes was not productive of immediate good returns. The death of Champlain, and the change in purposes and ambitions among the Canadian settlers, produced in the East an almost total forgetfulness of the upper lake country. For at least two decades of years after the discovery by Nicolet, very dim and shadowy is its history. Here and there references to the lakes, and the Indians inhabiting their shores, are made by Jesuit missionaries in their relations. These "Relations" were the records, kept by priests, of their experiences in their arduous calling. For many years, beginning in 1632, the Superior of the Jesuit Mission in Canada—then New France—sent every summer to Paris his reports, which embodied or were accompanied by those of his subordinates. For forty years these reports were annually published in Paris, and were known as the "Jesuit Relations." Those which are of interest to the student of Michigan history begin with the year 1639–40, and extend to 1672. Says one of these records, of date 1648: "This Superior Lake extends to the northwest, that is to say, between the west and the north. A peninsula, or strip of land quite small, separates this Superior Lake from another third lake, called by us the Lake of the Puants, which also discharges itself into our fresh water sea, through a mouth which is on the other side of the peninsula, about ten leagues more to the west than the Sault. This third lake extends between the west and the southwest, more toward the west, and is almost equal in size to our fresh water sea. On its shores dwell a different people, of an unknown language, that is to say, a language that is neither Algonquin nor Huron. These people are called the Puants, not on account of any unpleasant odor that is peculiar to them, but because they say they came from the shores of the sea far distant toward the west, the waters of which being salt, they call themselves 'the people of the stinking water.'" Another account, written in 1654, after giving the arrival at Montreal of a fleet of canoes loaded with furs, belonging to friendly Indians who came from the upper country, a distance of four hundred leagues, speaks of a part of these Indians being the Tobacco nations of the Hurons, and a portion Ottawas, and adds: "These tribes have abandoned their ancient country, and have retired toward the more distant nation in the vicinity of the great lake, whom we call Puants, in consequence of their having dwelt near the sea, which is salt, and which our savages call 'stinking water.'" The Hurons had been entirely overthrown by the Iroquois in 1649 and 1650, and had abandoned their country. A division of this nation called the Tobacco Indians, with such other Hurons as had taken refuge with them, settled on Mackinac Island, where they were joined by a branch of the Ottawas, nicknamed, by the French, Cheveux releves, or Standing Hair; hence this statement in the "Relations" that these nations had "retired toward the more distant" Winnebagoes. Again, in the same year, this is recorded: "In the islands of the 'lake of the people of the sea,' whom some persons wrongly call the 'Puants,' there are many tribes whose language closely resembles the Algonquins." In 1656 one of the Jesuits writes: "Our attention has been directed toward a number of nations in the neighborhood of the 'Nation of the Sea,' whom some persons have called the Puants, in consequence of their having formerly dwelt on the shores of the sea, which they call 'Winnipeg,' that is to say, 'stinking water.'" Then follows an enumeration of the villages of Illinois and Sioux Indians, and of two other nations, the "Ponarak" and "Kiritinous." Such are the meager records of the West, after its visitation by Nicolet, down to the year 1658.

In August, 1656, a band of the Ottawas, or other Algonquins, numbering three hundred, and in fifty birch-bark canoes, appeared upon the St. Lawrence. These savages demanded commerce with the French and missionaries for the boundless West. This was the beginning of the commerce of the Northwest. But for the greed of the fur-trader and the zeal of the Jesuit, the story of Nicolet would soon have passed from the minds of the Frenchmen inhabiting the St. Lawrence; and the discovery of Michigan, like the discovery of the Mississippi by De Soto, would soon have faded from the memory of man. But a missionary, whose name is not appended to the "Relations"—and it is, consequently, uncertain who the reverend father was—took from the lips of an Indian captive, named Asatanik, and a man of considerable importance, an account of his having, in the month of June, 1658, set out from Green Bay for the north, passing the rest of the summer and following winter near Lake Superior—so called because of its being above Lake Huron. This Indian informed the Jesuit of the havoc and desolation of the Iroquois war in the West; how it had reduced the Algonquin nations about Lake Superior. The same missionary saw at Quebec two Frenchmen, who had just arrived from the upper countries with three hundred Algonquins in sixty canoes, laden with peltries. These fur-traders had passed the winter of 1659 on the shores of Lake Superior, during which time they made several trips among the surrounding tribes. In their wanderings they probably visited some of the northern parts of what is now Michigan and Wisconsin. They saw, at six days' journey beyond the lake, toward the southwest, a tribe composed of the remainder of the Hurons of the Tobacco nation, compelled by the Iroquois to abandon Mackinac, and to bury themselves thus deep in the forests, that they might not be found by their enemies. The two traders told the tales they had heard of the ferocious Sioux, and of a great river upon which they dwelt—the "great water," of Nicolet's guides. Thus a knowledge of the Mississippi began to dawn again upon the civilized world. It may be well to remember, in this connection, that the fur-traders came to what is now Michigan in advance generally of the missionaries. They led the way for the Jesuit fathers; but as trade was their object, and they left no record of their visits, only vague knowledge is had of what they really saw or did. But slight mention is made of them in the Relations, where, as much as possible, their presence and doings are kept in the background.

The narratives of the Indian captive and of the two Frenchmen were not lost upon the zealous Jesuits; for, two years later, René Mesnard attempted to plant a mission on the southern shore of Lake Superior, but perished in the forest by starvation or the tomahawk. Thoroughly inured to Indian life, with many a dialect of Huron and Algonquin at his command, this missionary, in endeavoring to establish the Cross so far to the westward, went, with eight Frenchmen and a number of Ottawas, starting from Three Rivers, Canada, August 28, 1660. He made his way to the Georgian bay, and thence to a large bay upon the southern shore of the lake, in all probability what is now known as Keweenaw. There, however, he met with little success in founding a mission. He subsequently determined to visit some Hurons who were then located upon or near the Noquet Islands, and who had sent to implore the missionary to come among them, as they had long been destitute of a pastor, and many of them were fast relapsing into pagan habits. It should be remembered that the Hurons proper, and their allies and kindred of the Tobacco nation, had, many years before, while living near the Georgian bay of Lake Huron, Canada, received the Jesuit missionaries at their villages, and numbers had professed Christianity. Three of Mesnard's companions were sent to explore the way. Descending the Menominee river, they finally reached the Huron village, where they found a few wretched Indians—mere living skeletons. On their way they encountered great hardships, owing to the rapid current of the stream, its portage and precipices. Convinced of the impossibility of Mesnard's reaching the Hurons, or remaining with them if he did, they returned, encountering still greater difficulties in ascending the river. These Frenchmen were, doubtless, in their perilous journey, many times upon what is now the territory of Michigan. On their arrival at the lake, they implored the aged missionary not to attempt a journey evidently beyond his strength. But to their remonstrance he interposed, "I must go if it costs me my life." He set out with one Frenchman and some Hurons. The seventeen other companions returned to the St. Lawrence. Mesnard was soon left by the Hurons, and was afterward lost from his companions, who sought for him, but in vain. It seems that, while his attendant was employed in transporting a canoe, Father Mesnard accidentally became separated from him. This was about the 10th of August, 1661. With him perished the first mission—if, indeed, it can be called one—upon the shores of the upper lakes. His faithful companion, Donné John Guerin, reached the Huron village in safety. There was not, at that time, another missionary station nearer than Montreal. The failure of this first attempt did not discourage the Jesuits or quench their enthusiasm; but who was the man to cope with the thousand difficulties surrounding the establishment of a mission so far in the western wilds? With better hopes, undismayed by the sad fate of Mesnard, indifferent to hunger, nakedness and cold, to the wreck of their ships of bark, and to fatigue and privations by night and by day, in August, 1665, Father Claude Allouez embarked on a mission, by way of the Ottawa, to the far West. Early in September, he reached the rapids through which the waters of Lake Superior rush to Lake Huron, and admired the beautiful river, with its woody isles and inviting bays. On the 2d of that month he entered the great lake, which the savages reverenced as a divinity, and of which the entrance presents a spectacle of magnificence rarely excelled in the rugged scenery of the North. He passed the lofty ridge of naked sand which stretches along the shore its drifting heaps of bareness; he urged his canoe by the cliffs of pictorial sandstone, which for twelve miles rise three hundred feet in height, fretted by the chafing waves into arches and bastions, caverns and towering walls, heaps of prostrate ruins, and erect columns crowned with fantastic entablatures. Landing on the south shore, he said mass, thus consecrating the forests which he claimed for a Christian king. Sailing beyond the Bay of St. Theresa (so named by Mesnard, now Keweenaw bay) and having vainly sought for a mass of fine copper, of which he had heard rumors (this being the first known of this metal by the whites), on the 1st day of October he arrived at the village of the Ochippewas, on the west shore of the bay of Chagouamigong, or Chegoimegon. It was at a moment when the young warriors were bent on a strife with the warlike Sioux. A grand council of ten or twelve neighboring nations was held, to wrest the hatchet from the hands of the rash braves, and Allouez was admitted to an audience before the vast assembly. In the name of Louis XIV. and his Viceroy, he commanded peace, and offered commerce and an alliance against the Iroquois; the soldiers of France would smooth the path between the Ochippewas and Quebec; would brush the pirate canoes from the rivers; would leave to the Five Nations no choice between tranquility and destruction. On the shores of the bay, to which the abundant fisheries attracted crowds, a chapel soon rose, and the mission of the Holy Spirit was founded.

Claude Allouez traveled by the Ottawa, Lake Nepissing and French river to the Georgian bay, and is supposed to have traversed the eastern shore of Lake Huron, as far south as the first Mesnard mission on that shore, and perhaps to the point which Nicolet suggested for a trading post, if not to the very site selected by Du Luth, twenty-one years later. In the "Jesuit Relations," 1667, the following references to this journey of Pere Allouez are made: "During the two years that Father Allouez has remained among the Indians, he has observed the customs of all the nations that he has seen, and carefully studied the means that may facilitate their conversion. There is employment for a good number of missionaries, but there is nothing for them to subsist upon; one part of the year they live upon the bark of trees, another part on pulverized fish bones, and the balance of the time on fish, or on Indian corn, which sometimes is very scarce, and sometimes sufficiently abundant. The Father has learned by experience that, the fatigues being great, the labors continual, and the nourishment light, a body even of bronze could not withstand it, consequently it is necessary to have at the missions men of courage and piety, to labor for the subsistence of the missionaries, either by cultivating the earth, by fishing, or in following the chase; who would construct lodgings and erect some chapels to excite the veneration of these people, who have never seen anything finer than their birch-bark cabins. With these views, the Father resolved to come to Quebec himself, and labor to carry these designs into execution. He arrived there on the 3d day of August, of the year 1667, and after remaining two days only, his diligence was so great that he was prepared to set out from Montreal with a score of canoes of savages, with whom he had come down, and who awaited him at that island with a great deal of impatience. His equipage was composed of seven persons: Father Louis Nicholas, to labor conjointly with him for the conversion of these people, and one of our brothers, with four men, to be employed at the stations in securing a subsistence for them. But it has pleased God that the success of this enterprise should not correspond with their good intentions, for when there was a question of entering the canoes, the savages became so ill-humored that the two Fathers only, with one of their men, could obtain places in them."

Marquette, during the year 1671, had gathered at Point St. Ignace the remnants of one branch of the Hurons. This station, for a long series of years, was considered the key to the unknown West. The time was now auspicious for the consummation of Marquette's grand project. The successful termination of Perrot's mission, and the general friendliness of the native tribes, rendered the contemplated expedition much less perilous. But it was not until 1673 that the intrepid and enthusiastic priest was finally ready to depart on his daring and perilous journey to lands never trod by white men. The Indians, who had gathered in large numbers to witness his departure, were astounded at the boldness of the proposed undertaking, and tried to discourage him, representing that the Indians of the Mississippi Valley were cruel and bloodthirsty, and would resent the instrusion of strangers upon their domain. The great river itself, they said, was the abode of terrible monsters, who could swallow both canoes and men. But Marquette was not to be diverted from his purpose by these fearful reports. He assured his dusky friends that he was ready to make any sacrifice, even to lay down his life for the sacred cause in which he was engaged. He prayed with them; and having implored the blessing of God upon his undertaking, on the thirteenth day of May, 1673, with Joliet and five Canadian-French voyagers, or boatmen, he left the mission on his daring journey. Ascending Green bay and Fox river, these bold and enthusiastic pioneers of religion and discovery proceeded until they reached a Miami and Kickapoo village, where Marquette was delighted to find "a beautiful cross planted in the middle of the town, ornamented with white skins, red girdles and bows and arrows, which these good people had offered to the Great Manitou, or God, to thank Him for the pity He had bestowed on them during the winter, in having given them abundant chase. This was the extreme point, beyond which the explorations of the French missionaries had not then extended. Here Marquette was instructed by his Indian hosts in the secret of a root that cures the bite of the venomous rattle-snake, drank mineral water with them, and was entertained with generous hospitality. He called together the principal men of the village, and informed them that his companion, Joliet, had been sent by the French Government of Canada to discover new countries, to be added to the dominion of France; but that he, himself, had been sent by the Most High God, to carry the glorious religion of the Cross; and assured his wondering hearers that on this mission he had no fear of death, to which he knew he would be exposed on his perilous journeys. Obtaining the services of two Miami guides, to conduct his little band to the Wisconsin river, he left the hospitable Indians on the 10th of June. Conducting them across the portage, their Indian guides returned to their village, and the little party descended the Wisconsin, to the great river which had so long been so anxiously looked for, and boldly floated down its unknown waters.

On the 25th of June, the explorers discovered indications of Indians on the west bank of the river and landed a little above the mouth of the river now known as Des Moines, and for the first time Europeans trod the soil of Iowa. Leaving the Canadians to guard the canoes, Marquette and Joliet boldly followed the trail into the interior for fourteen miles, to an Indian village situate on the banks of a river, and discovered two other villages, on the rising ground about half a league distant. Their visit, while it created much astonishment, did not seem to be entirely unexpected, for there was a tradition or prophecy among the Indians that white visitors were to come to them. They were, therefore, received with great respect and hospitality, and were cordially tendered the calumet, or pipe of peace. They were informed that this band was a part of the Illini nation and that their village was called Mon-in-gou-ma or Moingona, which was the name of the river on which it stood. This, from its similarity of sound, Marquette corrupted into Des Moines river. Here the voyagers remained six days, learning much of the manners and customs of their new friends. The new religion they boldly preached and the authority of the king of France they proclaimed were received without hostility or remonstrance by their savage entertainers. On their departure, they were accompanied to their canoes by the chiefs and hundreds of warriors. Marquette received from them the sacred calumet, the emblem of peace and safeguard among the nations, and re-embarked for the rest of his journey.

In 1682, La Salle descended the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico, and in the name of the King of France, took formal possession of all the immense region watered by the great river and its tributaries from its source to its mouth, and named it Louisiana, in honor of his master, Louis XIV. The river he called "Colbert," after the French Minister, and at its mouth erected a column and a cross bearing the inscription, in the French language, "Louis the Great, King of France and Navarre, Reigning April 9th, 1682."

At the close of the seventeenth century, France claimed, by right of discovery and occupancy, the whole valley of the Mississippi and its tributaries, including Texas, as far as the Rio del Norte.

In April, 1680, Rev. Louis Hennepin went down the Illinois and entered the Mississippi. His account, written in 1682, gives the story of his capture by the Sioux, and his rescue by Du Luth. In June, 1680, Du Luth repeated his visit to the Sioux nation. He traveled in a canoe down the Bois Brulé river. His story of this journey is as follows: "I entered the river, which empties eight leagues from the extremity of Lake Superior on the south side, when having cut some trees and broken about a hundred beaver dams, I reached the upper waters of the said river, and then I made a portage of half a league to reach a lake, the outlet of which fell into a very fine river, which took me down into the Mississippi. Being there I learned from eight cabins of Nadouecioux whom I met, that the Reverend Father Louis Hennepin, recollect, now at the convent of St. Germain, with two other Frenchmen, had been robbed and carried off as slaves for more than three hundred leagues by the Nadouecioux themselves. This intelligence surprised me so much, that without hesitating, I left two Frenchmen with these said eight cabins of Indians, as well as the goods which I had to make presents, and took one of the said Indians to whom I made a present to guide me with my interpreter and two Frenchmen to where the said Reverend Father Louis was, and as it was a good eighty leagues I proceeded in canoe two days and two nights, and the next day at ten o'clock in the morning I found him with about one thousand or eleven hundred souls. The want of respect which they showed to the said Reverend Father provoked me, and this I showed them, telling them that he was my brother, and I had him placed in my canoe to come with me into the villages of the Nadouecioux, whither I took him, and in which, a week after our arrival there, I caused a council to be convened, exposing the ill treatment which they had been guilty of, both to the said Reverend Father and to the other two Frenchmen who were with him, having robbed them and carried them off as slaves, and even taken the priestly vestments of the said Reverend Father. I had two calumets which they had formerly or once danced to, returned to them, on account of the insult which they had offered them, being what they hold most in esteem among them to appease matters, telling them that I did not take calumets from people who after they had seen me and received my peace presents, and been for a year always with Frenchmen, robbed them when they went to visit them. Each one in the council endeavored to throw the blame from himself, but their excuses did not prevent my telling the Reverend Father Louis that he would have to come with me towards the Outagamis, as he did, showing him that it would be to strike a blow at the French nation in a new discovery, to suffer an insult of this nature without manifesting resentment, although my design was to push on to the sea in a west northwesterly direction, which is that which is believed to be the Red sea [Gulf of California] when the Indians who had gone warring on that side gave salt to three Frenchmen whom I had sent exploring, and who brought me said salt, having reported to me that the Indians had told them that it was only twenty days' journey from where they were to find the great lake of which the waters were worthless to drink. This has made me believe that it would not be absolutely difficult to find it, if permission would be given to go there. However, I preferred to retrace my steps, manifesting to them the just indignation which I felt against them, rather than to remain after the violence which they had done to the Reverend Father and the two other Frenchmen who were with him, whom I put in my canoes and brought them back to Michelimakinak. * * * We could not sufficiently admire the extent of those vast countries, and the charming lands through which we passed, which lie all untilled. The cruel wars which these nations have one with another are the cause that they have not people enough to cultivate them. And the more bloody wars which have raged so long in all parts of Europe, have hindered the sending Christian colonies to settle them. However, I must needs say that the poorer sort of our countrymen would do well to think of it, and go and plant themselves in this fine country, where, for a little pains in cultivating the earth, they would live happier and subsist much better than they do here."

Following the voyage of Hennepin, was the one of Le Sueur, in 1683, from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi, ascending that river to the Sioux country in the region about St. Anthony. His subsequent establishment, said to have been in 1693, was at La Pointe. He was, at least, "a voyageur stationed at Chegoimegon" during that year. He continued to trade with the Sioux at intervals to the year 1702, from 1676 or 1677.

Nicholas Perrot, who, as the agent of St. Lusson, had collected the Green Bay tribes in 1671, to assemble at the congress holden at the Sault Ste. Marie, again made his appearance in the Winnebago country, this time in the year 1684. He was commissioned by the Government of New France to manage the fur trade from Green Bay westward. "I was sent to this bay," he writes, "charged with the commission to have chief command there, and to the most distant countries on the side of the west."

At Green Bay in Wisconsin, some Indians told him that they had visited countries toward the setting sun, where they obtained the blue and green stones suspended from their ears and noses, and that they saw horses and men like Frenchmen, probably the Spaniards of New Mexico. Proceeding to the portage between the Fox and Wisconsin, thirteen Hurons were met, who were bitterly opposed to the establishment of a post near the Sioux. After the Mississippi was reached, a party of Winnebagoes was employed to notify the tribes of Northern Iowa that the French had ascended the river, and wished to meet them. It was further agreed that prairie fires would be kindled from time to time, so that the Indians could follow the French. After entering Lake Pepin, near its mouth on the east side Perrot found a place suitable for a post, where there was wood. The stockade was built at the foot of a bluff, beyond which was a large prairie. A writer in 1700, who writes of Lake Pepin, makes the following statement: "To the right and left of its shores, there are also prairies. In that on the right on the bank of the lake, there is a fort which was built by Nicholas Perrot, whose name it yet bears." This was the first French post upon the Mississippi. Perrot, in 1685, prevented with much difficulty the capture of his post by an expedition of Foxes and their allies. He passed the winter of 1685–6 there, and then proceeded to Green Bay. A memento of his interest in the mission of St. Francis Xavier is to be seen in the shape of a silver "ostensorium," found in Wisconsin a few years ago. In 1686 he had been ordered by Denouville, the new governor, who did not approve of such distant enterprises, to return with all the Frenchmen in this region; which order he now obeyed. In 1687, he was again at Green Bay, being engaged to bring the Indians inhabiting its shores to the assistance of Denouville against the Iroquois. In 1688, Perrot set out from Montreal with presents and messages to the Indians of the upper Mississippi, after delivering which he returned to Lake Michigan, never again to visit the Mississippi valley.

On October 23, 1688, La Hontan and his party entered the Mississippi by way of the Puant and Ouisconsinc rivers. Their trip up the Missouri, and westward by Long river, is believed by many to be a fable; but it is certain that the adventurous baron did enter rivers which he believed to be the Missouri of Father Marquette's travels; and while traveling along some of the tributaries of the Mississippi, received such information from the Indians as enabled him to draw that chart whereon is pictured the great rivers which have their sources among the mountains of Montana. In his letter of December 13, 1688, he says:

"J'en partis le lendemain 13, et au bout de quatre jours je gagnai a la faveur du courant et de la rame, la Riviere des Missouris. Ensuite refoulant son courant, qui est pour le moins aussi rapide que celui du Missisipi l'etoit alors, J'arrivai le 18, au premier Village des Missouris." (I took leave of them next day, which was the 13th, and in four days' time, by the help of the current and our oars, made the river of the Missouris. This done, we run up against the stream of that river, which was at least as rapid as the Mississippi was at that time, and arrived on the 18th at the first village of the Missouris.)

In his letter of May 28, 1689, he states: "Two days after (January 9, 1689), the Casick came to see me, and brought with him four hundred of his own subjects and four Mozemlek savages, whom I took for Spaniards. My mistake was occasioned by the great difference between these two American nations; for the Mozemlek savages were clothed; they had a thick bushy beard, and their hair hung down under their ears. * * * These four slaves gave me a description of their country, which the Gnacsictares represented by way of a map upon a deer's skin. Their villages stand upon a river that springs out of a ridge of mountains, from which the Long river likewise derives its source, there being a great many brooks there, which, by a joint confluence, form the river. When the Gnacsictares have a mind to hunt wild beeves, they set out in pirogues. * * * The hunting of the wild bulls which cover all the valleys in summer, is sometimes the occasion of a cruel war. * * * The mountains I spoke of just now are six leagues broad, and so high that one must cast an infinity of windings before he can cross them. Bears and wild beasts are their only inhabitants."

"The Mozemlek nation," says La Hontan, in his letter of May 28, 1689, "is numerous and puissant. The four slaves of that country informed me that at the distance of one hundred and fifty leagues from the place where I then was, their principal river empties itself into a salt lake of three hundred leagues in circumference, the mouth of which is about two leagues broad: that the lower part of the river is adorned with six noble cities, surrounded with stone cemented with fat earth." Many of La Hontan's statements are questioned. Indeed, M. Boucher exposed to ridicule his pamphlets shortly after they were written, taking the ground that Indians and French trappers, who visited the lower Mississippi posts at intervals, agreed that no such water-courses as those shown on the baron's chart existed. As has been already stated, the nature of the information gives proof of being obtained from the Otchipwes, rather than from the Sioux, and consequently is less definite in dealing with the far West than if obtained from the river and mountain tribes.

In 1719, Philipe Francis Renault arrived in Illinois with two hundred miners and artisans. The war between France and Spain at this time rendered it extremely probable that the Mississippi valley might become the theater of Spanish hostilities against the French settlements. To prevent this, as well as to extend French claims, a chain of forts was begun, to keep open the connection between the mouth and the sources of the Mississippi. Fort Orleans, high up the Mississippi river, was erected as an outpost in 1720. The Mississippi scheme was at the zenith of its power and glory in January, 1720, but the gigantic bubble collapsed more suddenly than it had been inflated, and the company was declared hopelessly bankrupt in May following. France was impoverished by it, both private and public credit were overthrown, capitalists suddenly found themselves paupers, and labor was left without employment. The effect on the colony of Louisiana was disastrous. While this was going on in Lower Louisiana, the region about the lakes was the theater of Indian hostilities, rendering the passage from Canada to Louisiana extremely dangerous for many years. The English had not only extended their Indian trade into the vicinity of the French settlements, but through their friends, the Iroquois, had gained a marked ascendency over the Foxes, a fierce and powerful tribe, of Iroquois descent, whom they incited to hostilities against the French. The Foxes began their hostilities with the siege of Detroit, in 1712, a siege which they continued for nineteen consecutive days, and although the expedition resulted in diminishing their numbers and humbling their pride, yet it was not until after several successive campaigns, embodying the best military resources of New France, had been directed against them, that they were finally defeated, at the great battles of Butte des Morts, and on the Wisconsin river, and driven west in 1746. The company, having found that the cost of defending Louisiana exceeded the returns from its commerce, solicited leave to surrender the Mississippi wilderness to the home government. Accordingly, on the 10th of April, 1732, the jurisdiction and control over the commerce reverted to the crown of France. The company had held possession of Louisiana fourteen years. In 1735, Bienville returned to assume command for the King. A glance at a few of the old French settlements will show the progress made in portions of Louisiana during the early part of the eighteenth century. As early as 1705, traders and hunters had penetrated the fertile regions of the Wabash, and from this region, at that early date, fifteen thousand hides and skins had been collected and sent to Mobile for the European market.

In the year 1716, the French population on the Wabash kept up a lucrative commerce with Mobile by means of traders and voyagers. The Ohio river was comparatively unknown. In Illinois there were, in 1730, one hundred and forty French families and a number of traders.

In 1727, Sieur de la Pierriere with his expedition set out for the Mississippi, to establish a post in the country of the Sioux. With him was Father Guignas, who has left this account of his visit and passage through this region: "The Sioux convoy left the end of Montreal Island on the 16th of the month of June, last year, at eleven o'clock a.m. and reached Michilimackinac the 22d of the month of July. This post is about two hundred and fifty-one leagues from Montreal, almost due west, at forty-five degrees, forty-six minutes, north latitude. We spent the rest of the month at this post, in the hopes of receiving from day to day, some news from Montreal, and in the design of strengthening ourselves against the alleged extreme difficulties of getting a free passage through the Foxes. At last, seeing nothing, we set out on our march the first of the month of August, and after seventy-three leagues' quite pleasant sail along the northerly side of Lake Michigan, running to the southeast, we reached the bay on the eighth of the same month, at five and one half p.m. This post is at forty-four degrees, forty-three minutes, north latitude. We stopped there two days, and on the eleventh, in the morning, we embarked in a very great impatience to reach the Foxes. On the third day after our departure from the bay, quite late in the afternoon, in fact, somewhat in the night, the chiefs of the Puants came out three leagues from their village to meet the French, with their peace calumets and some bear meat as a refreshment, and the next day we were received by that small nation amid several discharges of a few guns, and amid great demonstrations of joy. They asked us with so good a grace to do them the honor to stay some time with them, that we granted them the rest of the day from noon, and the following day. There may be in all in this village, sixty to eighty men, but all men and women of very tall stature, and well made. They are on the bank of a very pretty little lake, in a most agreeable spot for its situation and the goodness of the soil, nineteen leagues from the bay and eight leagues from the Foxes." Rev. Pierre Michel Guignas came to Canada in 1715, and went as missionary to the Sioux in 1728, but was soon obliged to abandon his mission when the Foxes defeated the French. On attempting to reach Illinois, he fell into the hands of the Kickapoos and Mascoutens, in October, 1728, and remained five months in captivity among those people, during which time he was condemned to be burned, but was saved by an old man who adopted him. Having induced the Indians to make peace, he was conducted to the Illinois country, where he was left on parole until November, 1729, when he was taken back by his late masters. (Liste Chronologique, No. 425.)

Exploration and Survey of Montana.—The earliest exploration of Montana, west of the Main range of mountains, must be credited to the Spaniards of Mexico; while that of the region east of that range is undoubtedly due to the French. To deal historically with the Spanish exploration is impossible, since documents bearing on the subject are so vague as to prohibit a precise statement. It may be conceded, however, that La Hontan, in his letter of May 28, 1689, refers to the remnant of one of those Spanish exploratory parties; for the four Mozemleks cannot be other than members of such a party, who by preference or by chance made their homes in the northern wilderness, and, following their penchant for travel, came so far east as to fall into the hands of the Mississippi Indians. La Hontan, however careless in his topography and recital of descriptions given him by Indians, is confident of having met those bearded captives, and gives his word that to him they seemed to be Spaniards. In the early history of this territory references are made to this subject, and, as the question is more fully discussed in that section of the work, the Spaniard surrenders his place here to the more energetic and learned Frenchman.

There can be little doubt regarding the effect of La Hontan's letters in 1688. Had he located the Missouri river properly, and refrained from making a few brief statements about his trip up Long river, the belief would be firmly fixed that he was the first explorer of the Missouri region. The letters of this Baron, however, drew the attention of the French to the country. Pere Bobe of Versailles was among the first to learn that the writer was never beyond the Mississippi valley; Pere Guignas was certain that the Baron was far astray in his geography, while a number of lay scholars and antiquaries were emphatic in their appeals for the better exploration of the way to the Pacific ocean. In a letter of Pere Bobe, dated at Versailles, March 15, 1716, and addressed to M. De Lisle, Academie des Sciences, he assures the geographer that among the Sioux are a number of French traders who know the Mississippi region well, and further are acquainted with a river which rises in the mountains and flows to the Pacific ocean. The energy of this priest was soon recognized; for within the following year Fort Du Luth was rebuilt and garrisoned, and Fort de la Noue established in the heart of the Sioux country.

From 1717 forward many adventurous Frenchmen extended their journeys westward, among whom were traders; but owing to their bourgeois character mention of them has not been made in the letters of missionary fathers or military officers. In 1737–8 the era of exploratory enterprise was revived in France by Jean Frederick Philippearin, better known as the Count de Maurepas. He was the grandson of Chancellor de Pontchartrain, was born in 1701, and created a Knight of Malta in 1719. He commenced the administration of the Secretary of State's office in 1725, when he became the patron of men of science. He sent expeditions to the equator, north pole, and to imperfectly known coasts and countries, while he dispatched the famous Jussien to Peru to inquire into the botany of that region. At his desire, M. de la Verandrye was dispatched, in 1738, on an overland journey to the Pacific ocean, and to this able explorer we have to look for the first authentic history of the region. (Biographie Universelle.) According to the Parisian Documents, Verandrye was dispatched to the Shining mountains, by order of the Government, which is precisely the same order claimed in Maurepas' biography as it was issued through him while Secretary of State. The traveler, having reached Canada, set out with his party from Montreal; passed through Lake Superior, and, proceeding as near due west as he could, went along the foot of Lake Winnipeg, ascended the river of the Assiniboines, and directed his course toward the Rocky mountains, for several days, over large tracts of land free from timber, but covered with very tall grass. In some places, where no European had ever been, were found great pillars of stone leaning upon each other. The pillars consisted of one single stone each, and sometimes such stones were found laid one upon another, and, as it were, formed into a wall. At one place in the prairie, about nine hundred leagues west of Montreal, the party discovered a large stone, like a pillar, and in it a smaller stone about a foot long and four or five inches broad, covered on both sides with unknown characters. This curiosity was separated from the pillar and transmitted to the Secretary of State at Paris, where missionaries conversant with the eastern languages affirmed that the inscription was in Tartarean characters. Without reaching the Main Range, Verandrye was obliged to abandon the expedition, his party having got mixed up in a war which the Indians of those parts were waging against each other. (Garneau, 11, 126, and Kalm, 111, 123.) The editor of the New York Documents concludes from his analysis of many letters and official documents bearing on this expedition, that the country then explored was north and west of Minnesota. "Three hundred miles west of Lake Winnipeg, on the Assiniboine," he states, they erected Fort la Reine; three others were built further west, the most distant of which stood on the bank of the Paskoyac, a fork of the Shekatchiac. Against this opinion are very many references to the waters of the Upper Missouri, which leave little doubt regarding the actual success of the Verandrye party in reaching many of the valleys of Montana. Kalm, the Swedish scholar, who met the explorer in Canada, in 1749, agrees with Garneau that the party did not cross the Main Range: but both are quite willing to concede to its members the honor of entering the valleys between the Great Belt and Main Range. Granville Stuart and his fellow members of the Historical Society agree in the belief that the explorers left Fort la Reine, on the Assiniboine river, went up Mouse river in a southerly direction, and then crossed over to the Missouri a little below where is now Fort Berthold. They then ascended the Missouri as far as the Gates of the Mountains, where the river breaks through the Belt Range (near Helena, Montana), and ascended those mountains on the 1st of January, 1743. Thence they passed up Deep or Smith's river, and over to the head of the Musselshell, and thence south to the Yellowstone, crossing which they went up Pryor's Fork, and through Prior's Gap, to Stinking river, which they crossed, and, continuing on south, came among the Snake Indians, on Wind river, who told them that on the south side of the Wind River mountains was the river Karoskiou (Kanaraogwa, in the modern Snake tongue), now called Green river. The Snakes also told them they would be killed if they tried to go any farther south, because war parties of the Sans Arcs band of Sioux, hereditary enemies of the Snakes, were always watching about the South pass, to kill and plunder them as they passed to and from Green river, where lived another band of the Snake tribe. Here the party turned back, and, "on the 19th of May, 1744, they had returned to the Upper Missouri, and in the Petite Cerise (choke cherry) country, they planted on an eminence a leaden plate of the arms of France, and raised a monument of stones, which they called Beauharnois." This proves that they were about a year making this southern trip; but whether they returned by the way they went or not, cannot be determined, as there is no tribe known as the "Choke Cherries" now in that region, and the fruit itself grows all over the Upper Missouri country. After erecting the monument, they doubtless descended the Missouri to where they first struck it on their outward journey, and thence returned by the way of Mouse river and the Assiniboine, to the Lake of the Woods, where they arrived on the 2d of July, 1744. (Contributions, 316, 1876.)

The Jesuit, Pere Coquard, or Coquillard, was among the leading spirits of the expedition of 1738, and certainly must claim the honor of being the first Christian minister who ever visited the region now known as Montana. To him many of the records of those olden times must be credited. Neither profuse in his laudations nor severe in his criticisms he observes plain statement of fact. He was one of the oldest friends of Verandrye, and as an associate in the work of the expedition, had opportunities for observation denied even to the chief of the party. For this reason his statements must all be accepted, and the following dates and events taken in history:—that Fort la Reine on the Assiniboine was erected October 3, 1738; that the country of the Mandans was explored in 1742 by Verandrye, junior, and the Chevalier Verandrye, sons of the Sieur de la Verandrye; that the Belt mountains were reached January 1, 1743; that the monument bearing the arms of France was erected in the upper Missouri country, May 12, 1744; and that the return of the party to the post at the Lake of the Woods was accomplished July 2, 1744. Sieur de la Verandrye died in Canada, December 6, 1749; Chevalier Verandrye was lost in the wreck of the Auguste, on the ocean, November, 1761; the Sieur Jules Verandrye and Pere Coquard returned to France. From their writings Carver and other travelers built up many stories of discovery. For some years after the explorations of 1738–1744, the country was abandoned by the military, and a number of small French traders found ready access to the hearts of the Indian inhabitants. In 1752–3, two expeditions were sent west by Governor Jonquierre.—Lamarque de Marin in charge of the Missouri division and Jacques Lagardeur de St. Pierre and Boucher de Niverville in command of the Saskatchewan division. The labors of those officers were not attended with much success, but the results were beneficial; for, in both instances, men of each command remained in the country. One party succeeded in establishing Fort Jonquierre; another, Fort Bourbon, and a third party erected a few temporary posts along the Missouri.

Pike's Explorations.—Lieutenant Pike is said to have discovered the sources of the Pierre-jaun (Yellowstone), November 27, 1805. He supposed this stream was the Red river, but acknowledged his error in his account. Major Long, in his map of 1820, gives this stream, called the Yellowstone by Pike, as the Lewis' Fork of the Columbia, while James, who wrote an account of Long's expedition, named it the North Fork of the Platte river. Pike was a General in the war of 1812 with Great Britain. He was killed by a stone cast from a mine, which the English sprung as they abandoned a fort from which his command had forced them. He was the first native white American to cross the divide between the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific.

Lewis and Clarke's Explorations.—Sixty-five years after the first French explorers set out on their journey to the Rocky mountains, the Fathers of the Revolution began to take measures for securing control of the Far West, which was then to them an unknown wilderness. In January, 1803, the President's message to Congress was supplemented by a confidential letter to members, setting forth the necessity of claiming the far northwestern territory. Acting on the wise suggestions offered by Jefferson an act was passed and approved, providing for the exploration of the Rocky mountain country and also of a highway to the Pacific. Under the authority of this act, the following letter was issued to Meriwether Lewis, Esquire, Captain of the First regiment of infantry of the United States of America:

"Your situation as secretary of the President of the United States has made you acquainted with the objects of my confidential message of January 18, 1803, to the Legislature; you have seen the act they passed, which, though expressed in general terms, was meant to sanction those objects, and you are appointed to carry them into execution. Instruments for ascertaining, by celestial observations, the geography of the country through which you will pass, have already been provided. Light articles for barter and trade among the Indians, arms for your attendants, say for from ten to twelve men, boats, tents, and other traveling apparatus, with ammunition, medicine, surgical instruments and provisions, you will have prepared, with such aids as the Secretary of War can yield in his department; and from him also you will receive authority to engage among our troops, by volunteer agreement, the number of attendants above mentioned; over whom you, as their commanding officer, are invested with all the powers the laws give in such a case. The object of your mission is to explore the Missouri river, and such principal streams of it, as, by its course and communication with the waters of the Pacific ocean, whether the Columbia, Oregon, Colorado, or any other river, may offer the most direct and practicable water communication across the continent, for the purposes of commerce. The interesting points of the portage between the heads of the Missouri, and of the water offering the best communication with the Pacific ocean, should also be fixed by observation; and the course of that water to the ocean, in the same manner as that of the Missouri. Your observations are to be taken with great pains and accuracy; to be entered distinctly and intelligibly for others as well as yourself; to comprehend all the elements necessary, with the aid of the usual tables, to fix the latitude and longitude of the places at which they were taken; and are to be rendered to the War Office, for the purpose of having the calculations made concurrently by proper persons within the United States. Several copies of these, as well as of your other notes, should be made at leisure times, and put into the care of the most trustworthy of your attendants to guard, by multiplying them, against the accidental losses to which they will be exposed. A further guard would be, that one of these copies be on the cuticular membranes of the paper-birch, as less liable to injury from damp than common paper. The commerce which may be carried on with the people inhabiting the line you will pursue, renders a knowledge of those people important. You will therefore endeavor to make yourself acquainted, so far as a diligent pursuit of your journey will admit, with the names of the nations and their numbers; the extent and limits of their possessions; their relations with other tribes or nations; their language, traditions, monuments; their ordinary occupations in agriculture, fishing, hunting, war, arts, and the implements for these; their food, clothing and domestic accommodations; the diseases prevalent among them, and the remedies they use; moral and physical circumstances which distinguish them from the tribes we know; peculiarities in their laws, customs and dispositions; and articles of commerce they may need or furnish, and to what extent. And, considering the interest which every nation has in extending and strengthening the authority of reason and justice among the people around them, it will be useful to acquire what knowledge you can of the state of morality, religion, and information among them; as it may better enable those who may endeavor to civilize and instruct them, to adopt their measures to the existing notions and practices of those on whom they are to operate. Other objects worthy of notice will be—the soil and surface of the country, its growth and vegetable productions, especially those not of the United States; the animals of the country generally, and especially those not known in the United States; the remains and accounts of any which may be deemed rare or extinct; the mineral productions of every kind, but more particularly metals, lime-stone, pit-coal and saltpetre; salines and mineral waters, noting the temperature of the last, and such circumstances as may indicate their character; volcanic appearances; climate, as characterized by the thermometer, by the proportion of rainy, cloudy and clear days; by lightning, hail, snow, ice; by the access and recess of frost; by the winds prevailing at different seasons; the dates at which particular plants put forth, or lose their flower or leaf; times of appearance of particular birds, reptiles or insects. Although your route will be along the channel of the Missouri, yet you will endeavor to inform yourself, by inquiry, of the character and extent of the country watered by its branches, and especially on its southern side. The North river, or Rio Bravo, which runs into the Gulf of Mexico, and the North river, or Rio Colorado, which runs into the Gulf of California, are understood to be the principal streams heading opposite to the waters of the Missouri, and running southwardly. Whether the dividing lines between the Missouri and them are mountains or flat lands, what are their distance from the Missouri, the character of the intermediate country, and the people inhabiting it, are worthy of particular inquiry. The northern waters of the Missouri are less to be inquired after, because they have been ascertained to a considerable extent, and are still in the course of ascertainment by English traders and travelers; but if you can learn anything certain of the most northern source of the Mississippi, and of its position relatively to the Lake of the Woods, it will be interesting to us. Some accounts, too, of the Canadian traders from the Mississippi, at the mouth of the Ouisconsinc to where it strikes the Missouri, and of the soil and rivers in its course. In all your intercourse with the natives, treat them in the most friendly and conciliatory manner which their own conduct will admit; allay all jealousies as to the object of your journey, satisfy them of its innocence; make them acquainted with the position, extent, character, peaceable and commercial disposition of the United States; of our wish to be neighborly and friendly, and useful to them, and of our dispositions to a commercial intercourse with them; confer with them on points most convenient as useful emporium, and the articles of most desirable interchange for them and us. If a few of their influential chiefs, within a practicable distance, wish to visit us, arrange such a visit with them, and furnish them with authority to call on our officers on their entering the United States to have them conveyed to this place at the public expense. If any of them should wish to have some of their young people brought up with us, and taught such arts as may be useful to them, we will receive, instruct, and take care of them. Such a mission, whether of influential chiefs or of young people, would give security to your own party.

"Carry with you some matter of the kine-pox; inform those of them with whom you may be of its efficacy as a preservative from the small-pox, and instruct and encourage them in the use of it. This may be especially done wherever you may winter. As it is impossible for us to see in what manner you will be received by those people, whether with hospitality or hostility, so it is impossible to prescribe the exact degree of perseverance with which you are to pursue your journey. We value too much the lives of citizens to offer them to probable destruction. Your numbers will be sufficient to secure you against the unauthorized opposition of individuals, or of small parties; but if a superior force, authorized, or not authorized, by a nation, should be arrayed against your further passage, and inflexibly determine to arrest it, you must decline its further pursuit and return. In the loss of yourselves we should lose also the information you have acquired. By returning safely with that, you may enable us to renew the essay with better calculated means. To your own discretion, therefore, must be left the degree of danger you may risk, and the point at which you should decline, only saying, we wish you to err on the side of your safety, and to bring back your party safe, even if it be with less information. As far up the Missouri as the white settlements extend, an intercourse will probably be found to exist between them and the Spanish posts of Saint Louis opposite Cahokia or Saint Genevieve opposite Kaskaskia. From still further up the river the traders may furnish a conveyance for letters. Beyond that you may perhaps be able to engage Indians to bring letters for the government to Cahokia or Kaskaskia, on promising that they shall receive such special compensation as you shall have stipulated with them. Avail yourself of these means to communicate to us, at seasonable intervals, a copy of your journal, notes and observations of every kind, putting into cypher whatever might do injury if betrayed. Should you reach the Pacific ocean, inform yourself of the circumstances which may decide whether the furs of those parts may not be collected as advantageously at the head of the Missouri (convenient as is supposed to the waters of the Colorado and Oregon or Columbia) as at Nootka Sound, or any other point of that coast; and that trade be consequently conducted through the Missouri and United States more beneficially than by the circumnavigation now practiced. On your arrival on that coast, endeavor to learn if there be any port within your reach frequented by the sea vessels of any nation, and to send two of your trusty people back by sea, in such way as shall appear practicable, with a copy of your notes; and should you be of opinion that the return of your party by the way they went will be eminently dangerous, then ship the whole, and return by sea, by the way either of Cape Horn, or the Cape of Good Hope, as you shall be able. As you will be without money, clothes, or provisions, you must endeavor to use the credit of the United States to obtain them; for which purpose open letters of credit shall be furnished you, authorizing you to draw on the Executive of the United States, or any of its officers, in any part of the world, in which drafts can be disposed of, and to apply with our recommendations to the consuls, agents, merchants, or citizens of any nation with which we have intercourse, assuring them, in our name, that any aids they may furnish you shall be honorably paid, and on demand. Our consuls, Thomas Hewes, at Batavia, in Java; William Buchanan, in the Isles of France and Bourbon; and John Elmslie, at the Cape of Good Hope, will be able to supply your necessities, by drafts on us.

"Should you find it safe to return by the way you go, after sending two of your party round by sea, or with your whole party, if no conveyance by sea can be found, do so; making such observations on your return as may serve to supply, correct, or confirm those made on your outward journey. On re-entering the United States and reaching a place of safety, discharge any of your attendants who may desire and deserve it, procuring for them immediate payment of all arrears of pay and clothing which may have accrued since their departure, and assure them that they shall be recommended to the liberality of the legislature for the grant of a soldier's portion of land each, as proposed in my message to Congress, and repair yourself, with your papers, to the seat of government. To provide, on the accident of your death, against anarchy, dispersion, and the consequent danger to your party, and total failure of the enterprise, you are hereby authorized, by any instrument signed and written in your own hand, to name the person among them who shall succeed to the command on your decease, and by like instruments to change the nomination from time to time, as further experience of the characters accompanying you shall point out superior fitness; and all the powers and authorities given to yourself are, in the event of your death, transferred to, and vested in the successor so named, with further power to him and his successors, in like manner to name each his successor, who, on the death of his predecessor, shall be invested with all the powers and authorities given to yourself. Given under my hand at the City of Washington, this twentieth day of June, 1803. THOMAS JEFFERSON, President of the United States of America."

Acting under these orders, Captains Lewis and Clarke, with their command, set out from St. Louis, May 12, 1804, the anniversary of raising the Beauharnois monument, by Verandrye, and from the mouth of the Missouri, below Alton, May 14, 1804. The party consisted of nine men from Kentucky, fourteen soldiers of the United States army, who volunteered their services, two French watermen, an interpreter and hunter, and a black servant named York, belonging to Captain Clarke. All these, except the last two, were enlisted to serve as privates during the expedition, and three sergeants were appointed from among them by the captains. The trip up the Missouri was slow in the extreme, so much so that the travelers were forced to winter among the Mandans, where they erected a post, and where Sergeant Charles Floyd died August 20, 1804. There they passed the winter in abject misery, until the rivers cleared of ice, in April, 1805. On the seventh of that month Gravelines, as captain of the barge, led two fellow Frenchmen and seven United States soldiers down to his rude ship, and all embarked for St. Louis, doubtless well pleased to escape another term of punishment such as the one which they survived. They reported at St. Louis within thirty days, with letters from the main party and presents from the Indians. Captain Meriwether Lewis, in his travels (London, 1809), says: "While we were at Fort Mandan, the Sioux robbed several of our party, * * * and murdered several of the Mandan tribe in cold blood, without provocation, while reposing on the bosom of friendship. On hearing of this massacre, Captain Clarke and the greater part of us volunteered to avenge the murder, but were deterred by not receiving succor from the Mandan warriors, who declared to avenge the outrage committed upon them. * * * Soon after this massacre, we received authentic intelligence that the Sioux had it in contemplation to murder us in the spring; but were prevented from making the attack by our threatening to spread the small-pox, with all its horrors, among them. The same hour which witnessed the departure of Gravelines for St. Louis, also saw the main division leave Fort Mandan for the Pacific in two pirogues and six canoes. This division comprised thirty-three persons, the names of whom are given in the following roster: Captain Meriwether Lewis, U. S. A., Captain William Clarke, U. S. A., Sergeants John Ordway, Nathaniel Byor and Patrick Gass, Privates William Bratton, John Colter, John Collins, Peter Cruzatte, Robert Frazier, Reuben Fields, Joseph Fields, George Gibson, Silas Goodrich, Hugh Hall, Thomas P. Howard, Jean Baptiste Lapage, Francis Labiche, Hugh McNeal, John Potts, John Shields, George Shannon, John B. Thompson, William Werner, Alexander Willard, Richard Windsor, Joseph Whitehouse, Peter Wiser, the negro servant York, the two interpreters, George Drewyer and Toussaint Chaboneau, and the latter's wife, Sacajawea, with her papoose. The story of the journeyings of this party is thus graphically related by Major Walker, in his paper on early explorations published in 1879: Pursuing their journey, and reaching the Summit of the Rocky mountains, beyond the Three Thousand Mile Island, on the 12th of August, 1805, where, leaving the hidden sources of the Missouri which had never yet been seen by civilized man, and following a descent of three quarters of a mile to the westward, they reached a handsome, bold creek of cold, clear water, where they stopped to taste for the first time the waters of the Columbia. Pursuing their tedious way on foot, transporting their goods on Indian pack-horses, at times so scarce of food as to be obliged to kill horses for subsistence and to purchase Indian dogs to eat, they reached the Columbia river on the 15th of September, and on the 7th of November they enjoyed for the first time the delightful prospect of the Pacific ocean. Wintering some few miles south of the mouth of the Columbia river, among the Clatsop Indians, they on the 23d of March, 1806, began their return, and recrossing the mountains on July 3d, the party divided, Captain Lewis going northward to strike the waters of the Marias, and Captain Clarke, with fifteen men and fifty horses, set off to the southeast and down to the forks of the Jefferson, where the boats and merchandise had been deposited the year before. Captain Clarke's party arriving by boats and on horseback at the Three Forks of the Missouri, this party again divided, and Sergeant Ordway and men set out in six canoes to descend the Missouri, while Captain Clarke and ten men, and the wife and child of Chaboneau, proceeded by land with fifty horses to the Yellowstone river. The distance traveled by Captain Clarke from the Three Forks of the Missouri to the Yellowstone river being forty-eight miles. Captain Lewis, being joined by Sergeant Ordway's party in five canoes and the white pirogue on the 28th of July, 1806, and turning loose all their horses, embarked on the river, and proceeding down the Missouri formed a junction on the 12th day of August, thirty miles below the mouth of the Yellowstone with Captain Clarke and party, who had come down that river. The whole command being once more all together, proceeded down the Missouri, arriving at St. Louis on the 23d of September, 1806."

Colter did not return to St. Louis with his party. John Potts was killed by the Indians in the manner described in Colter's reminiscences, while Colter himself had such a very narrow escape as to lead him to wish he had met the same fate. Dixon, who is mentioned in the reminiscences, was not attached to the expedition, nor is it known that he knew anything of the explorers beyond what he learned from Colter. He was undoubtedly the first white American who can be called a settler in what now constitutes Montana.

In Topping's Chronicles it is stated that on the way down the Yellowstone, Clarke named Shields river, while Boulder and Big Timber, which come in opposite one another, was called by Clarke Rivers Across. At the mouth of Rose river (now Stillwater) the Crows, who had given them no trouble before, stole twenty-four of their horses, leaving them but fifteen. The party halted here for a few days and built canoes. Sergeant Pryor and five men were left to take the remaining horses down to the mouth of the river, overland, the main party, with Clarke, going in the canoes. Near the mouth of Tongue river the boats had to lie over for an hour to let a band of buffalo, which were crossing the river, pass. Clarke's party arrived at the mouth of the Yellowstone August 3, 1806, without further adventure. The party that were left behind under Sergeant Pryor, was followed by the Crows, and just above Pompey's Pillar had the remainder of the horses stolen by these Indians. The party made bull boats (a willow frame in the shape of a huge basket and covered with green buffalo hides) in which they went down the river safely and overtook the other parties about one hundred miles below the mouth of the Yellowstone. One of the men with Clarke, named Colter, left the party near where Yankton is now located, to go with some trappers. The next year, 1807, while on a beaver-trapping expedition, he went up the Yellowstone river to the head of the lake (which he called Eustis) then crossed the range and went down Stinkingwater to the prairie, then crossed over to Clarke's Fork and down it to the Yellowstone. He kept no record of his trip, but his story as told to Bonneville and other fur traders, would be accepted to-day as quite a correct description of the country.

From the journal of Patrick Gass, the following statement is taken of the distance in miles to the farthest point of discovery on the Pacific ocean from the point where the canoes were deposited, near the head of the Missouri river:

Head of Missouri from its mouth	3,096	To great falls of the Columbia	6
Place of deposit to head spring	24	To the Short Narrows	3
To first fork of the Shoshone river	14	To the Long Narrows	3
To first large fork down the river	18	To the mouth of Cataract river, north side	23
To forks of road at mouth of Tour creek	14	To Grand Shoot, or rapids	42
To Fishing creek, after leaving the river	23	To Last Rapids, or Strawberry Island	6
To Flathead, or Clarke's river at Fish camp	41	To mouth of Quicksand river, south side	26
To mouth of Traveler's-rest creek	76	To Shallow bay at salt water	136
To foot of great range of mountains, east side	12	To Blustry Pto. on north side	13
To foot of great range of mountains, west side	180	To point, open slope below encampment	3
To Flathead village on a plain	3	To Chin-Oak river, at bottom of Haley's bay	12
To the Kooskooske river	18	To Cape Disappointment on Western ocean	13
To the canoe camp at the forks	6	To Captain Clarke's tour northwest along coast	10
To the Kimooenem	60
To the great Columbia by Lewis' river	140	Total number of miles	4,133
To the mouth of the Shoshone, or Snake	162

In Bradbury's "Sketches of the Northwest" (London, 1812), the writer claims that Colter came to St. Louis in May, 1810, in a small canoe from the head-waters of the Missouri, a distance of three thousand miles, which he traversed in thirty days. "I saw him on his arrival," says Bradbury, "and received from him an account of his adventures, after he had separated from Lewis and Clarke's party; one of these I shall relate. On the arrival of the party on the head-waters of the Missouri, Colter, observing an appearance of an abundance of beaver being there, got permission to remain and hunt for some time, which he did, in company with a man named Dixon, who had traversed the immense tract of country from St. Louis to the head-waters of the Missouri alone. Soon after he separated from Dixon, and trapped in company with a hunter named Potts; and, aware of the hostility of the Blackfeet Indians, one of whom had been killed by Lewis, they set their traps at night, and took them up early in the morning, remaining concealed during the day. They were examining their traps early one morning, on a creek about six miles from that branch of the Missouri called Jefferson's Fork, and were ascending in a canoe, when they suddenly heard a great noise, resembling the trampling of animals, but they could not ascertain the fact, as the high perpendicular banks on each side of the river impeded their view. Colter immediately pronounced it to be occasioned by Indians, and advised an instant retreat, but was accused of cowardice by Potts, who insisted that the noise was caused by buffalos, and they proceeded on. In a few minutes their doubts were removed by a party of five hundred or six hundred Indians presenting themselves, who beckoned them to come ashore. As retreat was now impossible, Colter turned the head of his canoe to the shore; and, at the moment of its touching, an Indian seized the rifle belonging to Potts; but Colter immediately re-took it, and handed it to Potts, who remained in the canoe, and, on receiving it, pushed off into the river. He had scarcely quitted the shore, when an arrow was shot at him, and he cried out: 'Colter, I am wounded!' Colter remonstrated with him on the folly of attempting to escape, and urged him to come ashore. Instead of complying, he instantly leveled his rifle at an Indian, and shot him dead on the spot. This conduct may appear to be an act of madness; but it was doubtless the effect of sudden and sound reasoning; for, if taken alive, he must have expected to be tortured to death, according to their custom. He was instantly pierced with arrows so numerous, that, to use the language of Colter, 'he was made a riddle of.' They now seized Colter, stripped him entirely naked, and began to consult on the manner in which he should be put to death. They were first inclined to set him up as a mark to shoot at; but the chief interfered, and, seizing him by the shoulder, asked him if he could run fast. Colter, who had been some time among the Keekatsa or Crow Indians, had, in a considerable degree, acquired the Blackfeet language, and was also well acquainted with Indian customs. He knew that he had now to run for his life, with the dreadful odds of five hundred or six hundred against him, and those armed Indians; therefore, he cunningly replied that he was a bad runner, although he was considered by the hunters as remarkably swift. The chief now commanded the party to remain stationary, and led Colter out upon the prairie three hundred or four hundred yards, and released him, bidding him to save himself if he could. At that instant the horrid warwhoop sounded in the ears of poor Colter, who, urged by hope, ran at a speed which surprised himself. He proceeded toward the Jefferson Fork, having to cross a plain over six miles in width, abounding with the prickly pear, on which he was every instant treading with his naked feet. He ran nearly half-way across the plain before he ventured to look over his shoulder, when he perceived that the Indians were very much scattered, and that he had gained ground to a considerable distance from the main body; but one Indian, who carried a spear, was much before all the rest, and not more than a hundred yards from him. A faint gleam of hope now cheered the heart of Colter; he derived confidence from the belief that escape was within the bounds of possibility; but that confidence was nearly proving fatal to him, for he exerted himself to such a degree, that blood gushed from his nostrils, and soon almost covered the fore-part of his body. He had now arrived within a mile of the river, when he distinctly heard the appalling sound of footsteps behind him, and every instant expected to feel the spear of his pursuer. Again he turned his head and saw the savage not twenty yards from him. Determined, if possible, to avoid the expected blow, he suddenly stopped, turned round, and spread out his arms. The Indian, surprised at this sudden action, and perhaps at the bloody appearance of Colter, also attempted to stop; but, exhausted with running, he fell while endeavoring to throw his spear, which stuck in the ground and broke in his hand. Colter instantly snatched up the pointed part, with which he pinned him to the earth, and then continued his flight. The foremost of the Indians, on arriving at the place, stopped till others came up to join him, when they set up a hideous yell. Every moment of this time was improved by Colter, who, though fainting and exhausted, succeeded in gaining the skirting of the cottonwood trees, on the borders of the fork, through which he ran, and plunged into the river. Fortunately for him, a little below this place was an island, against the upper point of which a raft of drift-timber had lodged. He dived under the raft, and, after several efforts, got his head above water among the trunks of the trees, covered over with smaller wood to the depth of several feet. Scarcely had he secured himself, when the Indians arrived on the river, screeching and yelling, as Colter expressed it, 'like so many devils.' They were frequently on the raft during the day, and were seen through the chinks by Colter, who was congratulating himself upon his escape, until the idea arose that they might set the raft on fire. In horrible suspense he remained until night, when, hearing no more of the Indians, he dived from under the raft, swam silently down the river a long distance, when he landed, and traveled all night. Although happy in having escaped from the Indians, his situation was still dreadful; he was completely naked under a burning sun; the soles of his feet were entirely filled with the thorns of the prickly pear; he was hungry, and had no means of killing game, although he saw abundance around him, and was at least seven days' journey from Lisa's fort, on the Big Horn branch of the Roché Juan river. Those were circumstances under which any man but an American hunter would have despaired. He arrived at the fort in seven days, having subsisted on a root much esteemed by the Indians of the Missouri, now known by naturalists as the psoralea esculenta."

Captain William Clarke was the controlling spirit of the party. Accustomed as he was to take a part in performing a man's work on that fatiguing and dangerous journey, he never failed to observe the special duties assigned to him. His descriptions are numerous, one of which points out clearly the attention he bestowed on leading landmarks: "As soon as it had ceased we went on, and about four o'clock, after having made forty-nine miles, Captain Clarke landed to examine a very remarkable rock, situated in an extensive bottom on the right, about twenty-five paces from the shore. It is nearly two hundred paces in circumference and about two hundred feet high, accessible from the southeast only, the other sides consisting of perpendicular cliffs of a light-colored gritty stone. The soil on the summit is five or six feet deep, of a good quality, and covered with a short grass. The Indians have carved the figures of animals and other objects on the sides of the rock. From this height the eye ranges over a wide extent of variegated country. On the southwest were the Rocky mountains, covered with snow; there was a low mountain about fifty miles distant in a direction north, fifty-five degrees west, and at the distance of thirty-five miles the southern extremity of what are called Little Wolf mountains. The low grounds of the river extended nearly six miles to the southward, when they rose into plains reaching to the mountains and were watered by a large creek, while at some distance below a range of highlands, covered with pine, stretched on both sides of the river in a direction north and south. The north side of the river for some distance is here surrounded by jutty, romantic cliffs, succeeded by rugged hills, beyond which the plains are again open and extensive. The whole country was enlivened by herds of buffalo, elk, and wolves."

This notice was made July 25, 1806, and to-day—seventy-eight years after—will apply to this natural eccentricity, even as it did when the explorer wrote it. On the sandstone is carved "William Clarke, July 25, 1806."

Captain Meriwether Lewis was born near Charlottesville in 1774. At the age of eighteen years he relinquished his studies and engaged in farming; two years later he was engaged in the volunteer movement to suppress the whisky riots, and subsequently entered the regular army. From 1801 to 1803 he was Jefferson's private secretary. In the year 1803 he, with Captain William Clarke, was dispatched on the overland expedition to the Rocky mountains. On his return from this journey he was commissioned Governor of the Territory of Louisiana. He was subject to constitutional hypochondria, and while laboring under an attack of this disease, shot himself, in 1809, although this tragedy is said to be due to the protest of some notes which he signed ex officio.

Other Expeditions.—Captain Ezekiel Williams left St. Louis, Missouri, with twenty men, April 25, 1807, to conduct to the heart of the Mandan tribe their chief, Big White, who returned with Lewis and Clarke to Washington.

In 1810 the Wilson P. Hunt party, accompanied by John Bradbury, whom Hunt met at St. Louis, set out on an expedition to the Rocky mountains. Ramsey Crooks and Donald McKenzie were among the principals of this party. Bradbury, in his reference to this journey, says: "We encamped at the mouth of a creek called Boeuf, near the house of one Sullens. I inquired of Sullens for John Colter, who lived about a mile away. At daybreak, March 18, 1811, Colter came, and seemed to have a great inclination to accompany the expedition, but, having been lately married, he reluctantly took leave of us." Ramsey Crooks, speaking of the Hunt expedition of 1810–11, says Messrs. Hunt, Crooks, Miller, McClellan, McKenzie, Reed, Prevost, and about sixty men who left St. Louis in March, 1811, reached the Aricara village June 13, where they met some hunters who had been on the Columbia with Mr. Henry in 1810. On July 17, eighty horses were purchased from the Aricaras. After five days' journey the country of the Chiennes was reached, and there forty more horses were purchased. Steering west southwest, they passed the small branches of Big river, the Little Missouri, above its forks, and several tributary streams of Powder river, one of which they followed up. They found a band of the Absaroka or Crow nation encamped on its banks at the foot of the Big Horn mountain. In April, 1812, they reached the banks of the Columbia, met Stewart and company in May, he having been robbed by a band of villains near the falls a few days previous, and arrived at Astoria, May 10, 1812.

No sooner had the members returned to St. Louis than intrepid hunters and traders began to flock toward the Upper Missouri country. Already Dixon, Lisa, Colter, and a few others were to be found among the Crows. The Sublette and Bridger parties came in 1807. Emanuel Lisa built a temporary post on the Yellowstone, near Tullock's river, about 1807, and in 1809 built the house and stockade known as Lisa's Fort. Colter left the region after the erection of this post. In 1822 the Ashley Post was built on the Yellowstone; ten years later, in 1832, Fort Union was erected by Alexander Culbertson, and the era of trapping, hunting and trading was fully introduced.

Captain Bonneville's expedition of 1832–6 resulted in his personal review of the Yellowstone. He moved from Green river east to the head of the Sweet Water, and returned by the Wind River mountains, down the Wind river through the Little Horn Gap and Big Horn Range. His map of the sources of the Yellowstone is the best of all the original charts of that district. The memoirs of David Adams and autobiography of General Bonneville relate generally to matters outside Montana.

The memoir and map of Captain Hood, 1839, deal with descriptions of the head of the Missouri country, as given by William A. Walker, of Virginia, and Coates of Missouri, members of Captain Bonneville's party who remained in the mountains for six years after the return of Bonneville. Ten years later the Jesuit Fathers arrived.

According to Topping, Kit Carson, Jim Bridger, Krusse, Lou Anderson, and about twenty others on a prospecting trip, came to the Bannack camp on Green river late in the fall of 1849. They fixed up winter quarters and stayed with the Indians till spring; then went up the river, and, as soon as they could for snow, crossed the mountains to the Yellowstone and down it to the lake and falls; then across the divide to the Madison river. They saw the geysers of the lower basin, and named the river that drains them the Fire Hole. Vague reports of this wonderful country had been heard before. They had not been credited, but had been considered as trappers' tales (more imagination than fact). The report of this party made quite a stir in St. Louis, and a party organized there the next winter to explore this country, but from some now unknown cause did not start, and not till 1863 were the geysers again visited. The party went on down the Madison till out of the mountains, and then across the country to the Yellowstone, and they lay in camp on Shield's river for two months, and were not bothered by Indians till the last of November, when a party of Blackfeet tried to get away with their horses. The Indians succeeded in capturing eight head, but had two of their warriors killed in the act. Not wishing to be cleaned up entirely, the party packed up and went to the Platte via Wind river and disbanded. (Chronicles).

Maximilian, once Emperor of Mexico, in his Travels in North America (1843, p. 332) refers to the white beaver of the Yellowstone. "I saw," says the writer, "one beautifully spotted with white; yellowish-white and pure white are not unfrequently caught on the Yellowstone." His description of the Bad Lands, which begin north of the Missouri and extend to the Black Hills, is very precise, but like all such attempts to paint this remarkable series of conical hills, by words, it fails to convey a true idea of nature's eccentricities in this particular.

Explorations 1852–1854.—The era of government exploration was introduced in 1852. The party in Captain McClellan's engineers began at Fort Vancouver, examining the passes of the Cascade range, and thence eastward to join Governor Steven's party. Lieutenant A. J. Donelson's party examined the Missouri river from its mouth to the Yellowstone, where a junction was made with that under Governor Stevens. The fourth party, under Lieutenant R. Saxton, examined the country from Fort Walla-Walla to the Bitter Root valley where a depot was established. Governor Stevens' party set out from St. Paul June 8, while Lieutenants Mullan and Donelson left St. Louis May 21, and arrived at Fort Union July 3. Donelson's party left Fort Union August 9, over the American Fur Co.'s route to Milk river and united with the main party at Big Muddy river, whence all proceeded to Fort Benton. On September 3, A. W. Tinkham, with a few men, left the camp at Bear's Paw mountain to examine the Milk river country, thence proceeded to Three Buttes, thence to Maria's river and Benton. On September 11, J. M. Stanley left camp near Fort Benton to explore the country north to the Cypress mountains. Lieutenant Mullan's party left Fort Benton September 9, 1853, en route to the Flathead country, with a view of conducting the chiefs of the Selish nation to a council then proposed to be held at St. Mary's village. He crossed the Yellowstone above Shields river, which through mistake he called the Yellowstone. He met some Flatheads eighty miles south of the Yellowstone, and returning with them to the Yellowstone, and thence proceeded to St. Mary's mission via the Hell Gate Pass. Lieutenant Saxton left the Dalles July 18, 1853, with Lieutenants Robert McFeeley and Richard Arnold, together with forty-nine enlisted men, packers, etc. This party arrived at St. Mary's mission in August, established a depot there which was placed in charge of Lieutenant Arnold. Lieutenant McFeeley and nineteen men returned to the Dalles via the old Nez Perces trail September 2, while Lieutenant Saxton proceeded to Fort Benton by way of the Cadotte Pass, and on September 22, left en route for St. Louis in a flat boat. Governor Stevens left Fort Benton early in September for St. Mary's mission where he convoked the Indian council, and was followed by Lieutenant Donelson, in charge of the main party September 16. From St. Mary's the expedition pushed forward to Walla-Walla at which post the party arrived November 6, leaving Lieutenant Mullan at St Mary's to establish a winter post there. In November, 1853, he was joined by A. W. Tinkham's party from Benton, and in September, 1854, by Mr. Doty, both en route from Benton to Walla-Walla. During the winter of 1853–4 Lieutenant Mullan, assisted by artist Adams, made reconnoissances to Fort Hall, Idaho, and throughout what is now known as Western Montana. In March, 1854, he left the Bitter Root valley to explore a new route to Fort Benton. He traveled up the Hell Gate river to the Little Blackfoot, up that stream to its headwater, crossed the divide, which he called Hell Gate Pass, (called Mullan's Pass) north to the Missouri river, and thence to Fort Benton. He returned over the same route to Cantonment Stevens, and again left the Bitter Root valley April 14, 1854, to explore the country between the main divide and the Bitter Root range, as far as the Kootenay river. The route was along the Bitter Root, thence to Flathead river via the Jocko, thence via Flathead lake, up the Maple river and across the divide between it and the Kootenay river to this latter stream. The return route was down the Hot Spring creek to Flat river. Lieutenant Mullan left the Bitter Root valley September 19, 1854, passed up the Loo Loo Fork and through the Bitter Root mountains, and thence via Kooskooske to Fort Walla-Walla. In 1856 Lieutenant Mullan was appointed to superintend the building of the military road, and completed a section of it from the Dalles of Oregon to the St. Ignatius mission in the Coeur d'Alene, when the Indians suggested a vacation. This led to Colonel Steptoe's expedition of May, 1857, and also to his signal defeat. In 1858 the Indian killer, Colonel Wright, went forward to teach the savages obedience. The number of men, women and children who were shot, hanged or butchered by his command conveyed to the Indian mind the idea that Lieutenant Mullan should be allowed to proceed with the road, so that in 1859, his force resumed work, and carried the highway as far east as the Blackfoot cañon when he was called to other duties. The expedition sent out in 1856 to explore the Lower Yellowstone country, was under the direction of General G. K. Warren, United States Engineer corps, with Professor Hayden, geologist, and James Bridger, guide. It was one of the objects of General Warren, so soon as the survey of the Lower Yellowstone would be completed, to enter the Upper Yellowstone country. Accordingly he made plans for an exploration of that mysterious region to be carried out during the years 1859–60, but owing to his services being required in other districts, the command of his proposed expedition was conferred upon Colonel W. F. Reynolds, United States Engineer. The exploratory party, under Colonel W. F. Reynolds, United States Army, with Professor Hayden, geologist, set out to enter the park country in 1859; but owing to the difficulties presented by the Wind River mountains the main object of the expedition was not attained. Captain Reynolds says, that in 1860, the old mountaineer, Bridger, triumphantly declared, "I told you that you couldn't pass over that range; a crow can't fly over it without taking a supply of grub along." There Captain B. L. E. Bonneville was lost in 1833, and even until very recently the natural obstacles were considered so serious as to postpone the exploration of that country of wonders.

Gore's Expedition, 1854-6.—To the nomadic disposition of this eccentric Irishman is due his presence in Montana; to his extravagant hospitality he owed his popularity while fraternizing with the aborigines. However, in his expedition were men who failed not to take more interest in the country than curiosity alone could incite, and to one of them—Henry Bostwick, the writer of this paper, F. George Heldt, is indebted for his information; while to both of them history owes a debt.

One of the most considerable expeditions to the Rocky mountains undertaken by individual enterprise, was that of Sir George Gore. He was a resident of Sligo, in Ireland, and is now about sixty years of age, and in 1875 made a trip to the everglades of Florida. He seems to have had no other purpose in his western journey than pleasure, and to justify an intense, but somewhat eccentric curiosity. His retinue consisted of forty men, supplied with one hundred and twelve horses—some very fine ones—twelve yoke of cattle, fourteen dogs, six wagons, and twenty-one carts. The time occupied by this adventure was three years, during which time he lost but one man, who died at the mouth of Tongue river, during the winter of 1855-56. The party left St. Louis in 1854, and journeyed to Fort Laramie, on the North fork of the Platte river, where the first winter of 1854-55 was spent, and where the party shared the wild delights of the chase, which there, at that early time, almost rivaled in their profusion those of the valleys of the Yellowstone and its tributaries. The isolation of this fort at that early time excelled that of any other fort in the West, and the wild hunters, trappers, traders and adventurers who made that their headquarters and occasional rendezvous, were a motley group of characters worthy a winter's experience, and Sir George made them an interesting study. Here, too, he made the acquaintance of some of the Indian tribes upon whose hunting-grounds he was about to intrude; and what with the traders, the hunters, the soldiers, and the Indians, the winter sped pleasantly away. In the spring his animals were recuperated, and he added to his supplies and started north over an old trail of the trappers and Indians to the head-waters of the Powder river. Here, a half century ago, had been built a trading-post, long occupied by a Portuguese, and known as the "Portuguese Fort." But Sir George was seeking, not companionship, but the vast solitudes and fastnesses of the mountains, so he did not tarry, but pushed on down the Powder river, making frequent diversions to enjoy the delights of the chase. Arriving at the mouth of the Powder river, he turned up the Yellowstone to the mouth of Tongue river, where he tarried a long time. About eight miles above the mouth, and up the Tongue river, he built a fort, where the principal portion of his command wintered. But the grazing and game at the mouth of the Tongue river was fine, and here Sir George kept his stock, and himself remained. He was remote from man, indifferent to the issues of wars, the fall of empires, nor did he heed the thousand struggles which then taxed the energies of so many men. It was here that one of his men, called "Uno," died. When the grass had sufficiently grown, the party left their "happy hunting-grounds," and ascended the Tongue river. At the first considerable cañon, they came to a creek called "Wolf's Tooth" creek. Thence they went to the head of the Rose Bud river, to Wolf mountain, in search of an immense Crow camp of which they had heard. Finding the camp, they remained several days conversing with, if not enjoying the companionship of, several vagabond whites, who had become identified with the Crows. The party returned from Wolf mountain to the mouth of Tongue river. Here, Sir George and a portion of his party constructed two flat-boats, and sending his wagons and the greater portion of his command to Fort Union by land, he, with his crews, descended the Yellowstone in safety.

Arriving at Fort Union, then a trading-post of the American Fur Company, in charge of Major Alexander Culbertson, he agreed with the company for the construction of two Mackinaw boats, with which to descend the river, the company agreeing to take his stock, wagons, etc., at some stipulated price. When the boats were finished, there was a misunderstanding as to the terms of the bargain, and he fancied that, in his remoteness from man, the company was seeking to speculate upon his necessities. He seems to have been mercurial, wrathful, effervescent and reckless, and, heedless of the consequences, he would not stand the terms prescribed. He accordingly burned his wagons, and all the Indian goods and supplies not needed, in front of the fort, guarding the flames from the plunder of whites and Indians. It is said he was apprehensive that the members of the Fur Company might rescue from the flames the hot irons of his wagons and carts, and having guarded them until night came on, he threw them all into the Missouri river. His cattle and horses he sold to the vagabond hangers-on of the Indians there, or gave them away, and, with the two flat-boats he had built at the mouth of Tongue river, he proceeded with his party, now decimated by mutual consent, to Fort Berthold. Here he wintered, an Indian chief, known as the Crow's Breast, hospitably abandoning to the generous and eccentric stranger his house. Fort Berthold, at this time, was so near to the frontier, that it was supplied by rival traders, and was torn by the petty feuds and vigorous jealousies which accompany civilization. It was Washington Irving's Little Britain over again. The Lambs and Trotters had divided the breech-clouted savages, the moccasined half-breeds, and the buckskin-shirted Caucasian into hostile clans, and the short-hair and long-hair armies waged a relentless warfare. The trade of the place was not immense, nor was it exceedingly lucrative, and the arrival of Sir George Gore was an event of no small moment, especially as his wants and those of his party were not inconsiderable, and his liberality bordered on extravagance. He had been purchasing his beeves of one of the prominent actors in the heady feud which had annihilated brotherly love in Berthold, at fifty dollars per head. If he was not unconscious of the fight going on, he certainly sought to disguise his nativity by remaining neutral. One day his beef contractor raised fifty per cent on his goods, whereupon the testy Sir George went to a rival dealer in herds, who charged him thirty dollars per head; whereupon, although he had no use for more than a half-dozen head, he purchased fifty head—perhaps with a view of inculcating a moral lesson. He became thenceforth a great favorite at Berthold, but we bear willing witness that this little essay of his in moral philosophy was seed sown in barren ground, and has not yet brought forth any fruit whatever. But Berthold, in the spring of 1857, lost Sir George, who returned to St. Louis by steamboat. The guide of this expedition, as of so many others, was Mr. James Bridger, who, for a man who so habitually draws the long bow to an unparalleled tension, has better recommendations for reliability and truthfulness from guileless lieutenants and credulous wayfarers than the world elsewhere will afford. The men of this expedition nearly all remain along and near the theater of this adventure, as proud of their achievements and hero as are the followers of Cardigan, Nelson, Napoleon or Sherman. Rumors of the immense herds of bison which surrounded his camp in the winter of 1855–56, and of the slaughter of them in great numbers, induced the government of the United States to take measures to prevent his further depredations. The immediate region in which he spent this winter was the paradise of the buffalo, and consequently a favorite haunt of the red man of the forest, who brought complaints of the needless and reckless destruction of these animals to their agents, and the government intervened. (Hist. Con. 1876).

The Yellowstone Expedition of 1863.—The history of this civil-military enterprise is taken from the journal of Captain James Stuart, as it appears in the Montana Historical Collections (1876), pages 149–233. This account bears the further testimony of Samuel T. Hauser's reminiscences of the expedition, given so clearly in the Historical Society's publication named above. Captain Stuart's reminiscences are as follows:

Thursday, April 9, 1863.—Our party started from Bannack City for the Fifteen-mile creek (now known as Rattlesnake creek), in squads of two and three. As soon as a man got ready he started for camp on said creek. I arrived there at 10 p.m., and found only nine men all told. We concluded to remain in camp to-morrow, so that we could get all the party together; then we will organize and start in good order. At the time I left town the inhabitants were nearly all the worse for their experiments with old Jim Gammell's minie-rifle whisky. Did not have either horse or night guard, for there are no Indians in this vicinity now. Traveled fifteen miles.

10th.—Organized our company in the forenoon while waiting for some of the men to find their horses. The form of organization adopted was as follows: "Having determined to explore a portion of the country drained by the 'Yellowstone,' for the purpose of discovering gold mines and securing town sites, and believing this object could be better accomplished by forming ourselves into a regularly organized company, we hereby appoint James Stuart captain, agreeing upon our word of honor to obey all orders given or issued by him or any subordinate officer appointed by him. In case of any member refusing to obey an order or orders from said captain, he shall be forcibly expelled from our camp. It is further understood and agreed, that we all do our equal portion of work, the captain being umpire in all cases, sharing equally the benefits of said labor both as to the discovery of gold and securing town sites. (Signed) James Stuart, Cyrus D. Watkins, John Vanderbilt, James N. York, Richard McCafferty, James Hauxhurst, Drewyer Underwood, Samuel T. Hauser, Henry A. Bell, William Roach, A. Sterne Blake, George H. Smith, Henry T. Geery, Ephraim Bostwick." The fifteenth man, George Ives, did not sign the agreement, because he did not overtake the party until next day, when it seems to have been forgotten. In the afternoon I had to go to Burr's ranch, on Big Hole river, after my roan horse. The rest of the party will wait until morning, to give the rear guard a chance to overtake us.

11th.—I staid at Burr's last night. Blake also came there about dark. This morning he and I left Burr's and met the train about noon. We camped for the night on Big Hole river, below the "Backbone." George Smith's horse gave out and was left five miles from camp. Johnny Campbell, with a party from the Three Forks of the Missouri, camped near us. He saw Worden, Powell and others, from the west side, start down the river from Fort Benton. I killed a wolf and two geese to-day. Weather nearly clear, light wind and pleasant. The rear guard (George Ives) reached camp from Bannack City a little after dark. Traveled twenty-three miles.

Sunday, April 12th.—We had a guard last night for the first time; it seems like old times to have to stand guard. Early this morning Ives and Smith went to the Campbell party's camp and traded Smith's exhausted horse for a colt. We boiled our geese all night and tried to eat them for breakfast, but they were too tough. Had to leave them for the coyotes. I broke a white-tailed deer's leg, but lost it in the brush. I also shot at and missed a goose. Cloudy, with showers of rain. No frost last night. Passed two creeks that come into Stinking Water river from the north, and camped on the third one. They are all about the same size, having three or four sluice-heads of water in each. Traveled twenty-five miles. Louis Simmons and party were to have met us at the mouth of the Stinking Water, but we can find no trace of them; they have failed from some cause to us unknown. Granville Stuart explains the absence of Simmons thus: This party consisted of Louis Simmons, William Fairweather, George Orr, Thomas Cover, Barney Hughes and Henry Edgar. They were detained by not being able to find their horses, which had wintered in Deer Lodge. They arrived at the appointed place of rendezvous some three or four days after the main party had passed, and taking their trail followed on, expecting to soon overtake them; but before they did so they were met on the Upper Yellowstone by a large party af Crow Indians, who at once proceeded to plunder them, taking nearly all they had, and giving them miserable sore-backed ponies in exchange for their horses, ordered them to return on pain of death. Situated as they were, they could only comply, and started on their way back with many misgivings as to the fate of the main party, and curses both loud and deep against the Crows. And yet this vexatious outrage was the most fortunate thing that could have occurred for their own interest and that of the Territory, for on their way back to Bannack City they went one day's travel up the Madison river, above where they had struck it as they went out, and crossing through a low gap to the southwest, "they camped at noon on a small creek. While his comrades were cooking a scanty meal, Fairweather, on going out to look after the few broken-down ponies the Indians had given in compulsory exchange for their good horses, observed a point of bare bed rock projecting from the side of the gulch, and determined to try a pan of dirt. He was astonished by obtaining thirty cents in beautiful coarse gold, and in a few more trials he got one dollar and seventy-five cents to the pan. This was at the point afterward famous as Fairweather' discovery claim in Alder Gulch. Believing the locality would prove rich, they proceeded to stake off claims, and Hughes was sent to Bannack for provisions and friends; and on his arrival there, in spite of his efforts to keep the matter a secret, it became known that rich diggings had been struck somewhere, and a close watch was kept on Hughes, and when he started he was followed by some two hundred man. About the present site of Daley's ranch, on the Stinking Water, Hughes refused to go farther until morning, and the party encamped; but during the night he appointed a rendezvous for his particular friends, whom he escorted into the mines in the night. In the morning, the remainder of the party followed his trail into camp, and Fairweather district, with Dr. Steele as president, and James Fergus as recorder, was organized on the 6th of June, 1863. Further prospecting of the gulch developed an alluvial deposit of gold exceeding in richness and extent the most sanguine hopes of the discoverers, and perhaps combining these two qualities in a greater degree than any other discovery ever made." Thus it will be seen that James Stuart's expedition was the direct cause of the discovery of Alder Gulch, and the consequent rapid development of the Territory.

13th.—As one of our party was returning from hunting about 9 o'clock last night, he stampeded all the horses, and four or five broke their picket ropes, but were finally overtaken and secured. It had one good effect—it showed the party the necessity of keeping strict guard over the animals. It snowed a little on us during the night. To-day we crossed two small creeks and camped on the third one, near the divide between Stinking Water and Madison river. Road not very good. Saw three elk to-day. Blake saw elk and sheep last evening, but could not get a shot. Camped at 1 p.m. to-day, and after dinner I went to the top of the divide, about five miles from camp. There is a beautiful valley on the Madison about twenty-five miles long and ten wide. From the divide it looks very much like Indian valley, near the Big Meadows, on the North fork of Feather river in California. The chain of mountains on the east side of the valley has two high peaks; the southern one is like a tall dome of a church, with regular terraces or steps from the base to the top. The river cañons at the lower end of the valley. While on the divide I saw a band of either horses, elk or buffalo in the valley. The country from the Stinking Water to the divide is very broken, with deep ravines, with plenty of lodes of white quartz from one to ten feet wide. In this camp, Geery and McCafferty got a splendid prospect on a high bar, but we did not tell the rest of the party for fear of breaking up the expedition. "This prospect," says Granville Stuart, "was on a fork of Alder Gulch, called Granite creek; and if Fairweather and party had not discovered the mines in Alder Gulch, it is certain that they would have been discovered by Stuart's party when they returned, for it was their intention to thoroughly prospect that vicinity when they came back, and it was only a few miles from where Fairweather struck gold. As it was, when they got back Alder Gulch was full of miners, and all the interest centered there; but McCafferty and one or two others of the party went to the place, and tried it, but they said they could only get a prospect on the river rock, and abandoned it as worthless."

14th.—Followed up the creek we had been camped on, and when near the divide we met two Bannack Indians, the advance guard of the main camp, who were returning from their winter's buffalo hunt on the Yellowstone. They told us the camp was coming, and in a few minutes we met "Arró-ka-keé," alias "Le Grand Coquin," or "The Big Rogue" (eminently appropriate, that name). This gentle savage only stood six and a half feet high in his moccasins, and weighed two hundred and seventy-five pounds. He was accompanied by "Saw-a-bee Win-an," or the "Standing Cottonwood," who was a good Indian, although not dead, which I note as an exception to the general rule. They told us that if we would camp with them they would send back and get the "Big Medicine" chief,

Winnemucca, to camp on a little creek that they were following up to the divide. We agreed to it, and one went back to meet the camp, while we moved slowly on, and I had the pleasure of riding about two miles with my "waw-haw," the Big Rogue. (Waw-haw, in the Snake tongue, means "enemy;" and Stuart calls him this because of an old grudge we had against this huge rascal for instigating his followers to kill some of our cattle when we attempted to winter at the mouth of the Stinking Water, in 1860.) About half a mile from where they were pitching their camp, we met about forty warriors on horseback coming to meet and escort us into camp. On our arrival Winnemucca, the "Big Medicine," requested us to pitch our tents near his lodge. To humor him we did so. After we had unpacked he presented my mess with some elk meat, and in return asked for some tobacco to make a medicine smoke. I gave him a small piece, for I could not very well refuse after his present of meat, although our supply of the weed was very limited, and it was worth fifteen dollars per pound in Bannack City when we left. He then assembled his braves in two half circles parallel to each other and both facing the same way, and they then proceeded to do some tall smoking and heavy sitting around, while we exchanged the latest news about war, horse stealing, etc. They spun long yarns about what they had done during their buffalo hunt, and on my part I built some marvelous castles in the air about what we were going to do, how we would build towns, kill Indians, buffaloes, etc., etc. When we separated for the night, I cautioned them about coming around where our horses were, after dark, explaining to them that we tied and guarded our horses to keep them from being stolen, and that in the night we did not know good Indians from bad ones, etc.; consequently, after dark they all stayed around their own lodges. They were all anxious to trade for tobacco and ammunition, but we had none to spare. Winnemucca and the Bannacks do not agree very well. He calls them thieves and liars, and they are afraid to retaliate for fear he will cast an evil spell on them, for these fool Bannacks tell and believe that he can do all sorts of impossible things, such as making the game plenty or scarce, being invulnerable to fire-arms, catching rifle-balls in his hands, etc., etc.; but if it should ever become necessary, I think he would have warm work stopping a ball from my trusty Sharp's rifle. This is the first time he has accompanied the Bannacks to hunt the buffalo, his headquarters being among the Pahute tribes along the eastern base of the Sierra Nevada from Boisé to the great Colorado desert, all of which tribes speak a common language and seem to acknowledge his authority, although they have special chiefs for each tribe. "Winnemucca," says Granville Stuart, "was the father of the somewhat talented Sarah Winnemucca, who married a lieutenant, and occasionally comes to the surface in communications to the Nevada newspapers."

During the night they had some singing and dancing over some Flathead scalps. They state that about a week ago a party of Bannacks found two lodges of Flatheads who were encamped hunting somewhere below the Vermilion Butte, on the Missouri, between Beaver Creek and Spokan Bar. They killed seven of them and captured thirty-five head of horses. Such is war among Indians—a massacre of the weak and defenseless by the strong whenever occasion offers. Only traveled six miles to-day. One of our horses broke loose last night, and it was 1 p. m. to-day before we found him. It had gone with the Indian horses; and in the morning some of the herders tied it up, and the old chief, after haranguing the camp as usual, mounted his horse and brought ours to us, for which he charged the moderate sum of five dollars. I do not know how brave he may be in battle, but he evidently knows how to make a good charge. They have lost most of their horses during the winter, and about half of them are on foot. Early in the morning the women and children started out walking and leading their pack-horses; it pleased me to see fancy dressed young bucks having to foot it. It snowed about three inches last night, and to-day we followed down the creek we had camped on until near the river; we then turned to the left through the low hills, when a few minutes brought us to the Madison river. The bottom land for three miles wide is a swamp impassible to animals, and I suppose from one end of the valley to the other in length. On the east side of the valley there are a number of small creeks coming out of a snowy mountain. We camped for the night on the only creek coming from the West; we called it "Swamp Creek," because several of our horses mired down in crossing it. It was very windy and disagreeable to-day. Saw a few antelope and some geese. Traveled eight miles.

16th.—Cold and windy. I killed an antelope and two black-tailed deer. Saw plenty of deer and antelope. We traveled through low hills all day, up one ravine and down another, but could not raise the color in prospecting for gold. Camped on a small branch that sinks about a mile before it reaches the river. Traveled twelve miles to-day.

17th.—Followed creek down to river and then down the river three or four miles; then crossed it. At this point it was over one hundred yards wide. Saw about twenty elk at the crossing, and occasionally an antelope in the course of the day's travel; also saw a black bear, and some buffalo tracks about a week old. Found plenty of burnt quartz and could raise the color, but that would not pay to stop and prospect. The mountain on the west side of the Madison looks favorable for gold; low, red hills along the base of the mountain. Timber is very scarce; there are a few firs high up on the mountains, and a few cottonwoods along the streams, but not enough to support a small farming community. At our camp to-night there are the largest willows I ever saw; they are from six to twelve inches in diameter, and from twelve to forty feet high, and straight enough for house logs. The country passed over to-day showed some good indications of gold; low, rolling hills, no timber, and not very well watered. Some two or three horses in the party are getting very weak. I am afraid some of us will have to walk before we get back. Traveled fifteen miles.

18th.—Several snow squalls last evening. Crossed two main branches of the Gallatin river to-day, and camped on a small creek near its mouth; it comes from the northeast and runs about ten sluice-heads of water. The branches of the Gallatin are each about twenty-five yards wide, and there is a belt of good cottonwood timber on the South fork, about three-quarters of a mile wide and twenty miles long. The valley embracing the two forks of the Gallatin is apparently very near circular and about twenty miles in diameter. It is the best valley for agricultural and grazing purposes that I have yet seen in the mountains. Since we crossed the Madison we have passed through a better grass country than either Deer Lodge or Bitter Root valleys, and they are hard to beat. The valley is well watered by numerous small creeks from the mountains. The fork on the north side of the valley is bordered by a swamp, and is difficult to cross. Saw plenty of black and white-tailed deer and antelope, also one band of about twenty elk. Fine weather, clear, calm and warm. There is a low gap in the mountains about twenty miles southeast of our camp, and east from last night's camp. It is the way the Snakes and the Bannacks go to hunt buffalo on the Yellowstone, but we are following Lewis' and Clarke's trail. We are about thirty miles from the three forks of the Missouri, and were about the same distance at last camp. We have seen plenty of geese, ducks, and prairie chickens ever since we struck the Madison, and from there to this camp there are but few prickly pears, and the little valleys are composed of soil instead of rock and gravel. A great many of our horses' backs are becoming sore. Traveled twenty miles.

Sunday, 19th.—I was serenaded by a full band of wolves while on guard last night. We saw four or five black bear and plenty of deer and antelope to-day. Traveled up the small creek that we camped on last night, for about ten miles, to its head; then crossed over a small divide, and camped on a stream about twenty-five feet wide coming from the northeast and running west. I killed a black-tailed deer and an antelope, and Bostwick also killed a black-tailed deer. Plenty of red hills and burnt granite; a high mountain covered with snow a little east of south, about three miles from camp; broken hills to north and east. Our general direction of travel since we crossed Stinking Water divide has been northeast. Traveled eighteen miles to-day.

20th.—Followed up the stream we camped on about four miles to its forks; crossed South fork and went up the ridge between the two for seven or eight miles; thence a little east of north to camp on a branch of same stream. Had to travel out of our course to-day to get around snow drifts. Saw plenty of elk and a few antelope. I killed one of each. Saw where an old buffalo bull had been killed about a year ago. Country very broken, with red hills, but not any washed gravel, and no quartz of any kind. Warm, with light wind. Traveled fifteen miles.

21st.—This morning, for five miles, we traveled east, afterward east 20 degrees south, to camp on a branch of same stream. After camping, I went about four miles ahead, and found a good road for to-morrow's travel. We are about three miles from the divide between the Yellowstone and Missouri rivers. North and east of last night's camp the country is low; northeast twenty miles is a low mountain, south of east is another, and south and southwest there are high, snowy mountains. Saw about one hundred elk to-day. I have difficulty in keeping the party from bombarding them while we are traveling. Bostwick went hunting after we camped and killed a grizzly bear; it attacked him before he shot it, but he got the best of the fight. About twelve of the party went three miles up the branch to see it, and nearly all of them got lively, for it was literally covered with vermin. Underwood and Watkins each killed an antelope; had antelope steaks fried in bear's oil for supper. High living! Traveled ten miles.

22d.—Traveled southwest all day. I left the train in the morning and followed along the base of the mountain to the west. Saw many elk and antelope. We traveled down an open plain, averaging about eight miles in width. We are supposed to be on Shields river. Lewis and Clarke have played us out; if we had left the notes and map of their route at home and followed the Indian trail, we would have saved four days' travel in coming from Bannack city here. The appearance of the country is about the same as last night, only we are closer to the snowy mountains south of us, and which are evidently on the south of the Yellowstone. Traveled twenty miles.

23d.—It began raining about four o'clock yesterday evening and continued until 10.30 p. m. Cloudy to-day. Saw fresh buffalo signs, and many elk, antelope, and three white-tailed deer. We traveled along the east bank of Sheilds river, which runs a few degrees east of south. Crossed four creeks coming in from the mountain east of us; there is also a number of creeks coming in on the west side. Beautiful tableland on the east side of the river, and low, broken hills on the west. Prospected, and found a good color of gold on the river, but not enough to justify us to stop and prospect thoroughly. Since leaving Beaver Head we have seen but very few prickly pears until this afternoon, when we found plenty and of the largest size. I killed an antelope about half an hour before we camped. We do not carry any fresh meat with us, every day provides for itself. Camped on Shields river, about four miles above its mouth. Traveled fifteen miles.

24th.—It began raining about 3 a. m., and kept it up till morning, and was still sprinkling when we packed and started. It rained nearly all day till sundown. It was more like an Oregon mist than a rain storm. We traveled fifteen miles nearly east to camp on a small clay creek. Very bad road; the horses sunk into the mud three or four inches every step and occasionally almost mired down. The character of the country has entirely changed in to-day's travel. Very little gravel or boulders; clay land with bed-rock, very shallow; it is a species of sandstone, with small veins of clear white quartz running through it in places. The general face of the country resembles the Green river region in eastern Utah, only the mountains are higher, and the plains not so wide, with broken clay hills and occasionally a crown butte. There is a range of snowy mountains south of us, and the craggy outline of the divide west, and a few points east of north is an isolated snowy mountain; in an eastern direction there are no mountains to be seen. I killed two buck antelope in the evening, and then went up on a butte and saw the Yellowstone river, distant about three miles. We have been traveling parallel to it all day. We saw a large grizzly bear and chased him into a patch of brush not over one hundred yards in diameter, which we surrounded and tried to drive him out, but could not do it, and none of us were foolhardy enough to go into the brush after him. Traveled fifteen miles.

25th.—Followed down the creek we camped on five miles to the Yellowstone; then down the north bank of same to camp on a small creek coming from the northwest. Occasional bluffs of sandstone with sharp grit; low, rolling hills on both sides of the river; they are smooth on the south side and rocky on the north. No indications of gold; prospected in several places, but could not raise the color. Saw two band of elk, some antelope, and I killed a white-tailed deer. Saw many prairie-dog towns to-day for the first time on the trip. Such great big fat "critters" running all over town barking bloody-murder, and their companions, little diminutive owls, sitting on the largest houses and viewing the hubbub with looks of the greatest gravity and wi-dom. It made me feel good to see them enjoying the excitement of strangers going through town. Blake and Bell caught some fine trout in the river this afternoon. I had always heard that there were no trout in the Yellowstone, but it is a mistake, for they are genuine trout. Saw where an old buffalo bull had been last night during the rain. Passed a small creek coming in on the south side from the southwest. While on guard, we often hear the meadow-larks singing at all hours of the night. To-day we saw plenty of states crows and prairie chickens. The general course of the river is to the east. There are but few groves of cottonwood along it, as far as we have seen, and usually there are only a few scattering trees along its course. The low hills on the south side extend from ten to thirty miles back to the base of a snowy mountain range, the general direction of which is south of east and north of west. In a northern and eastern direction there is not a snowy mountain in sight. Traveled fourteen miles.

26th.—Soon left the river to go around a cluster of black, rocky bluffs extending four miles along the river; in six or seven miles crossed Rivers Across, so called by Captain Clarke from two streams which enter the river exactly opposite to each other. Thence followed down the north bank to camp at Otter creek, crossing one small creek on the way. Opposite camp, Bear river comes in, and two miles above camp, on the south side, comes in a small creek with plenty of cottonwood timber on it. The largest groves of timber are on the small creeks, where they join the river. There is some timber on the high mountains, but from here it seems to be scrubby. We had some rain last night, and several hard squalls of rain and hail while traveling to-day. The character of the soil and rock is the same as yesterday, only there are more prickly pears; very miry, bad traveling. Saw many elk and a few antelope; fresh buffalo signs, but no buffalo. Splendid feed for our horses, and the poor things need it badly enough. Saw plenty of grama grass since yesterday morning. We have seen many large buffalo wolves for the past two days; they serenade us every night. If ever I get back to where I can get some good water to drink, I will be happy. All the water in this country reminds me of puddles in a brick-yard; it not only looks bad, but also has a nauseating taste; yet it seems to be healthy enough, for all of the party are in excellent health. I suppose a person would soon become accustomed to it, so that good, clear, cold water would not taste right. The ground is almost covered with young grasshoppers. We can neither cook nor eat without having the grub seasoned with them. If they all live to become full grown, they will devour all the grass, and our horses will have hard times as we return. One kind of the cottonwoods are beginning to leaf out, and so are the cherry and gooseberry bushes. Traveled eighteen miles.

27th.—We had a hard shower of rain last night, after we had camped, but before we got supper; it then cleared off, and we have had none since, although several storms have passed within a few miles of us while traveling to-day. The surface of the country has entirely changed again in to-day's travel. The clay still remains, but there is a different kind of sandstone, and there is more gravel on the hills. On both sides of the river the low hills are now thinly covered with yellow pine and cedar; there is also more cottonwood along the river and creeks. There are but little bottoms along the river, the low hills generally coming down to it. Two creeks came in on the south side to-day; one of them, I think, is dry; and we also passed two dry ones on the north side. Saw a small band of big-horn or mountain sheep, for the first time on the trip; also a few antelope, and plenty of wolves, prairie dogs, and prickly pears. After we camped, I went back into the hills, about a mile, to look for buffalo, but, in place of them, I found fresh tracks of twelve horses going up the river. I suppose it is a war-party of natives, and, if so, I expect they will visit us to-night in search of our horses. There are plenty of geese and ducks along the river. Several of our horses seem about to give out, and, among them, "Parkie," Bell's mare. Saw grape-vines here for the first time since I left California. Camped in a small bottom on the river, under a steep bluff. Traveled fifteen miles.

28th.—Left the river to our right, and went through the hills for about four miles to avoid a rocky point. After we came to the river again, we had a splendid road down the bottom to camp. The river bottoms along here average about two miles wide. The cottonwood timber not so good as it was yesterday, but there is more scrubby yellow pine and cedar on the hills. I have not seen any fir timber since we left the divide. Along here, the timber only extends from one to ten miles back from the river on both sides. On the south side there is a snowy range parallel with the river, distant from forty to fifty miles, with high table-land, intersected by couleés, between it and the timber near the river. On the north side from where the timber runs out are nearly level plains as far as a person can see, and not a mountain in sight in the north and east. Saw only three antelope and four elk to-day; game is getting very scarce, and I fear we will have to do without fresh meat until we find buffalo. Lent Bell a horse, so his mare Parkie could rest. I am afraid she will go up the spout. I killed a very large eagle where we are camped to-night, therefore we call it "Eagle Camp." Underwood, Blake, and Bostwick went hunting in the evening. Underwood killed an antelope. Hauser went into the river to swim across, but weakened. Our camp is a little below a creek entering on the south side. During the day, we passed several creeks, on both sides of the river, that are dry at present, but have plenty of water at some time of the year; but whether from rain or snow I am not able to determine. Anybody who will take grasshoppers for bait and go fishing can catch abundance of white fish. We have traveled twenty miles to-day. About an hour before sundown, while lying around camp resting after the fatigues of the day, we were startled by hearing several guns fired in a clump of cottonwoods across the river, and immediately afterward we saw about thirty Indians fording across. They came on a run, vociferating "How-dye-do," and "Up-sar-o-ka," which latter means "Crow Indians," in their language. By the time they were fairly in camp we had our horses all tied up, and every man prepared for emergencies. They first inquired who was our captain. I told them, and asked which was their captain. They showed me three, one big and two little ones. The large chief told me to have my men put all our things in the tents, and keep a sharp lookout, or we would lose them. I then gave him a small piece of tobacco to have a grand smoke, and I also found that one of them, a very large man with a big belly, could talk the Snake language, and he was at once installed as interpreter. They (the interpreter and chiefs) sat down in a circle, and requested the pleasure of my company. I complied with the invitation, and our party stood guard over our horses and baggage, while I smoked and exchanged lies with them. It would take me a week to write all that was said, so I forbear. Meanwhile, the other Indians began disputing with each other about who should have our best horses. I requested the chief to make them come out from among the horses and behave themselves, which he did. At eight p.m. I put on double guard, and at ten p.m. all but the guard retired to rest. The Indians wandered around camp all night, like evil spirits; and such an odd night's sleep as we had! Every few minutes somebody would have to rush out of his tent and capture something which the Indians would steal from under the tents, in spite of the guard, and this too when it was bright moonlight. * * * At daylight I aroused the party, and we proceeded to ascertain our losses; everybody had lost something. As soon as we began to pack up, they at once proceeded to forcibly trade horses, blankets, etc., and to appropriate everything they wanted. I saw that the time had come to do or die; therefore, I ordered every man to be ready to open fire on them, when I gave the signal. With one hand full of cartridges and my rifle in the other, I told the Indians to mount their horses and go to their camp. They weakened, got on their horses and left. Two of the chiefs, however, very politely requested to accompany us, which we refused, but they came along.

29th.—Started at sunrise accompanied by the two chiefs and six others, who also concluded to go along. After the Indians fed on the fragments of the breakfast, the chief and five others offered their robes, which were refused, I saying to keep them until we meet again. After breakfast they went back, and we traveled on down the river. After sundown we saw two Indians coming. One of them had a letter from Agent Schoonover, of Fort Union, which stated that the bearer was "Red Bear," one of the principal chiefs of the Crow nation. We gave them some supper, etc. He then presented me with a black horse; said he was all right; friend of ours, etc. Had a long talk with him, in the course of which he asked about old Jim Bridger, and also Peter Martin, desiring to know where they were and why they never came to see the Crows any more. The other Crows had told me that the Sioux had attacked the Fur Company's express-boat from Fort Benton, near Fort Union, and some said they had taken it, and others said they had killed some of the crew, but had not captured the boat. I asked Red Bear if it was so, and he replied that a rumor to that effect was current among the tribes, but he did not know whether it was so or not. I hope it is only a Crow lie, for Worden and Powell were on that boat, and it would grieve me to know the Indians had injured them, or anybody else, for that matter. It rained a little about dark. When we retired to rest I gave orders to the guards not to kill, but take prisoner, any Indians that they might discover prowling around after our horses, and sure enough, about 11 P.M. they discovered one crawling up to two of our best horses that were tied to the same tree. They watched and waited until they got dead wood on him, and then captured him and called me up. I introduced him to Red Bear as one of his good Indians, who, he had just been telling me, would not annoy us any more, as he had told them not to, etc. He said the man was crazy, had no ears, etc. The old story, anything to excuse him. We had already had a practical illustration that stealing or attempting to steal is far from being considered a crime by even the best of them. We turned the thief loose, and early in the morning they all started back, leaving us alone in our glory. Traveled eighteen miles.

30th.—Traveled all day down a valley between terraced table-lands and buttes; valley about eight miles wide; snowy range to the west about eighty miles distant; no other snowy mountains in sight; low, open country around base of mountains. Camped three miles below the mouth of a large stream coming in on the south side; suppose it to be Clarke's Fork; plenty of buffalo grass here; many elk and some antelope in the valley; saw two big-horn rams on high cliff by the river. I accepted Red Bear's black horse last night and presented him my white mare in return. I thought at the time I had a little the best of it, but I found during to-day's travel that I was mistaken. No timber, except cottonwood, and that very scrubby, within thirty or forty miles of here. Plenty of geese and ducks along the river. We are so far away from any high mountains that all the party feel discouraged and lonesome. Give me the mountains in preference to plains, where one can see more level ground than he can ride over in a day. The ground is literally covered with young crickets. Between them and the grasshoppers I am afraid the grass will soon be used up. Course of river, six degrees north of east. Traveled fifteen miles.

Friday, May 1, 1863.—About one o'clock last night Bostwick had his roan horse stolen while he and Geery were on guard. It was done by two Indians, one of whom showed himself, but not plainly enough to shoot at; and while the guards were both watching to get a shot at him, his companion crawled into the other end of camp and cut the horse loose, and got away with him without attracting their attention, and this too when the moon was nearly at the full and without a cloud. Verily, the Crows are world beaters, and words cannot do the subject justice. Fortunately, Bostwick was on guard himself, so he cannot blame anybody else with carelessness. Course of river nearly northeast. About 10 A.M. saw buffalo for the first time on the trip; turned into the river bottom and camped. After dinner, Bostwick, Underwood and I went out into the hills to kill one. When we got on the hills, about three miles from the river, we could see over a large extent of country, and there were buffalo in nearly all directions in bands of from two to nine. I think we saw altogether about one hundred. We were afraid our horses could not catch them, and on foot we could only get within about two hundred and fifty yards of any of them. Finally, I tried a shot at that distance. Shot him too high to kill dead, and away they went. We tried another band, and Bostwick and I both shot at one about two hundred yards. Both hit him, but he ran off with our lead. It was now getting late, so we concluded to run them. We started in about five hundred yards behind one, and in three-quarters of a mile he ran into a band of ten or twelve. I was riding a brown mare, bought from Robert Dempsey, and Bostwick and Underwood both led me for the first mile. After that, I had it all my own way. I ran up to them, and tried to pick out a fat one, but didn't know how; finally chose the largest; run alongside, and let him have it behind the shoulder. He and three or four others left the band. I followed, and went to run up again, but he would'nt stand it and charged me. Turning, I ran round ahead of him and shot him behind the other shoulder and down he went.

[A summary of the journal to its close is as follows:] During the day, the party passed through groves of large cottonwood, saw some large rattlesnakes and many bull snakes; elk and buffalo plenty; along the river were many houses, some built like lodges, most of them oblong or square. On May 3, the party camped three miles below Pompey's Pillar. On reaching this natural monument they found the names of Captain Clarke and two of his men cut in the rock with the date July 25, 1806. There were also two other names inscribed under date May 23, 1834, viz., Derick and Vancourt, supposed to be attached to the Bridger, Sublette, or Bonneville party. Up to May 4, the expedition struck only one spring between the Yellowstone and Missouri. On May 5, they camped at the mouth of the Big Horn. Geery, while bathing in this river, was swept down into the whirlpool, where the two rivers meet. Owing to his strength and swimming powers he escaped drowning. On May 6, 1863, five men were detailed to cross the Big Horn and survey a town site and ranches; while another party of four was sent forward to prospect. On this day James Stuart and four others cut their names on sandstones up the river. On May 7, the party started up the west bank of the Horn, traveling eighteen miles that day. On the 8th they traveled fifteen miles through a desolate country; on the 9th the remains of an Indian were found buried up a tree. On the 11th a party of three white men were observed three fourths of a mile across the river; they neither answered nor halted; so that Underwood and Smith were dispatched to overtake them. A fry pan and a pack of cards were the only relics of this party found; as they fled with all speed.

This party, it afterward appeared, was J. M. Bozeman and John M. Jacobs and his little daughter, seven or eight years old. They were on their way from the Three Forks of the Missouri river to Red Buttes, on North Platte river, looking out a route for a wagon-road, which they finally found, and which was afterward known as the Jacobs and Bozeman Cut-off. They had been chased by a party of Indians a few days before, and when they saw and heard Stuart's party they at once took them for Indians, and did not wait to find out, but at once did their utmost to escape, with the result above stated. But two days later they came suddenly upon a band of seventy-five or eighty mounted Indians. Knowing they would be plundered of everything, if not murdered, and considering resistance hopeless, Jacobs managed to drop his rifle and bullet-pouch into the sage-brush before the Indians got to them. His anticipations were realized, for they were at once stripped of almost everything, and many were for killing them on the spot; but finally, after a stormy discussion, they were given three miserable ponies in exchange for their horses and turned loose half-naked and without anything to eat. Moving slowly away, they waited until the Indians got out of sight, when they returned and found Jacobs' gun and bullet-pouch; but unfortunately the latter only contained five balls at the time, and as they made all possible haste to get out of that dangerous neighborhood they did not stop to kill and dry any meat, and before they knew it they had passed out of the buffalo range, and meeting with bad luck in killing small game (which is usually the case when it is absolutely necessary to kill it), their five bullets were exhausted; and after severe hardships, they finally got through to North Platte in a famishing condition. It was doubtless the intention of the Indians to have them die of hunger before they could get out of the country. Poor Bozeman, after whom the present flourishing county seat of Gallatin county was named, was murdered by the Indians near the mouth of Shield's river, on the Yellowstone, April 20, 1867. On May 12, the expedition crossed Box Elder creek, and entered a country of box elder groves and wild plum trees. May 13, 1863.—Last night Smith and I had the first watch, and about eleven o'clock the horses at my end were scared at something, but it was very dark and I could not see anything. I thought it might be a wolf prowling around the camp. A few minutes before eleven o'clock I sat up and lit a match to see what time it was, and also to light my pipe, but at once laid down again; we were both lying flat on the ground trying to see what made the horses so uneasy, and to this we owe our lives. Just then I heard Smith whisper that there was something around his part of the horses, and a few seconds later the Crows fired a terrific volley into the camp. I was lying between two of my horses, and both were killed and very nearly fell on me. Four horses were killed, and five more wounded, while in the tents two men were mortally, two badly, and three more slightly wounded. Smith shouted, "Oh, you scoundrels!" and fired both barrels of his shot-gun at the flash of theirs, but, so far as we could tell next morning, without effect; he most probably fired too high. I could not fire for the horses were in the way. I shouted for some one to tear down the tents, to prevent their affording a mark for the murderous Indians a second time. York rushed out and tore them down in an instant. I then ordered all who were able to take their arms and crawl out from the tents a little way, and lie flat on the ground; and thus we lay until morning, expecting another attack each instant, and determined to sell or lives as dearly as possible. When at last day dawned, we could see a few Indians among the rocks and pines on a hill some five or six hundred yards away, watching to see the effect of their bloody work. An examination of the wounded presented a dreadful sight. C. D. Watkins was shot in the right temple, and the ball came out at the left cheek bone; the poor fellow was still breathing, but insensible. E. Bostwick was shot in five different places—once in back part of shoulder, shattering the shoulder-blade, but the ball did not come out in front; three balls passed through the right thigh, all shattering the bone, and one ball passed through the left thigh, which did not break the bone; he was sensible, but suffering dreadful agony. H. A. Bell was shot twice—one ball entered at the lowest rib on the left side and lodged just under the skin on the right side; the other ball entered near the kidneys on the left side, and came out near the thigh joint. D. Underwood was shot once, but the ball made six holes; it first passed through the left arm above the elbow, just missing the bone, and then passed through both breasts, which were large and full, and just grazing the breast-bone. H. T. Geery was shot in the left shoulder-blade with an arrow, but not dangerously hurt. George Ives was shot in the hip with a ball—a flesh wound. S. T. Hauser in the left breast with a ball, which passed through a thick memorandum-book in his shirt pocket, and stopped against a rib over his heart, the book saving his life. Several others had one or more ball holes through their clothes. We held a council of war; concluded that it was impossible to return through the Crow country, now that they were openly hostile; therefore, determined to strike for the emigrant road on Sweetwater river, throwing away all of our outfits except enough provisions to do us to the road. Watkins was still breathing, but happily insensible. Poor Bostwick was alive and sensible, but gradually failing, and in great agony. With noble generosity he insisted on our leaving him to his fate, as it was impossible to move him, and equally impossible for him to recover if we remained with him, and which, he said, would only result in all of us falling victims to the fiendish savages. He asked us to hand him his trusty revolver, saying he would get even on the red devils when they came into camp. We gave it to him, and a few moments later were startled by the report of his pistol, and filled with horror when we saw he had blown out his brains. Oh, noble soul! May you sit in judgment on your murderers on that great Last Day! Bell, who declined to have his wounds probed, saying he was mortally wounded (as we all thought he must be from where he was struck), now said he would try to ride, and we put him on a horse and started, leaving camp a few minutes before twelve o'clock. We traveled slowly on account of the wounded, and camped to get supper before sundown, having traveled five miles nearly southeast. Started again 4:30 P. M., and went east five miles, thence south ten miles to camp, at 10 P. M., on the Big Horn mountains. May 14, 1863. Traveled twenty miles, toward nearly all points of the compass; general course west, 25 degrees south. Very rough mountain all the day; had difficulty in getting through the snow. After going five miles we stopped at a spring for breakfast, and then went twelve miles more and halted for supper. Here poor Geery shot himself accidentally. He and another man laid their rifles on the ground, and while unpacking the horses some blankets were thrown down upon the guns, and Geery shortly after, going to get his, took it by the muzzle and drew it toward him. The blankets, or something else, drew back the hammer sufficiently to discharge the rifle, and the ball struck him a little above the left nipple, shattering his shoulder, and giving him a mortal wound. In spite of our united entreaties, he shortly after blew out his brains, so that we could bury him and leave the place before dark. This was the most heart-rending scene on the whole trip. We buried him, and went three miles, and camped long after dark, hiding our horses among the pines. The travels of May 15 and 16 were uneventful save the discovery of Indian smoke signals on the 16th, and plenty of rattlesnakes. Went out with Blake in search of a place to cross the canon; but failing to find a crossing, returned to camp. Shortly after starting east, I noticed what I took to be an Indian smoke signal. Seeing it a second time, I was satisfied that it was a signal, and called the attention of the party to it, and shortly after we all saw several distinct signals, which I knew were intended to gather the Indians together for an attack on us. Yet there was no other route possible for us but the one right up the ridge and trail along which the signals were made. Reaching within half a mile of the mountain on the side of which the signals had been seen, I saw that the trail ran right along the edge of a chasm, the mountain to the left being quite rocky and steep, and at one place there was a large perpendicular bunch of rock almost hanging over the trail. Back of and near these rocks was where we had seen the smokes. There was a faint trail that ran around behind this point. We all felt certain that we would have to fight our way past this point. So we called a halt for preparation, all dismounting except the badly wounded, who were to bring up the rear. All of the extra amunition was packed on a mule and placed in the rear in York's charge. He was armed with Bell's shot-gun, and instructed to kill the animal as soon as the firing began in front, so that our ammunition could not be lost by a stampede of the animals, and we could fall back to the mule when we needed a fresh supply. I felt that it would be much better to send one or two men on the dim trail around behind the rocks, but did not like to order any one to go, as they would receive the whole fire of the Indians, if they were there, as we supposed. After we had prepared ourselves for battle and had advanced a few steps, Hauser came up and said: "Jim, if we all go under these rocks in this way, they will kill the last one of us the first fire." To which I replied: "I know it would be better to send two men above and behind those rocks, but as it would be nearly certain death, I don't feel like sending anybody, although I think it would enable most of us to get through; but I feel that we might as well all take the chances together." "If you think it will increase the chances of more getting through, I'll go," was Hauser's answer; and, sure enough, he mounted his pony, cocked his rifle, and spurred off. Underwood, seeing him start, said: "If Sam's going, I'm going too;" and as his left arm was useless, because of the wound he received in the night attack, he took his bridle in his teeth, and with his cocked revolver in his right hand, spurred after Hauser. When they disappeared behind the rocks, a pang passed through my heart, for I felt that they would probably never reach the other side. We all hurried along, expecting every instant to hear the firing at Hauser and Underwood, and then at ourselves; but we reached the open ground beyond, where they joined us, without a shot being fired. Why they did not attack us here is a mystery, and I can only account for it by supposing that they failed to collect in sufficient force to do so. None of us ever expected for a moment, that we would get through without a battle, and at a great disadvantage, too; but they are a superstitious, cowardly set, and I believe they are getting rather afraid of us, thinking that our "medicine" is very strong; for, in the first place, they were amazed to find that they had not killed us all in the night attack, and then our sallying out and defying them to come and fight us the next morning, astonished them still more, and our calm and deliberate way of getting ready and moving slowly off, convinced them that it would be dangerous to come within our reach, and now, to-day, our two men riding so boldly, almost among them, and cutting them off from the rocks, from the top of which they would have so great an advantage, seems to have demoralized them so that they were afraid to commence an attack, for fear they might get the worst of it. * * * May 28. Traveled thirty miles. Came in sight of the old emigrant road to California, and Oregon road at noon. We made a lucky hit coming across from the Popo Agie river. The way we came is the shortest and best. We struck Sweetwater river, sixteen miles below Rocky Ridge, and camped for dinner. Found plenty of colors in loose gravel on the bars. Started after dinner (3 P.M.); crossed the river, and went south two miles, where we came in sight of telegraph poles. Our feelings at seeing the road and telegraph, after running the gauntlet for about four hundred miles through the Crow nation, can better be imagined than described. In another mile we came in sight of a train of horse teams about three miles ahead of us. The boys couldn't stand it any longer, but gave vent to their feelings in all kinds of motions and noises. We were equal to a Chinese camp on a drunk, for noise. We followed the train slowly, and about sundown we came to their camp, at the foot of Rocky Ridge, at the place that, in 1860, was called "Pacific City," although it only consisted of a single trading house. When the train saw us coming, they were all in confusion, like a disturbed ant-hill, running in every direction and hallooing to one another. They finally formed in an irregular square in the road, in front of their stock, fully prepared to exterminate us. We rode slowly up to them, and before we came close enough to be killed decently, they discovered we were white men, and great was their rejoicing thereat, for I think the greater part of them had faith in the motto, "He who fights and runs away," etc. With the emigrants were four soldiers from South Pass station. It seems that this year there are soldiers stationed in small squads at intervals of about eighty miles all along the road, to protect the emigrants from the States to California and Oregon. As soon as we had unsaddled, and the soldiers found out where we were from, they gave us enough provisions to do us a week. Samuel T. Hauser, in addition to this entry, says:

'The soldiers of this train told us that a party of Indians had, the day before, succeeded in stampeding and running off about forty head of horses and mules from some trains about thirty miles below where we then were, and that they had pursued them for some distance, but could not come up with them. The Indians had gone north toward the Big Horn mountains, and in their flight had thrown away some flour, which the soldiers picked up, and wondered where they could have obtained it. This afforded proof positive that our captain was right, and that the same party who made the night attack on the Big Horn river had dogged us some four hundred miles to the road, for we had left several hundred pounds of flour in that ill-fated camp, which they of course at once appropriated; and, as we drew near the road, they, despairing of getting any advantage of us, had turned off and struck the road lower down, and made the above-mentioned raid upon the emigrants, and returned to their country rejoicing.' At noon on May 30, the party camped on Rock Creek, the same place where James Stuart found good prospects in 1860. That night they made the last crossing of the Sweetwater, where they found a post of twenty soldiers, in charge of a second-lieutenant, and an operator in charge of a telegraph station, on the north side of the river, the post being moved since 1860 from the south side. Here they met Louis Silvers, on his way to his old ranch at Rocky Ridge. This pioneer of Montana failed not to inquire after Reece and Granville Stuart, and all the pioneers he used to know in Missoula county.

May 31, the party came up with Hardesty and Alexander's freight train, and camped with the freighters on Sweetwater, five miles from Pacific Springs. York found several acquaintances in the train. William McAdow, a brother of Rudd McAdow, was with this party On June 2, this McAdow volunteered to accompany the expedition back to Bannack, while York agreed to go with the freighters to Salt Lake. On June 4, the expedition arrived at Fort Bridger. Here the party met a number of old mountaineers and acquaintances, a few of whom sent newspapers to Robert Hereford, Dick Hamilton and John Sharpe, then residing at Bannack. Here Jim Roup joined the expedition. [From this date to the 18th, when the expedition came up with immigrants for Beaverhead and Deer Lodge valleys, there is no record of matters relating to Montana]

On June 19, the expedition reached Camas creek. Mr. Stuart says, under this date: "Camped for dinner above the crossing of Camas creek; found poor grass, but plenty of trout. About two miles from camp we overtook George Hillerman (alias "Pie-biter"), who had a doleful tale to tell. He says that he left Bannack shortly after we did last spring, to prospect on the head of Snake river. They could not agree about the route to travel when they were on Lewis' fork, and he and a man named L. F. Ritchie separated from the rest, who all went south toward Lander's road. They two went on up Lewis' fork, and he says they found good prospects; cached their tools and grub, and started for Bannack City, and when near a valley on the river, Ritchie accidentally shot himself, breaking his arm near the shoulder. Hillerman brought him to where the Salt Lake road leaves Snake river, where he died from mortification. Hillerman having no tools to bury him with, wrapped him in a blanket and two buffalo robes, and sent word by the expressman to get the first train to bury him as they came along by there. Some circumstances afterward led to the belief that Hillerman had murdered him.

20th. Traveled twenty-eight miles. We were up by daylight; had breakfast, and started by five A. M. Where the road crosses Dry creek we found six mules and a horse. Four of the mules were tied together, two and two, and fastened to sage bushes. We untied and drove them along, thinking the owners must be ahead somewhere; and about two miles from the first water in Dry creek, now Hole in the Rock, we met two men on foot looking for them. They stated that at twelve last night all their animals, six horses and six mules, were stampeded. We found seven for them, so they only lost five horses. We stopped and had dinner with them, and let them have two horses to work, so they can make the trip to Bannack by traveling slowly. In the afternoon we traveled eight or nine miles, and halted for supper. After supper, we had intended to go about eight miles, but after going three miles we overtook our unfortunate wagons again, and they bribed us to stay all night with them on Lodge Pole creek (Pleasant valley), by telling us they would give us all the butter and eggs we could eat if we would only stay all night with them. That proposition struck us right where we lived, and we incontinently camped, and they were as good as their word.

21st. Traveled twenty-eight miles. Started at seven A. M., and traveled until half past eleven A. M., making sixteen miles, and then stopped for dinner on first creek after crossing the divide (Junction Station). Plenty of gnats and horse flies. Saw a few antelope; very wild. Our horses are too poor to do any hunting, although we are starving for fresh meat. Jake Meeks passed while we were camped. He has been to Bannack City with four loads of flour, which was dull sale; had to store it until times are better. He also told us that there has been a big stampede from Bannack to some new diggings that have been struck on Stinking Water river. I am afraid it is our place that we found as we went out in April. After dinner we traveled ten miles, and camped for the night on Sheep Horn Cañon creek, near its mouth. Sorry I have not time to go and look for my big Powhatan pipe, that I lost about five miles above here in April, 1858. The road to Bannack City passes down through Red Rock valley and Horse Prairie. The old road by Blacktail Deer creek is played out.

Monday, June 22, 1863. Traveled forty miles. Some of the party thought they heard somebody driving horses last night, and consequently we were all up early this morning. It proved to be a false alarm, as we found our horses all right. Started at five o'clock, and traveled until half-past ten A. M., when we halted for dinner above the point of rocks on Horse Prairie creek. Passed a lot of gamblers camped on Red Rock creek. They are en route for Denver, via Salt Lake and Fort Bridger. After dinner, packed up and pushed on to Bannack City, which we reached late in the evening. Everybody was glad to see us, and we were glad to see everybody, although our hair and beards had grown so, and we were so dilapidated generally, that scarcely any one knew us at first; and no wonder, for we had ridden sixteen hundred miles, and for the last twelve hundred without tents, or even a change of clothes.

This expedition must certainly be credited with the discovery of the Virginia mines and the opening up of the Yellowstone country. Through it came the information and most of the enterprise which placed Montana a leader among the territories within a short time after the first American settlements were made.

Snake River Expedition, 1863.—This exploration party was organized by Captain W. W. DeLacy, to prospect the Snake river country. He left Virginia City August 3, 1863; camped that night at Ramshorn Gulch, where Pete Daly had just completed his cabin, in which he was living with his wife and two step-daughters. On August 6, he, with others who joined him on the road, arrived at the mouth of Black-tail Deer creek, where a number of men had assembled to go on the stampede. Among them was Moore, the auctioneer of Bannack, and Geo. Hilderman, who barely escaped hanging afterward. Moore nominated DeLacy for captain, the election was made unanimous, and on the 8th of August the expedition set forward under his command. At the head of the creek Major Brookie and Judge Lewis' party joined Captian DeLacy's command; crossed to Red Rock creek, on the 9th, and reached Camas creek on the 12th. A day later Snake river was reached, and here Baby, an Indian raised by Bob Dempsey, was found among the Snake tribe. The command returned to Virginia City on September 23, 1863, after a trip of about 500 miles. Among the men on this expedition were: J. Bryant, S. Brown, A. R. Burr, David Burns, Lewis Casten, W. W. DeLacy, J. C. Davis, F. A. Dodge, John Ferrill, J. H. Ferguson, George Forman, T. J. Farmerlee, Aaron Fickel, S. R. Hillerman, Charles Heineman, H. H. Johnson, James Kelly, D. H. Montgomery, H. C. Mewhorter, A. H. Myers, J. B. Moore, John Morgan, W. H. Orcutt, J. J. Rich, Jos. W. Ray, H. Schall, W. Thompson, Major Brookie, E. P. Lewis, John Bigler, J. Stroup, Richard Todd, Jack Cummings, D. W. Brown, Charles Lamb, E. Whitcomb, A. Comstock, C. Failor, Charles Ream, J. Gallagher, C. Smith, F. Dickie, J. H. Lawrence, E. Sheldon.

First Map.—An act to provide for the compensation of Walter W. DeLacy, for services rendered and money expended in making a map of the Territory of Montana, for the use of the governor and the legislative assembly of the Territory of Montana, was approved February 6, 1865. Under this authority the sum of $625 was paid to Captain DeLacy, and the first map authorized by the Territory was an accomplished fact. In 1867 he completed a second map of the Territory.

Cook and Folsom, 1869.—In 1869 Cook and Folsom's exploring party went up the Yellowstone to the lake, and thence across the divide into the Madison geyser basin.

Wyoming, to prospect the Big Horn range, and probably the Black Hills. Just as it was ready to start, an order came from the Secretary of War, instructing the commandant at Fort Russel to stop it; and not until its leaders had solemnly promised not to go to the places spoken of, was it allowed to move. Some of its members now backed out, but the remainder, 120 in number, concluded to go on and prospect the country between the Big Horn and Rocky mountain ranges. The expedition went up the Platte river to the mouth of Sweetwater, and up that stream to Burnt Station; thence across the Sweetwater mines to Wind river. The day before this party came away from the mines, three men had left there with a team and wagon to go to the post on Little Wind river. Just after they crossed Po Pa Agie creek, they were attacked by Arraphoes and killed. They had turned up their wagon-box for a cover to protect them, and had fought a long time, for the ground near the wagon was strewn with cartridge shells. The expedition took their bodies to Camp Brown, where they were buried. One of the three was Harvey Morgan, an old timer from the Yellowstone. The expedition crossed the Owl creek range and prospected every stream from there to Stinking Water. Here it divided, and part went back, but the greater number came on to the Yellowstone. This party brought with them a cannon that has become historic, and bears the name of the "Big Horn Gun." The expedition dissolved on this river. Some of its members stayed in the country and took a hand in the expedition of 1874–75. Comstock, the discoverer of the great Nevada mines that bear his name, joined the expedition at Miner's Delight, Wyoming, and came through to Bozeman. He was at times despondent to the verge of lunacy. In one of those spells he committed suicide by a pistol shot, during the ensuing fall. (Topping.)

Washburne's Party.—General Washburne's party of 1870, which comprized Surveyor-General Washburne, N. P. Langford, Lieutenant G. C. Doane and others, must be credited with the first actual exploration of the Yellowstone Park. To the descriptive articles from the pen of N. P. Langford, and the elaborate report of Lieutenant Doane the people of that day are indebted for their knowledge of this land of wonders.

Washburne and Doane's Expedition.—A party left Helena in July of 1870, to explore the Yellowstone country. Judge Lawrence and Messrs. Gillette and Evarts were in the party. They joined General Washburne and Lieutenant Doane's expedition at Mammoth Hot Springs, and together went up the Yellowstone to the head of the lake, where Evarts was lost. He left the party to climb a hill that was about two miles to the left of the trail. In coming back he lost his way in the thick pines with which this country is covered, and missed his party, who traveled but a few miles, and, as he did not come in, camped. Men were sent back to hunt for him. They ranged the country for several days, and built fires on every point in the vicinity, but it was of no use. After about ten days' search the party gave him up for dead and went back to Helena. When going down the river, they offered $600 to anyone who could find him. Jack Baronett and George Pritchard went up, and after a long search found him on Sheep mountain, just as he had given up and laid down to die. They took him down to a cabin near Gardiner river, called the Turkey Pen. The boys who were stopping there did all in their power to bring the sufferer through, and in a week's time he was able to be taken down the river in a travois. Mr. Evarts wrote and printed an account of his trip, in which he says, that his horse ran away from him a few days after he was lost. That when his matches gave out he lighted fires with his glasses. That when three weeks away he lost his glasses (he had left his gun and pistol before), and for the remainder of the trip he had to eat his food (mostly fish) uncooked. For the last six or seven days of this terrible time he lived entirely on grasshoppers. He was lost thirty-nine days, and when found weighed just fifty pounds. There was some evidence found the next season which conflicts with Mr. Evarts' statement as regards his horse. Some of the packers with Professor Hayden found, near where Mr. Evarts was lost, a brush wicky-up, and the remains of a camp-fire, that had apparently been used for ten or twelve days. Around this were the partly burnt ribs and other bones of a horse, and it is believed that here he killed his horse and laid waiting for a rescuing party till he had eaten it. (Chronicles.)

Barlow's Expedition.—The expedition of 1871 was conducted by Colonel J. W. Barlow, of General Sheridan's staff, and Captain D. P. Heap, of General Hancock's staff. The periodical exploratory trips of General Sheridan began in 1870, and have been continued down to the present time. His reports and letters have acted a part in attracting the attention of the people to the entire mountain region.

Hayden Surveys.—The Hayden Geological Survey of 1871 was carried out by Professor Hayden, assisted by his staff, whose names are as follows: James Stevenson, principal assistant; A. J. Smith, George B. Dixon, Robert Adams, Jr., assistants; Anton Schonborn, chief topographer; Professor Cyrus Thomas, agricultural statistician; Henry W. Elliott, artist; William H. Jackson, photographer; J. W. Beaman, meteorologist; Professor G. N. Allen, botanist; Dr. A. C. Peale, mineralogist; Dr. C. S. Turnbull, physician; Campbell Carrington, charge of geological collections; William B. Logan, secretary; F. J. Huse, Chester M. Dawes, C. De V. Negley, and J. W. Duncan, general assistants. Fifteen laboring men, teamsters, cooks, hunters, etc., were employed to attend the party, while the Philadelphia artist, Thomas Moran, was the guest of the party. The journey was begun at Ogden, Utah, June 1, 1871, via Virginia City, thence across the divide to the Madison Valley, and over the second divide into the Gallatin Valley at Fort Ellis. From Fort Ellis the party moved to Bottler's Ranch, where a permanent camp was made. The geological survey of the Park was completed by August 28, when the explorers reported at camp. The party next proceeded down the Yellowstone to the mouth of Shield's river, so as to connect their geological inquiries with the explorations of Colonel Reynolds, made in 1859–60.

Mystic Lake was explored in 1871. The name was bestowed upon this expansion of one of the branches of the Gallatin in July, 1871, by the Hayden geological party. In describing the journey from Fort Ellis to the lake Professor Hayden says: "A small party of officers from the fort, under the guidance of Captain S. H. Norton, made a tour of exploration to a little lake embosomed among the mountains, about twelve miles distant. We were accompanied also by Dr. Campbell and Lieut. Jerome. Our course was nearly south from the fort. After passing over the beautiful grassy plain between the middle and east borders of the Gallatin, we ascended the high hills on the west side of the dividing range between the waters of the Yellowstone and the Gallatin. These hills are so covered with debris and a heavy growth of vegetation that not even in the ravines can the real basis rocks be seen. On either side of us, however, on the very highest ridges, the limestones are visible, with the reddish sandstones and clays, so that we may infer that the jurassic or cretaceous are concealed beneath this superficial drift. After winding among these hills, through a garden of most beautiful wild flowers, we reached the little lake, which, on account of its great beauty, and being partially hidden, we called Mystic Lake. The stream which enters this lake passes through a deep gorge walled on either side with carboniferous limestone."

Roberts' Expedition, 1872.—This party, composed of Thomas P. Roberts, Lewis H. Barker and six others, explored the Missouri from the Three Forks to Fort Benton, a distance of two hundred and fifty miles, in 1872. The report by Mr. Roberts, as well as his history of the expedition, was published by the Historical Society in 1876.

Northern Boundary Survey.—This survey was completed October 20, 1874, at the monument on the summit of the Rocky mountains, near Chief Monument, erected under authority of the treaty of 1846. The iron pillars marking the line were all placed October 7, 1875.

Jones' Expedition, 1873.—The survey of a military road from Point of Rocks on the Northern Pacific railroad via Camps Stambaugh, Brown, Wind River Valley and the Yellowstone Lake to Fort Ellis, was made in 1873, by Captain W. A. Jones, U. S. Engineer. From this exploration it was learned that from Yellowstone Lake, by following the divide between Snake river and the lake drainage to the westward, the Valley of the Madison near the great Geyser basin can be easily reached, the only serious obstruction being the heavy timber. The valley of the Madison can doubtless be followed down to Fort Ellis, Bozeman, Gallatin, Helena, and the principal cities of Montana. Or from Yellowstone Lake the east bank of the lake and river might be followed as far as East Fork, and thence down the left bank to Bozeman over the route now traveled, which is a wagon road now as far as the great hot springs on Gardiner river. By the route taken by Captain Jones the distance from Bryan on the Northern Pacific railroad to Fort Ellis would be about 450 miles.

The Yellowstone Wagon Road Expedition, 1874.—The enterprise which built up Bozeman and the entire Gallatin country previous to 1874, grew restive under the restraints which the limited area of settlement entailed, and suggested to the people the propriety of opening up a great highway which would lead to the gateway of the mountains and thence to their favored valley. The advent of the Northern Pacific railroad surveyors in the fall of 1873, and the reports which members of that party rendered of the wealth of the Yellowstone country, heightened the interest in such an undertaking. This led to a discussion of the subject, and eventually to the organization of such an expedition.

A meeting to organize an expedition for opening up the Yellowstone country was held at Bozeman, January 17, 1874, with Major J. P. Bruce presiding. J. V. Bogart reported the success of the committee appointed to secure men and material for the expedition, and also reported that Gemmel and Sharp, of Madison county, were en route with an independent expedition. The explorers left Hunter's Springs February 17, 1874, one hundred and forty strong, under the following named officers elected by the members: Captain, B. F. Grounds; Lieutenant, William Wright; Adjutant, E. B. Way; Signal Officer, Hugh O'Donovan; and Secretary B. P. Wickersham. In addition to these, there was a council, composed of the following members of the expedition: F. B. Wilson, T. C. Burns, William Langston, Addison M. Quivey, D. A. Yates, George Miller, A. B. Ford, James Hancock and Joseph Brown. According to Addison M. Qvivey, the historian of this little army, the expedition traveled six hundred miles; was gone three months; had four fights with the Indians; had one man killed (Yates), two wounded; had seventeen horses killed, twenty wounded; killed about fifty Indians, and wounded nearly one hundred. The expedition did not fulfill the expectation of its promoters, but did all that, under the circumstances, seemed possible, to attain the object in view. In the following historical sketch compiled by Mr. Topping from conversations with Walter Cooper, J. V. Bogart, Gourley, Quivey, and others, these details of adventures are set forth:

A man named J. L. Vernon came to Bozeman in the fall of 1873. He had been with General Stanley on his trip up the Yellowstone and claimed that he had found gold in paying quantities at Rosebud creek, and being a very smooth talker he had convinced a great many of the truth of his story, and quite a large number agreed to go to that country in the spring. Another expedition was formed at Bozeman to open up the lower country for settlement, for which purpose many merchants and prominent men of this place contributed horses and supplies. The two parties concluded to join forces and doing so, met at Ed. Quinn's cabin on O'Rear creek in February of 1874, and elected Frank Grounds captain, William Wright as lieutenant and E. B. Way, adjutant. All told, the party numbered 149 and was composed of the best material in the country; many old Indian fighters and trappers from the Yellowstone and Bozeman, and adventurous miners, who would face anything for the chance of diggings, from all over the Territory, were with it. The party had two pieces of artillery, the old Big Horn gun and a twelve pound Howitzer from Fort Ellis. William Cameron (who had been in the artillery service during the civil war) was made chief gunner. Some of the party used pack animals but the greater number had their baggage and provisions transported in wagons of which there were twenty-two. Starting on the 13th of February, the command moved slowly down on the north side of the river. The grass was very poor and the horses could not be worked hard, and no more than ten miles a day was averaged through the whole trip. There was nothing of interest happened to the party till about the last of February. The men did not want to dig rifle pits and the older heads in the party thought that it would be necessary to have a scare; so two men were to fire their rifles in the hills and come in crying "Indians!" This they did well and it had the desired effect, and trenches were dug at every camp after this. Vernon had gone ahead from Quinn's with a small party, and when near Pompey's Pillar, turned back and joined the expedition near Canyon creek, and traveled with it till it came near Pompey's Pillar. He, knowing that all his talk were lies, left the party, and with one companion (Rockafellow) went to the Missouri and down that river in a boat. On the way down he and his companion quarreled and Vernon cut his comrade badly with a knife, when just above Fort Buford, and nothing more has been heard from him since that time. On the 20th of March the expedition crossed the Yellowstone on the ice about four miles below the mouth of Porcupine creek and laid over here for five days, while a party of twelve men went on a prospecting trip up the Porcupine. On the evening of the 25th, the prospectors came in and reported no gold, and the next morning the expedition started and leaving the river struck across the country on an Indian trail to the Rosebud. When about eight miles out from the river, Bill Hineman and Charles Dryden (who had gone ahead hunting), came rushing their horses into the train and just after them were seventeen Sioux. As the Indians saw the party they wheeled to the left and went up on a hill to have a better look at it. The Indians were stripped down for a fight and had left their robes, blankets, extra moccasins and dried meat, in a hollow about half a mile away. The advance guard from the train dashed ahead and found and captured the cache. The night camp was made just beyond this, on a high ridge, and water for cooking had to be brought from a gulch three quarters of a mile away. The next day ten miles were made, and, as the night before, the camp was far from water. The next day they traveled but about eight miles and made camp at noon. After dinner a small party went ahead to choose the course for the morrow's trip. When they were about a mile away and just as they were going up a sharp hill, on whose top was a thick growth of pines, George Herendeen, who was about fifty yards behind looked up and saw an Indian running in the timber. He instantly fired, and cried Indians. The boys ran back and divided in two parties as the Sioux commenced firing. One part of the whites would fire rapidly while the other would retreat for about fifty yards, then the latter would stop and protect the retreat of the former. They were soon met by a party from camp, and the Indians retreated. At this time Bostwick was stationed as a picket near the upper end of a long, sloping ridge to the right of the camp. On the point of a ridge, just beyond and running parallel with this at about 600 yards distance, the Indians sat down and had a smoke; after having done this, two of them walked toward Bostwick and made signs for him to come and meet them as they wished to talk. He walked his horse toward them and while crossing a little gulch which put him out of sight of them for a moment, six of the Indians came rushing over the hill and were within thirty feet before he saw them. He fired his Winchester and, wheeling his horse, ran back at full speed; they having better horses, kept close up and shot him in four places. Bostwick emptied the magazine of his rifle at them, but hit none. The ammunition of the Indians must have given out for one had out his bow and was fitting an arrow to the string to finish his victim, when Jack Bean (who was a picket on the same ridge as Bostwick, about a quarter of a mile below him) came galloping up the hill at the full speed of his horse; he saw that to save Bostwick he must be lively, so jumping off he took quick aim, and, firing, broke the arm of the bowman, and stopped the headway of the pursuers. Bostwick rode just over the brow of the hill and fell off his horse. By this time Jack Yates had joined Bean and together they held the Indians off while a party carried Bostwick to camp. His wounds disabled him for a long time but he eventually recovered. One Indian must have been badly wounded or killed by Bean and Yates for next morning the party found a bloody trail, where a body had been dragged through a snow drift just beyond where the Indians had been last seen. Every night when coming into camp the wagons were drawn into an oval shape and chains were stretched between them to stop the gaps, and the stock were tied inside. This night the corral had been made too small and the oxen had to be herded outside. At about 10 o'clock, Dick Robinson, one of the herders saw an Indian sneaking around, and, firing at him, saw him fall. At about eleven a mounted party came quite near and fired into camp; the bullets went high and did no damage. The horses were unaccustomed to shooting and tried to stampede, but with the aid of shovel handles were soon soothed. As the Indians charged in, the one who had been wounded earlier in the evening commenced talking to draw their attention. They rode to where he lay, which place, unbeknown to them, was near to a rifle pit, that had in it five men who opened fire. None of the Indians were killed outright but in the morning several pools of blood were found on the ground where they had stood. Several shots were fired into camp from long range the next morning, and twenty men scouted around the outside while the horses fed. The expedition traveled ten miles this day and made a high camp just where the country began to slope to the Rosebud. Here three men were chosen to make a scout every morning before the stock was turned out to feed. The names of these men were Stewart Buchanan, Harry Wilson and Yank Evarts. Next morning their report was to the effect that the Indian party had divided, some going up the Rosebud and some going down, and Buchanan gave as his opinion that there would be no more fighting till the main Indian camp came up, then look out.

During the afternoon of the second day from this the expedition came to Rosebud, and crossing made their camp on a bench about four hundred yards from the creek. Just above the camp was a fresh Indian trail about thirty feet wide. This rather stirred the boys up, and even the dead-heads and coffee-coolers of the party dug rifle pits with vigor. No Indians showed themselves during the day, but just after dark groups of them could be dimly seen in every direction. One of these were fired into by some pickets, who only succeeded in breaking a horse's leg. At about eleven the Indians commenced hooting like owls, and a flock of geese happening to fly over camp, the Indians changed their tune and made the night hideous trying to imitate them. Some of the horses had been picketed outside of the corral, and their owners went after them, but the arrows flew so thick that they weakened and came back. At about one in the morning a shot was fired by an Indian near by, and the dogs, of which there were three, went out barking; only one came back, and he was shot through, and the arrow was sticking in him. As he slowly drew himself over the breastworks a hundred shots must have been fired at him by the Indians. The dogs killed were eaten by the savages during the night within seventy-five yards of the corral. Just after the dog episode there came through the darkness the sonorous voice of an Indian declaiming: when he ceased a bell tinkled, then from every direction came a sheet of flame, then the hiss and thud of bullets, then a heavy report and silence. Volleys came at intervals for two hours, and were always heralded by the bell. When that sound was heard all in the corral would lie down in their rifle pits, and, as the bullets went high, they did no harm to life or limb, but two canvas lodges, which were put up at either end of the corral, were shot all to pieces. There had been a rifle pit dug just at the edge of the bench, about fifty yards from the breastworks. It had been deserted by its occupant when the fight commenced and had been taken possession of by an Indian, who must have had a muzzle-loading rifle, for he fired very slowly. His position commanded that part of the corral where the horses were tied, and the Indian was killing or wounding a horse at every shot. The riflemen had tried in vain to dislodge him, and Cameron was called on to take a shot at him with the big gun. He cut the fuse short on a shell and, depressing the piece, fired. The Indian had put a large piece of dry wood in front of him, under which he had been firing, and when the shell struck this it exploded, and the Indian must have been torn into fragments, for no more bullets came from this place during the fight. From the time the fight commenced till now the Sioux had been constantly screeching and howling. When the Big Horn gun went off every white man in the party yelled, and from this time to the end of the trip the Indians fought silently. When morning broke the heaviest firing came from an ash grove at about one hundred and twenty-five yards distance. Cameron gave it two quick doses of cannister, and no more shots were fired from there. As soon as it became light enough to see their gunsights properly, the boys did some fine shooting. Several Indians were hit in the forehead as they raised to take aim; but, becoming more cautious, the reds would raise a hand holding a pistol above the bank and shoot without aim. Quite a number were hit in the wrist while doing this. Running with the long way of the corral, and at about fifty yards distance from it, was a little coulie that had served as a shelter for the Indians all night. Quite a steady fire was kept up from this, and many of the stock was being hit, and something had to be done; so a charging party was organized to go in three parties, one to the mouth of the coulie, one from the upper end of the corral to strike the same coulie above the Indians, and another, the strongest part, to go straight across and jump right among the Sioux. When the chargers were ready to start the big guns were fired, and all of the men on the coulie side of the corral fired rapidly to keep the Indians' heads down. As the party started all firing ceased. In a few seconds' time the centre party was over the hill, and were dealing death to the almost paralyzed Sioux, who, dropping guns and everything, fled for dear life. Exactly how many of the Indians were killed in the charge is not known, but there were nine left in the coulie; these were scalped, and twenty-three horses, eight guns, a quantity of buffalo robes, blankets, moccasins, and several packages of dried meat and pemmican were captured. The horses captured came in good play, for twenty-one of the horses belonging to the expedition were killed in the corral. Just after the charge on the coulie a small party dashed into the bluffs on the other side of the corral. They succeeded in killing two crippled Indians and driving the others off. Just after this an Indian, mounted on a handsome horse, and who was wearing a fine war bonnet, came out to make a bravo ride; his course lay along the bench, and he was about five hundred yards away. About thirteen of the boys fired a volley at him; the horse dropped dead, and the warrior staggered to a coulie and out of sight. When examined later the horse was found to be hit by nine bullets. An Indian now came out on a prominent point and fired two shots from a pistol in quick succession, and all of the Indians disappeared, to appear no more at this camp. The only man touched by a bullet in this fight was Tom Woodward, who was shot through the wrist. The party concluded to lie over a day, and, thinking that the Indians would come again, they dug a large rifle pit across the coulie, in which thirty men stayed the next night. Some of the party wished to take the back track, so a vote was taken on the question, but a large majority said go on, and the minority acquiesced. The boys were fond of practical jokes, so next morning before leaving camp they poisoned with strychnine some pemmican and biscuits, and left them carelessly around the camp. These baits did their work, as will be seen afterward. Cartridges were left from which the powder had been taken and dynamite put in its place. Next day the expedition traveled nine miles and made a camp at the Three Forks of the Rosebud. Preparations were made for a fight, for Indians had been seen in the hills along the line of march all day, but no attack was made. The party laid over the next day, and a large force sent ahead to prospect for a road. The middle fork, being the least rough, was chosen. So the next day they went up that to the divide between Rosebud and the Little Horn river and camped. Three buffalo were killed this evening, and were very welcome, for the Indians had kept the game run away from ahead of them for the last ten days. The expedition made ten miles the next day, and pitched their camp on a fork of the Little Horn river. Pits were dug, and the precaution taken of burning the grass off near camp. At about eight in the evening one of the pickets saw two queer acting wolves; he fired at them, and they jumped up on two feet and ran away. The stock was turned out to graze as usual the next morning, and the herders, of whom there were twenty, were taking it easy, without expectation of trouble, for no Indians had been seen.

Just at sunrise a picket on a hill about 500 yards from camp sang out "Indians, Indians." At this some of the guards and pickets ran in. One of the latter was in an embarrassing position, and had to leave his pistol and belt lying on the ground. The Sioux soon came in sight of those at camp, and were in three columns, each about two hundred strong. Both of the pieces of artillery were brought in operation against the advancing Indians, and the men in camp went out with a rush to protect the stock. Their reception was so warm that the Sioux weakened just before reaching the herd, and wheeling to the right and left went into the hills. As they turned one brave stayed a little behind his party and was making his horse caracole and show off. Jack Bean took a good aim and fired; in three jumps the horse went into a sag; just as the Indian went out of sight he threw one hand high over his head, and in a moment more the horse came out riderless, and turning, came straight to the band. The Indians were posted in some low hills about six hundred yards away, and were firing slowly at camp. A small party went out to scalp the Indian shot by Bean; when but a hundred yards away from camp one of them, named Zack Yates, was shot directly through the heart. He was carried back to camp, and Captain Grounds then ordered all to the breastworks to watch events. Soon after this twelve Sioux sneaked down a gulch, and with a short run, took possession of a hill that commanded the corral; from this point they killed one horse and wounded another. A charging party was made up, and as before, those in camp fired rapidly to keep the Indians from looking over the hill, while the run was made. The chargers went to the foot of the hill and rested, the enemy not knowing of their approach. After a moment's rest they ran up and over the hill to within forty feet of the Indians, who, panic stricken, mounted and away. The men were so blown by the run that they did poor shooting at first, but when at about 250 yards distance two of the Indians were knocked out of their saddles. Jack Bean had been shooting at all Indians that came near where the belt and pistol had been left, as the party did not want the Sioux to get anything that could be regarded as a trophy. Five of the boys started to get them; as they went out, all of the Indians in that vicinity, but one, left. This one had on a fine war bonnet and was riding a beautiful black horse; he was making his horse prance and was putting on too much style to suit the little party, so they all fired at him; one of the bullets hit him in the back of the head, and down he went; as he fell the lariat became entangled and stopped the horse. John Anderson wished the horse, and ran over to get him; as he came near the animal struggled and broke away, and Anderson, seeing he had no chance to catch the animal, shot and killed him. Anderson started for the Indian's scalp and war bonnet, but the bullets came so thick from the Sioux in the hills that he backed out and laid down in a buffalo wallow about fifty yards away. After a moment Anderson looked toward the supposed dead Indian and saw him getting up. Anderson drew his knife and made a run for him; the warrior tried to get his gun in position, but being yet a little dazed was too slow, for Anderson hit him with his left hand, then, with the knife in his right, cut a circling gash a foot long in the warrior's body. Anderson tried to scalp him, but again had to back out. Dr. Wickersham then tried it, but his knife was so dull that he could not, and in his anger he cut off and packed away the ears. Archie Campbell then gave it a trial, and succeeded in getting away with a piece of the scalp. To show how hot a place it was, 250 Indians were shooting from a distance not to exceed three hundred yards.

The Indians now drew off, and hitching up the stock, the expedition moved on. As they came in sight of the Little Horn river, a large band of elk was seen, which, for a short while was thought to be Indians. Camp was made on a flat, about half a mile from this stream. Twice during this afternoon the party tried to drive the stock to water; each time a large force of Indians dashed from the hill and the boys ran the horses back. Yates' body had been brought to this camp, and at night it was buried by a rifle pit so that the dirt thrown out would cover and hide the grave. The next day was stormy and the party laid over. In the forenoon they tried again to water the stock, and the Indians tried the same game as the day before, with the same result. There was a story current of a rich gold find on Goose creek (a fork of Tongue river), and many of the party wished to go to that place, and others wished to take the nearest way to the settlements; so a vote was taken, and the majority decided for Goose creek. The minority was composed of the most experienced men, and they argued this way: The savages now outnumber us ten to one, and within two weeks time the Sioux tribes will all come up, and by mere force of numbers will sweep us off of the face of the earth. So they determined to go back, even if the party had to be divided. After deliberation the majority concluded, that to split the party up would be death for all, and wisely agreed to go back. Next day a short march was made toward the Big Horn, and camp was pitched on a fork of Grass Lodge creek. Just after the pickets were put out a large force of Indians tried to cut them off, but, warned by those in camp, they mounted their horses and came in all right. Soon afterward an Indian came out on a point and made signs that he wanted to talk. Bill Hamilton talked by signs with him from a distance, while a few men crawled up a little coulie, to within about two hundred yards, and gave him a volley; he staggered over the hill apparently hit. As the Indians knew that they had killed a man two days before, the boys concluded to play them a trick; so a hole with slooping sides and about two feet deep was dug, and a shell (the very last one) put in. Two lanyards were attached to the cap and fastened one near each end of a board that run lengthways of the hole. A wagon was to be left here, and the bolts, chains, etc., were taken from it and put between the shell and board, and then the whole was covered with loose earth, piled up in the shape of a grave and a head-board put up. It was supposed the curosity of the Indians would induce them to open the grave, and if they did so, a pull on the board from either end would explode the shell. The guards were doubled this evening and several parties of Indians were seen and fired at during the night, but no attack was made. Next morning the train had to cross Grass Lodge at a steep place where the hills came close to the creek on the side at which they were, and one of the field pieces was posted on a point that commanded the ford, till the wagons were over, and then it was rushed across. Just above the ford was a thick grove of cottonwood that ran up and parallel with the creek; this was supposed to, and did, contain Indians. The train struck out towards the hills and kept as far from the grove as possible. There was a little party of men afoot on either flank and an advance and rear guard. We know from after developments, that the night before, 350 Cheyenne warriors, fresh from their agency, had joined the Uncapapas, and made their boasts that they would ride over the train in the morning. When the train came near the grove spoken of, the Cheyennes came out of it in line. The new white shirts which they all wore, made them appear like men in uniform. As they came charging, the rear guard and the right flankers came tumbling into the train, which corraled. About half of the left flankers (who were about 250 yards from the train and next to the Indians) ran in, leaving but five; one of these (Sweney) had a shell catch in the chamber of his Winchester, and he, against his will, had also to go in. The other four would drop on one knee and shoot, and then up and run a few steps toward the advancing Indians, who became demoralized by such audacity and swung around to the left in front of the train. The names of the four who stopped this dangerous charge by their reckless bravery, were Neil Gillis, Irving Hopkins, Tom Rea and French Pete. The advance guard used the same tactics as the flankers, till they gained a point that commanded the country in front, which point they held till the end of the battle. There was a coulie about 250 yards in the rear of the train; the Indians took possession of this as soon as 'twas deserted by the rear guard, and a hot galling fire was poured into the train from it. This had to be retaken, so about forty men charged it. There must have been 300 Indians in this ravine, and they fled like sheep as the chargers came in sight. The nerves of the chargers were so shaken by their hard run, that they did very poor shooting and only killed one Sioux, though they wounded several. Conger Smith captured a very fine horse in this charge, which next day was accidently shot by Bird Calfee. Just after this charge, which virtually ended the battle, the Indians were seen riding swiftly back to the old camp, where the shell had been burried. It was supposed that the shell had exploded, but nothing in regard to it was positively known till 1877, when a Cheyenne, who had been in the fight said that in going off it had killed one and wounded six others, two of the latter being squaws.

A short time afterward two warriors came out on a point near the old camp, and one, taking a rest fired at the train; the bullet struck the ground inside the corral and just under a horse. Jack Bean took a rest and careful aim and returned the compliment, and when it was time for the bullet to get there, the Indian shot at dropped. Several who were looking at the Indian with glasses, declared that the ball had hit him. The distance between the parties must have been nearly a mile. Jack used a long range rifle (120-grain Sharp's) and had made several very effective shots during the trip. This shot was the last fired with hostile intent during the trip, and the party traveled to their second camp beyond the Big Horn river without incident; they took every precaution, but the hostiles showed themselves no more.

At the camp spoken of, which was on Beauvais creek, a small party, while hunting on the stream above named, came on to an apparently deserted lodge standing in a short bend of the creek, near to a high face of rock. The canvass of which it was made had in it several bullet holes; on the ground near by were many cut pieces of wolf skin; upon looking inside the hunters found the remains of two white men that had been killed about four months before. There were bullet marks in several places on their skeletons, and one of them had been shot through with an arrow that lodged in a rib on the opposite side. The lodge poles showed bullet holes ranging down, and the conclusions reached by the party were that they had been attacked by the Sioux at night, and while asleep, and that the volleys that killed them came from the cliff above. No doubt exists in the minds of those informed of the circumstances, that these were the bodies of Joseph Lee and George Ackerly; for this was the place to which they had expressed their intention of going the fall before.

At the next camp the expedition made there came in a war party of Crows who were greatly elated at the sight of the scalps and other trophies, and borrowed them all; they made a glorious night of it, singing and dancing. The whole Crow tribe expected utter annihilation for the party, and were greatly gratified to hear of the outcome. From accounts given by the Sioux themselves afterwards, the party killed near a hundred warriors, but they secured but eleven scalps, for an Indian will go much farther to protect a dead comrade from mutilation than he will for a live one, for in their religion the belief is, that none can go to the happy hunting ground till after a long probation, if their scalp has been taken. Till the last fight all of the Indians engaged were Uncapapas; many pieces of flour sacks were found on the trip, and they were all branded Durfie & Peck, showing plainly that they were Fort Peck Indians. In the last fight they were joined by some Cheyennes and Ogalallas, making altogether about 1,600 warriors. There was another thing found and the reader can draw his own conclusions. Scraps of newspapers were picked up and captured from dead Indians, and all of the pieces were parts of the Christian Advocate. The party had twenty-three horses killed, but more than made the loss good by capturing twenty-five. Many robes, blankets, moccasins, medicine bags, war bonnets and other trophies were captured. Major Reed and Bowles, were sent with dispatches from Bozeman to the expedition. They came to the scene of the Rosebud fight, about two weeks after that occurrence, and concluding that it would be too dangerous to follow, they turned back. They reported having seen four dead Indians in the camp, that had apparently died by poison. 'Twas found out afterward that several Indians had been injured by the explosion of the dynamite cartridges, and they became so cautious that they would handle nothing left by the whites. The expedition disbanded at the Yellowstone.

The Forsyth and Grant Expedition, 1875.—The object of this expedition was the examination of the Yellowstone river and valley; the first for the purpose of obtaining such knowledge of the river as might lead to its navigation by steamboats, and the second for the purpose of learning the value which the agriculturist might attach to lands in the eastern and southeastern portions of the Territory. The results of this examination were set forth in two reports by Lieutenant-colonels J. W. Forsyth and F. D. Grant.

The expeditions of Captain Fisk, Beers and others, being directly connected with the settlement of special districts, are noticed in the local history.

The explorations up to 1875, referred to in the foregoing pages, together with Sibley's, Sully's, Ludlow's, and the annual visit of General Sheridan may be said to cover the entire Territory. The United States geological and topographical surveyors continue their work down to the present day; while a number of private engineers, both residents and visitors, are industrious in their explorations and descriptions of the many districts which have hitherto remained unnoticed, or, if noticed, mentioned very briefly. The recent explorations under the Northern Pacific railroad engineers; the surveys under the Surveyor-general of the Territory, and explorations under officers of the United States Engineers' Corps, are all so closely connected with modern progress that the facts contained in their reports are summarized and introduced into the chapters devoted to Territorial and County history, while military expeditions find a record in the history of Indian wars.

CHAPTER II.

INDIAN HISTORY.

MONTANA from the earliest times has offered a home to the Indians. Years before the Spaniard settled in Mexico, the Indian was here. Volumes might be filled with the history of this race among the mountains, and yet volumes would remain to be written on its changes, wars and wanderings, even from the date of early events in tribal history, recorded in the history of explorations and settlement. Here, however, its written history can only be given. At the close of the year 1884, the Blackfeet, Bloods and Piegans of Montana numbered 7,500; the Mountain Crows, 2,150; Flatheads, Pen d'Oreilles and Kootenais, 1,607; Yanktonais Sioux of the Missouri, 4,043; Assiniboines, 1,469; Assiniboines of the Missouri, 997; Gros Ventres, 1,135, and River Crows, 900, giving a total Indian population of about 20,000. The Indian reservations of the Crows, Piegans and Flatheads alone contained 29,559,000 acres, or over 46,186 square miles of land. Of this great acreage the leading tribe in intelligence—the Flatheads—claim only 1,669,000 acres, while the Piegans claim 22,048,000 acres, and the Crows, 5,842,000 acres of the lands of Montana. Of the 20,000 Indians only 1,295 have adopted the dress of civilization, and only 486 are engaged in civil industry, of whom 171 are agriculturalists. In 1884 the Government expended $7,966 on Indian schools here, which were attended by only 287 out of 4,263 Indian children of school age. In the separate schools, however, a much larger number of Indian youths are instructed. The entire area cultivated by the tribes does not exceed 5,000 acres, while the other millions of acres are devoted to 30,000 horses and a few thousand head of cattle.

Early Treaties.—The treaty of Fort Laramie, though never proclaimed, was the first that described the territories which were accepted by the Indians best known to the early settlers of Montana. This treaty was negotiated by D. D. Mitchell and Thomas Fitzpatrick, September 17, 1851, and defined the following described territories as the reservations of the several tribes: The territory of the Sioux or Dacotahs extended from the mouth of the White Earth river to the Forks of the Platte, up the North Fork to the Red Butte; thence via the Black Hills to the head of the Heart river; thence to the mouth of the Heart, and down the Missouri to the White Earth river. The territory of the Gros Ventres, Mandans and Arrickarees commenced at the mouth of the White Earth river; thence up the Missouri to the Yellowstone; thence up the Yellowstone to the Powder; thence along the Black Hills to the head of Heart river, and down that river to the place of beginning. The Assiniboines were given the country from the mouth of the Yellowstone, up the Missouri to the Muscleshell; thence to the head-waters of Big Dry creek; down that creek to the Yellowstone, and thence down the Yellowstone to its mouth. The Blackfeet country commenced at the mouth of the Muscleshell; thence up the Missouri to its source; thence along the Rocky mountains to the head-waters of the northern source of the Yellowstone, down the Yellowstone to Twenty-five Yard creek; thence across the head of the Muscleshell, and down that river to its mouth. The Crows were to occupy the country commencing at the mouth of Powder river, up Powder river to its source, along the main range of the Black Hills and Wind River mountains to the Geyser park or head-waters of the Yellowstone, down the Yellowstone to the mouth of Twenty-five Yard creek; thence to the head of Muscleshell, down the Muscleshell to its mouth; thence to the head of Big Dry creek, and thence to its mouth. In addition to those tribal districts the Cheyennes and Arrapahoes were granted a large territory extending from the North Fork of the Platte down to the crossing of the Arkansas river by the Sante Fé trail.

The superintendents of Indian affairs for Montana from 1864 to 1873, when the office was abolished, were Sidney Edgerton, 1864–5; Thomas Francis Meagher, 1865–6; Green Clay Smith, 1866–8; James Tufts, 1869, as successor to Governor Smith in the Executive Office; Alfred Sully, Brigadier-General United States Army, 1869; Jasper A. Viall, 1870–2, and James Wright, December 19, 1872, to June 30, 1873.

Missoula and Cœur d'Alene Indians.—The Flatheads were the first Indians of all the tribes known in Montana to embrace the faith of the white race, and to give evidences of their desire to emerge from the barbarous condition of the northern savage. In other pages the story of their interest in the tales of the half-breed and Iroquois trappers is told: how they conceived an idea of the Black Gowns; how they dispatched their savage messengers to distant St. Louis, and the success which ultimately crowned their perseverance in this search for the Christian's faith, are all set forth. The Cœur d'Alenes resemble the Flatheads in physique, manners and customs. They followed the example of the last named tribe, adopted a policy of peace with the whites, and entered on that career which distinguished the Flathead nation from all tribes west of the Mississippi. Louise Sighouin, of the Cœur d'Alenes, or Skizoumish Indians, was met by Father De Smet in October, 1841, while she and her friends were returning from a bison hunt on the Upper Missouri. When the great missioner visited the Cœur d'Alenes, in April, 1842, it was on invitation of the chiefs who came to St. Mary's mission to seek for a Black-gown to go among them. Among the first received into the church was Louise, and to her, next to the example of the Jesuits, must the conversion of the entire tribe be credited. Chief Loyola was a similar character among the Kalispels. He was to St. Ignatius' mission what Louise Sighouin was to St. Mary's.

The Kootenays, of the Skalzi race, are an exemplary people. Father De Smet, writing under date December 1, 1861, speaks of them thus: "The beau ideal of the Kootenay and Flatbow Indians (known under the general name of Skalzi) character, uncontaminated by contact with the whites, is found here. What is most pleasing to the stranger is to see their simplicity, united with sweetness and innocence, keep step with the most perfect dignity and modesty of deportment. The gross vices which dishonor the red man on the frontier are unknown to them. The Hudson's Bay Company, during the forty years that it has been trading in furs with them, has never been able to perceive that the smallest object had been stolen from them. The agent takes his furs down to Colville every spring, leaving the store in the care of an Indian, who trades in the name of the company. On the return of the agent this Indian renders a most exact account of his trust." Father De Smet was the first who induced the chiefs of these tribes to go beyond their recognized hunting grounds. "April 16th, 1859," says this missionary priest, "in accordance with the orders of the Commander-in-chief of the army, I went to Fort Vancouver, and left the mission of St. Ignatius. At my request all the chiefs of the different mountain tribes accompanied me to renew the treaty of peace with the General and with the Superintendent of Indian affairs. I give their names and the nations to which they belonged. Alexander Temglagketzin, or the Man-without-a-horse, great chief of the Pen d'Oreilles; Victor Alamiken, or the Happy Man (he deserves this name, for he is a saintly man), great chief of the Kalispels; Adolphus Kwilkweschape, or Red Feather, chief of the Flatheads; Francis Saya, or the Iroquois, another Flathead chief; Denis Zenemtietze, or the Thunder's Robe, chief of the Schuyelpi or Chandieves; Andrew and Bonaventure, chiefs and braves among the Cœur d'Alenes, or Skizoumish; Kamiakin, great chief of the Yacomans; and Gerry, great chief of the Spokanes. On the 18th of May the interview took place. It produced most happy results on both sides. About three weeks' time was accorded the chiefs to visit, at the cost of the government, the principal cities and towns of the State of Oregon and Washington Territory. The visit which appeared most to interest the chiefs was that which they made to the prison at Portland, and its wretched inmates, whom they found chained within their cells. They were particularly interested in the causes, motives and duration of their imprisonment. Chief Alexander kept it all in his mind. Immediately on his return to St. Ignatius' mission he assembled his people, and related to them all the wonders of the whites, and especially the history of the prison. 'We,' said he, 'have neither chains nor prisons; and for want of them, no doubt, a great number of us are wicked and have deaf ears. As chief, I am determined to do my duty: I shall take a whip to punish the wicked; let all those who have been guilty of any misdemeanor present themselves; I am ready.' The known guilty parties were called upon by name, many presented themselves of their own accord, and all received a proportionate correction." This was the initiatory movement in that law which now prevails among the Indians round the Catholic missions.

At the celebration of the feast of St. Ignatius, held July 31, 1884, Charlo, the head chief of the confederated tribes of the Flathead nation, not being present, the command and direction of the Indians on this occasion was shared by Michell, Arlee, Battice and Joseph, who maintained the best of order through their regularly organized police soldiers. Among the notables present were Michell, chief of the Pen d'Oreilles; Joseph, son of the grand chief of the Calispels, and the head captain of the police soldiers; Battice, acting chief of the Pen d'Oreilles and captain of the police soldiers; Arlee, chief of the Agency band of Indians. Representatives from the distant Flatheads, Kootenays, Pen d'Oreilles and Calispels were present. Also the Rt. Rev. J. B. Brondel, bishop of Helena, the Rev. Father Catalda, Superior General of the order of Jesuits in the Rocky mountains; the Revs. Van Gorp, Palladino, Bandini, Tremblay, Guidi, and Dols. Among the visitors were Major Ronan, agent of the Flatheads; Thomas A. Tutt, wife and two daughters and niece from St. Louis; Mr. Post, from St. Louis; Mrs. Joseph Murphy and her daughter Eva and two sons from St. Louis; Colonel Charles D. Curtis and wife and children, Major Robert C. Walker, U. S. A., and Miss Helen Galen, of Helena; Mrs. Jack Demers and Raphael Bisson, of Frenchtown; Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Demers, Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Lambert, of the reservation, Mr. Baird, and others.

The Flathead agency comprised 1,283 Indians in 1876, of which number 604 were males and 679 females. The Pen d'Oreilles numbered 858, the Kootenays 339, and the Flatheads removed from the Bitter Root 86, and 295 still in the Bitter Root valley. Chief Michel ruled the Pen d'Oreilles, and punished offenders by whipping on the bare back. The Flatheads were very obedient, and crimes were rare. The general agency of these Indians is at Jocko, about 30 miles north from Missoula. The agent, Major P. Ronan, is a man of great nerve, an intelligent gentleman, and has wonderful control over the Flatheads. There are about 350 of these Indians in the Bitter Root valley, near Stevensville, twenty miles distant. The principal chiefs are Charlos, band 350; Arlee, or Henri, reservation Flat heads, band 120; Michel, Pen d'Oreilles, band 1,000; and Æneas, American Kootenais, band 500.

Indian Treaties with Far Northwestern Tribes.—The Treaty of Wasco, Oregon, June 25, 1885, was negotiated by Joel Palmer, Indian superintendent, and the chiefs of the Tiah De Chutes band of Walla-Wallas; of the Wyam De Chutes; of the Tenino band of Walla-Wallas; of the Dockspur Walla-Wallas; of the Dalles band of Wascoes; of the Kigaltwalla band of Wascoes, and of the Dog River band of the last named tribe. The bands ceded to the United States the country from the Cascade falls of the Columbia south to the Cascade mountains, east to the Blue mountains, thence to the Snake country, thence to the head of Willow creek, and thence down the Columbia to the Cascade falls, with the exception of the De Chutes river reservation. In consideration of this cession the savages were to receive $8,000 annually for five years; $6,000 annually for succeeding five years; $4,000 annually for next succeeding period of five years; and $2,000 annually for the last term of five years. Together with the foregoing grants, the sum of $50,000 was to be advanced to them in goods when the treaty was signed. A flouring mill, hospital, school, sawmill, blacksmith shop, wagon and plow factory, a farmer, a physician, and the whole outfit of a perfect Indian agency were to be provided.

The treaty with the Flatheads, Kootenay, and Up. Pen d'Oreilles was negotiated at Hell Gate in the Bitter Root valley, July 16, 1855, by Isaac I. Stevens, Governor and Superintendent of Indian affairs, with Victor, the head chief of the confederated tribes. This treaty provided for the cession to the United States of the country from the main ridge of the Rocky mountains at Lat. 49 deg. N. west to the divide between the Flat Bow and Clark's Fork, thence S. and S. E. to the 115 deg. Long. W., thence S. W. to the Regia Borgia and Cœur d'Alene rivers, thence S. E. and S. along the main ridge of the Bitter Root mountains to the divide between the Koos-Koos-Kee and the S. W. fork of the Bitter Root; thence easterly along the divide to the main ridge of the Rocky mountains, and northerly along that ridge to Lat. 49 deg. N. The reservation from the territory so ceded comprised the lands in the neighborhood of the Crow, Prune, Sonielem and Jocko rivers. The treaty made provision for the survey of the Bitter Root valley above Lo Lo fork, should the President deem it better adapted to the wants of the Flatheads than some of the territory included in the described reservation.

Father De Smet, in his letter of May 28, 1859, to Captain Pleasanton, says:

"The upper portion of the river valley (Clark's Fork), and its upper tributaries, have a succession of large prairies of light soil filled with water-worn pebbles, indicating bottoms or beds of ancient lakes. All these prairies are covered with a luxuriant and nutritious grass, and owing probably to the position of the high mountains by which they are surrounded, they are little or not covered with snows in the winter season. Such are Thompson's prairie, Horse prairie, Camash prairie, Jaco prairie, Flathead Lake prairie, with several other grazing fields. Far and wide apart spots of less or more acres of arable land are found; but too few indeed to make it for years to come a thickly settled portion for the whites. The country of the Up. Clarke's Fork, the St. Mary's or Bitter Root valley, the valley of Hell's Gate Fork, the upper valleys on the Beaver head-waters, the Kootenay country within the 49th degree, appear to be laid out and designed by Providence to serve as reservations for the remnants of the various scattered tribes of Oregon and Washington Territory, at least for some years to come. This region, I think, might contain all the Indians, and afford them the means of subsistence." The remainder of this letter is complete in its plans for the settlement of the Indian question, plans which were feasible and would be acceptable; but which were cast aside in recognition of the aims of men less Christian-like and patriotic than the pure-minded man who submitted them to the government.

The treaty negotiated at the Flathead agency, Jocko, August 27, 1872, between the United States, represented by Commissioner James A. Garfield, and the Flathead Indians, represented by Charlot, Arlee and Adolf, chiefs, made very satisfactory provision for this tribe. The Congressional Act of June 22, 1874, provided that proceeds of sales of land in Bitter Root valley shall be paid into the United States treasury, and that in lieu of this amount a sum of $5,000 be appropriated annually for ten years to be expended in the interest of the Flatheads who had been removed from the valley, also providing that Indians of that tribe who have not settled on the Jocko reservation should not be countenanced in the distribution of moneys or merchandise. The commission empowered to treat with the Flatheads for passage of the Northern Pacific over the reservation, in August, 1882, completed their labors by agreeing to pay the sum of $16,000 for the right-of-way, and to reimburse all Indian farmers for damages upon their property. This right-of-way treaty does not sell to the road the land over which it passes; it simply allows the construction of the railroad over the same, and the reserve is just as much the Indians home now as heretofore. No white man is allowed to settle upon it, or to trade upon it, only the railway can construct such buildings as are necessary for the operation of their line over the reserve.

In January, 1884, Chief Charlo and sub-chiefs of the Flathead nation had a conference with the Secretary of the Interior at Washington, upon the proposition to remove the tribe, now in the Bitter Root valley, to the Jocko reservation. Senator Vest and Delegate Maginnis were present. Secretary Teller sought to convince Charles that the proposed change was for the best, as the Indians were at present brought into contact with white settlers and suffered thereby. He also told Charles the lands in the Jocko reservation intended for the use of his tribe would be sold unless occupied, and they would find themselves homeless. Senator Vest also endeavored to induce Charles to accept the proposition. A house on the reservation and an annuity of $500 was promised him, and other tempting offers made, but the old chief maintained a stubborn silence, and when the secretary offered him a paper to sign he refused it with an angry gesture. On February 4 a final conference was held. The Secretary consented to allow him to remain in Bitter Root provided he kept his people on their lands. Charles displayed during the several conferences great ability and knowledge of law, and to his dogged obstinacy is due his victory. He told Teller his people had patents to their lands and could not be legally dispossessed, and he would not listen to any proposition that looked to removal. When the interview ended, Charles, who during the several intervals had maintained a stolid, determined demeanor, wore a bright smile and was chuckling with his companions over their "victory over the whites."

The agents of the Flathead Agency since 1864 are named as follows:—Charles Hutchins, agent; appointed February 20, 1864; service terminated in 1865. Augustus H. Chapman, agent; appointed September 22, 1865; service terminated in 1866. John W. Wells, agent; appointed November 9, 1866; died in 1868. M. M. McCauley, agent; appointed July 25, 1868; suspended from office in the spring of 1869. A. S. Galbreath, Major United States Army, detailed by War Department for duty as agent, June 11, 1869; relieved in 1870. G. E. Ford, Lieutenant U. S. A., detailed in 1870, and relieved the same year. Charles S. Jones, agent; appointed September 9, 1870; suspended in 1872. Daniel Shanahan, agent; appointed November 15, 1872; resigned in 1874. Peter Whaley, agent; appointed May 2, 1874; suspended in 1875. Charles S. Medary, agent; appointed April 30, 1875. Major Ronan, the present agent, is considered one of the ablest and trustiest of all the public servants connected with the Indian Department.

The Crows.—The Crows, Blackfeet, Piegans, Acarees, Rees, Bloods, Gros Ventres, Flatheads, and Pen d' Oreilles ranged along the Yellowstone from the earliest times, but none of them acquired possessory rights until the latter part of the eighteenth century, when the Crows claimed title to the valley from the mountains to the mouth of Tongue river, while the Rees held the country at the mouth of the Yellowstone. The buffalo country between these tribes was held in common until the Sioux drove the Western tribes before them on their way to the North Missouri country.

The Mountain Crows are old inhabitants of the Yellowstone valley, their settlement antedating the movement of the Sioux west of the shores of the great lakes. In other pages the policy pursued by this tribe toward the whites, as well as their wars with the Sioux, Piegans, Blackfeet and Western bands are described. The River Crows are contemporary settlers with the Mountain Crows; although separated from the latter by the Yellowstone. These savages claimed the country from the mouth of the Musselshell to Fort Benton, and south of the Missouri to the Yellowstone. In 1865 the Sioux entered into a plan for a confederation of the Western tribes; but the Crows refused to become allies, although it is thought that members of this tribe attacked Stuart's party in 1863, and assaulted three white men in 1875, but apart from those there are no charges against them. From 1865 down to the present day the Sioux are deadly enemies of the treaty-loving Crows. Every month afforded evidences of this bitter feeling. In November, 1869, there was a battle between the Crows and Cheyennes, within the bounds of the Sioux country, in which the former were the victors. Six Cheyennes were killed and four young warriors captured. The Crows exposed their captives to torture, first cutting off their hands, next their feet, and finally their heads. Again, in August, 1872, the terrific encounter between the Sioux and Crows at Hart Mountain, tended to increase their hatred. Whether opposed to Piegans, Nez Perces or Sioux, the Crow nation has always been found the principal Indian aids of the United States troops and to them must be given the credit of saving many a company of United States soldiers from a fate similar to that of Custer's command.

The story of Tezi-Goe was published at Brussels, Belgium, in September, 1854, from the relations of Father De Smet. A few years ago Major Ronan gave this story to the American press, and to-day it forms the leading event in the history of the Blackfeet and Crow wars. The scene is laid in the valley of the Marias, near the Great Falls, in 1843. (See Historical Collections.)

Battle of the Butte.—Early in the winter of 1864, twenty-nine young Crow warriors went to the Brule Sioux camp on the Missouri, where the Mandan village is now situated, to steal horses, and after much watching succeeded in obtaining 600 head, of which 300 horses were controlled by six of the abductors. The Brule Sioux discovered their loss, and soon 500 warriors were on the trail of the Crows, who overtook the six unlucky Crows at a butte, eighty miles west of the Missouri. The latter left their stolen horses and went up the butte, while the twelve Crows in charge of the second herd of 300 horses, pushed forward eight miles in advance. The latter on hearing the reports of the Sioux rifles, hurried back to aid their six brothers, arrived at the butte, and at once began to fortifiy the position. This was circumvalated by the Sioux. At the end of three days there were five Crow warriors killed, and the remaining fifteen being out of ammunition, water and provisions determined to end their trials, and so with knife in hand made a sortie, killed 100 Sioux, and then fell themselves. The hill on which this tragedy was enacted is called Young Men's Butte.

Treaties with Crows.—The treaty proclaimed February 6, 1826, for the purpose of perpetuating friendship between the United States and the Crow tribe was negotiated by Brigadier-General Henry Atkinson, U. S. A., and Major Benjamin O'Fallon, Indian agents. The treaty of Fort Laramie, May 7, 1868, made by General Sherman and associate commissioners, with Che-Ra-Pee-Ish-Ka-te, Chat-sta-He and other chiefs of the Crow tribe, provided for the punishment of criminal acts, and reserved to them the country beginning on the southern boundary of Montana, 107 deg. west longitude, north to the middle channel of the Yellowstone, thence up the Yellowstone to latitude 45 deg. north and east along the line of latitude 45 deg. north to longitude 107 deg. west, on the southern line of Montana. An agency was to be established at Otter creek, south of the Yellowstone, and the usual staff of Indian civilizers was to be sent among them. The Crow Reserve was established under order of President Grant, on the order of January 31, 1874, setting off the territory, beginning at a point on the Missouri river, opposite the mouth of Shaakin creek, thence to the head of that creek, along the summit of the divide between the waters of the Arrow and Judith rivers, and the waters entering the Missouri river to the point opposite the divide between the head waters of the Judith and the Muscleshell rivers, along this divide to the Snowy mountains, and along the summit of these mountains, in a northeasterly direction to a point nearest the divide between the waters which run eastwardly to the Musselshell river and the waters running to the Judith river; thence northwardly along this divide, to the divide between the head of Aumell's creek and Dog river, and along said divide to the Missouri river, and up the middle of the Missouri to the place of beginning, the territory named comprising the country drained by the Judith, Arrow and Dog rivers. In 1873, P. Brunot, one of the Indian commissioners, came to the Yellowstone and made a treaty with the Crows, in which they ceded all of their lands on the Yellowstone waters to the government; in return for which, they were to have the Judith basin, and $200,000 per year. In February, 1875, orders came from the Interior Department at Washington to change the agency from Mission Creek to Stillwater. Agent Clapp put men to work and by the 1st of April, 1875, the buildings at the Crow headquarters near Stillwater, were far enough advanced to move into.

The Crows were pursuing a treaty-observing life throughout the Centennial year under the agent, Dexter E. Clapp. The introduction of whisky shops at the mouth of the Stillwater seduced many young men of the Mountain Crows. This last-named tribe numbered 1,500, while the River Crows numbered 1,000. The census of the Crow tribe, taken by John W. Powell in the fall of 1868, credited the tribe with 520 men, 745 women, 349 boys, and 349 girls.

The joint memorial of the Montana legislature, approved February 13, 1874, gave expression to opinions which coincided with those of the old and new settlers throughout the Territory. Such opinions, however, had no weight with the general government, when a course opposed to the interests of the people, and even of the Indians, might tend to enrich a clique, and the reservations were allowed to stand an obstruction to peace and progress until 1883, when the Mountain Crows were moved to a new reserve. General Sheridan, in his report for 1882, pointed out the absurdity of holding 6,000,000 acres of valuable land for a whole Crow nation of 3,470 souls, and recommended its sale.

The local legislature continued to discuss the question of vacating the Indian reservations from 1874 down to 1882. During this year Congressman Maginnis placed the matter before Congress in such practical form as to gain attention from that body. Through his representations a provision was attached to the Sundry Civil Service Bill empowering the appointment of a commission to treat with the Crows. In May, 1883, the Secretary of the Interior directed a recognition of mining claims of settlers upon the public lands in Montana ceded by the Crow Indians under agreement made June 12, 1880, and ratified by Congress April 12, 1882. The secretary held that these lands, being ceded by definite boundaries, became public lands upon the date of the approval of that act of ratification, and from that date the legal rights of settlers and claimants took effect. In November, 1882, Captain J. T. Blake arrived in Montana, his mission being the survey of the line between the Crow Reservation and that portion to be restored to the public domain. The starting point of the line is a monument on the boundary line between Wyoming and this Territory, established by Lieutenant Reeves. Special Agent Milburn, of the Indian office, left Washington May 10, 1883, for the Crow Reservation to co-operate with Mr. Armstrong, agent of the Crows, in making arrangements for the removal of that tribe to the valleys of the Little and Big Horn rivers. The sale of the buildings of the old Crow Agency took place August 13, 1883.

The Indian agents at the Crow Agency from 1864 were: H. M. Matthews, special agent for the Mountain Crows; appointed by Commissioner of Indian Affairs, November 15, 1867; service ceased in 1869. (The "Mountain" and "River" Crows were subsequently brought under one agency and a regular agent placed in charge.) J. P. Cooper, special agent for Prairie Crows, was appointed October 4, 1867; service ceased in 1869. (Cooper was succeeded by E. M. Camp, Captain U. S. A.) W. J. McCormick, special agent for Indians near Virginia City, Montana, was appointed April 23, 1867; service ceased January 4, 1869. W. J. Cullen, special agent for Indians in Montana, was appointed April 9, 1868; service ceased in same year. E. M. Camp, Captain U. S. A.; detailed by War Department for duty as agent in July, 1869; relieved in 1870. F. D. Pease, agent, was appointed September 9, 1870; suspended from office July, 1873. James Wright, agent, appointed July 17, 1873; resigned in 1874. Dexter E. Clapp, agent, was appointed October 4, 1874. Under this administration the agency was moved from Mission Creek to Stillwater, in March and April, 1875. Under Agent Armstrong the headquarters of the tribe were moved to the new agency in 1883.

Mountain Sioux.—The Sioux of the mountains are represented by the Assiniboines, Blackfeet, Bloods, Piegans, Gros Ventres, and a mongrel band of Surcees. All were notorious for their cruelty and treachery; yet from a lengthy catalogue of their atrocities a few instances can be brought forward where savage principle was adhered to, as in the case of Colter, the story of whose escape is given in other pages. These tribes have also produced a few great examples of Indian friendliness in the past, and even now when the spirit of their nation is broken, men may be found among them who estimate the worth of civilization, and make an effort to follow in her paths. Little Dog, present chief of the Piegans, is one of such men. The Assiniboines derive their name from the fact that they were accustomed to cook their meat on red hot stones; hence Assin-buân or Sioux of the stones. The name was doubtless bestowed by the Otchipwes, who in their incursions saw this prairie tribe pick up buffalo chips and light a fire. The eastern savages supposed their enemies were picking up the stones, and returning to the Jesuit mission, told the missionaries that they had seen the Assinbuân, or people who roast something on stones. In later years, when the Jesuit fathers pushed their missions westward, the country on which the chip-burners dwelt was called Assinibona, and river the Assiniboine. The Stone Sioux used skins to cover their wigwams generally; but their permanent villages were either in the form of muskrat houses or beaver chambers. The Gros Ventres, like the Mandans, belong to the Dakota Sioux, and sprang directly from the Indians of the Assiniboine as a branch of the Minnetarees. They have always been the most savage of the northern Indians, and even in 1805 were foremost among the conspirators who proposed to destroy the expedition under Lewis and Clarke. At that time the leading band of this people was named Mahahas and dwelt along Knife river. The Blackfeet or Mountain Sioux, vary little in their natural qualities from the Gros Ventres. These Blackfeet are a cunning people, and like negroes at the polls, repeat their calls for government supplies on each side of the boundary line. The Piegans and Bloods are related to the Blackfeet and Gros Ventres. This relationship, together with the geographical position of the settlement, conduce to give the Union a large society of most disagreeable citizens.

The following story from the lips of Father De Smet, S. J., the great Indian missionary, is worthy of record. It is given, as nearly as possible, in his own words: "In 1840, said he, "I visited the Blackfoot Indians, who, though they are a very warlike tribe, received me with a kind welcome. On this occasion I gave them a crucifix, merely explaining to them who Christ is, and how He died on the cross for them, to bring them to heaven with Himself. Again I paid them a visit in 1855, when I was still more warmly received and welcomed; in fact, with every mark of affection. This greatly surprised me, and I was going to ask the cause of it, when I was invited to a council of all the warriors of the tribe. I went, and soon found myself in the presence of their great men and of the chieftain himself, who wore on his breast the crucifix I had given him years before. When I was seated, you may guess my surprise and delight when he began his harangue to me by begging me to send them black-gowns to teach them the way to heaven. 'Black-gown,' said he, 'we know that what you teach us is true;' and when I asked what had brought this conviction to their minds, he told the following fact: 'Three snows ago, Black-gown,' said he, 'I and my warriors, thirty in all, went on the war-path against the Crow Indians, our enemies, and we entered their territory. We knew that the moment we entered their land we were beset with dangers, and therefore we took every precaution to prevent our track being discovered. Besides, when we camped for the night we built up a kind of fortress of dead wood to protect us, in case of a surprise, from their shots and arrows. Spite of all our care the Crow Indians discovered our trail, and during the dead of night surrounded us with a body very much larger than ours, and then raised their wild war-cry. We, who were within the enclosure, giving ourselves up for lost, began to sing our death-song, when I bethought myself of the crucifix which you, Black-gown, gave me, and of the words you said. I saw there was no hope but in it. Then I addressed my fellow-warriors, and I said to them: "Trust in Him who died on the cross for us!" and taking the crucifix I held it aloft in my hands and prayed to the Great Spirit to save us. I then kissed the crucifix and placed it on my head, and rubbed it over my arms and breast, and gave it to my companions. They all did the same. I took the crucifix in my hand and held it before me and told them all to follow. I burst through the palisade, right in the midst of the enemy, followed by all. Shots and arrows flew about us from every direction, yet, Black-gown, owing to the power of Him whom we invoked, we passed through unscathed, not even one of us being hurt. From that moment we all longed to see the black-gown again.' Black-gowns went and received 1,200 of this tribe into the Church."

Since Father De Smet's administrations to the Indians ceased, the United States Blackfeet decline to receive Christian teaching. On the Canadian side, however, the missions continued by Pere Lacombe and other priests of the Oblates have been maintained by these Indians.

The Blackfoot Agency controlled the Blackfeet, Bloods and Piegans in 1876, then numbering 3,000 males, 4,200 females and 220 mixed bloods. Of the entire number, 7,200, about 2,500 were under the immediate supervision of United States Indian Agent John S. Wood; while the remainder were directed by the council of chiefs. In July, 1876, the chiefs were invited to the Indian council at Cypress Mountain, and of them Little Plume attended. When the Santees and Yanktons proclaimed a war of extermination against the whites, Little Plume withdrew. During the year the tribe sold $60,000 worth of Buffalo robes, and had settled down to a life of savage industry.

The treaty of October 17, 1855, was negotiated near the mouth of the Judith river by A. Cumming and Isaac I. Stevens and the Blackfeet and other tribes of the Indians who then occupied the valleys of the Upper Missouri and Yellowstone rivers, including the Piegan, Blood and Gros Ventres east of the Rocky mountains, and the Flatheads, Upper Pen d'Oreille, Kootenay and Nez Perces west of the Rocky mountains. This treaty (Article IV.) bound these peoples to abstain from all hostilities against the Crows, Assiniboines, Crees, Snakes, Blackfeet, Sans Arcs and Aunce-pa-pas bands of Sioux and all neighboring tribes. The hunting grounds allowed the Blackfeet nation were bounded by lines drawn from Hell Gate or Medicine Rock passes of the Rocky mountains east to the nearest source of the Muscleshell river; thence to the mouth of Twenty-five Yard creek; thence up the Yellowstone to its northern source, and thence along the main range of the Rocky mountains to the point of beginning. Provided, That the Western Indians named in the treaty may hunt on the trail leading down the Muscleshell to the Yellowstone; that no permanent villages shall be located on this common hunting ground; that the rights of the Western Indians to a whole or part of the common hunting ground secured to them in the treaty of Fort Laramie shall not be protected. Article IV provided that the territory, within lines drawn from Hell Gate or Medicine Rock passes easterly to the nearest source of the Muscleshell river, down that river to its mouth, down the Missouri to the mouth of Milk river, due north to the forty-ninth parallel, west along forty-ninth parallel to the main range of the Rocky mountains, and south to the Hell Gate pass, should be the Blackfeet Indians' territory, subject, however, to rights guaranteed other bands or tribes.

The Assiniboines were granted liberty to hunt between the line running from the mouth of Milk river to the forty-ninth parallel and a line drawn from the left bank of the Missouri opposite the Round Butte, north to the forty-ninth parallel.

The Indians west of the main range of the Rocky mountains agreed not to hunt in, or travel through, any part of this common hunting ground or return home through any pass in the main range of the Rocky mountains north of Hell Gate or Medicine Rock passes.

The United States received permission to build roads, utilize natural resources, etc., on condition that the government expend annually for ten years the sum of $20,000, not including the goods, provisions, etc., distributed during the negotiation of the treaty. A sum of $15,000 annually for ten years was to be expended in establishing schools, agricultural and mechanical instructors, etc., among them.

The Treaty of Fort Sully was negotiated October 19, 1865, between the United States and the chiefs of the Blackfeet band of Dakota or Sioux Indians, and bound this band to be friendly to the government and to use physical force when necessary to hold other bands of the tribe in peace. The band agreed to withdraw from the routes already established or to be established in their country, and in consideration of their loyalty and this withdrawal an annual payment of $7,000 was promised to them for a period of twenty years. The principal chiefs who signed this treaty were Wah-hah-chunk-i-ah-pee (The one that is used as a shield), and Wah-mun-dee-wak-ko-no (The war eagle in the air). This treaty was proclaimed March 17, 1866.

The Blackfeet to-day number little more than 1,500, and hold a reservation equal in area to all the North Atlantic States. They were, upon the occasion of a meeting with the commissioners, Senator Vest and Delegate Maginnis, in September, 1883, found to be quite willing to cede the greater part of their lands for something to eat. The land embraced in the old Blackfeet agency, in Northern Montana, was sold in July, 1883, at the land office in Helena by Register Adkinson to the highest bidder. The reservation contained only 640 acres, being section 10, township No. 24 north, range 5 west. The land was sold in 80-acre lots and was purchased by the following persons: D. W. Buck, 160 acres at $1.25 per acre; O. G. Cooper, 160 acres at $2, 80 acres at $2.30, and 320 acres at $1.25 per acre. All improvements made by the government, even to the last rail of a corral, had been taken off the land.

The officers of the Blackfeet agency from 1863 to the present day are named as follows: G. E. Upson, agent; appointed October 13, 1863; died in March, 1866. H. D. Upham (Upson's clerk), acted as deputy agent after decease of Agent Upson, until appointment of George B. Wright, agent; appointed April 12, 1866; resigned November 10, 1868. L. L. Blake was nominated to and confirmed by the Senate, but never entered upon duty. W. B. Pease, Lieutenant U. S. A., was detailed by War Department for duty as agent in spring of 1869; was relieved by military orders in 1870. M. M. McCauley, agent; appointed September 9, 1870; removed in 1871. Jesse Armitage, agent, appointed March 7, 1871; suspended from office in 1872. Wm. F. Ensign, agent; appointed July 23, 1872; resigned in 1773. Richard F. May, agent; appointed November 6, 1873; suspended from office in 1874. John S. Wood, agent, was appointed October 24, 1874, and is the present incumbent. W. J. Cullen was appointed a commissioner to negotiate a treaty with the Blackfeet and other Indians, April 27, 1868. His services terminated in same year, when Agent John S. Wood resumed charge.

The Sioux.—The savages of this nation have been incorrigible for such a length of time the conclusion is arrived at that their cruelty and mischief are inate bad qualities. From the first their enmity toward the white race was made manifest. They began by murdering the venerable Father Mesnard on the shores of Lake Superior, in the seventeenth century, continued their murderous career at the Lake of the Woods, when in June, 1736, the Kristineaue band massacred Father Ouneare, Chevalier Verendrye, Jr., and nineteen members of the Verendrye exploratory party, and in our own times they failed not to afford a specimen of their handiwork in the Minnesota massacre of 1862–3, and in the Custer massacre of 1876, and later still in the various murders credited to them. What has been the nature of their punishment? The following treaties tell of a solicitude for their well-being, such as no government ever offered to its civilized citizens, and far exceeding, in their material provisions, anything which reason could grant as an indemnity. The Sioux, Yankton tribe, entered into a treaty with William Clark, Ninian Edwards and Auguste Choteau, United States Commissioners, binding themselves to live under the laws of the United States, and to forget and forgive every hostile act committed previous to the signing of the treaty, which was proclaimed July 19, 1815. The treaty of 1815, proclaimed December 26, 1815, was made between the Sioux of the River St. Peters and William Clark, Ninian Edwards and Auguste Choteau, binding the tribe to keep peace with the neighboring Indians and the United States. During the year 1816, the same commissioners made a treaty of peace with the Sioux of the Leaf, the Sioux of the Broad-leaf, and the Sioux who Shoot in the Pine Tops. The treaty with the Mandans, which was made by Brigadier-General Atkinson and Major B. O'Fallon, and proclaimed February 6, 1826, provided for the government of the tribe and the punishment of offenders within the tribe as well as of those who should prove offensive to them, and for the exclusion of all traders, other than American citizens. The treaty with the Hunkpapa band of the Sioux tribe was negotiated by General Atkinson and Major O'Fallon, February 6, 1826, binding the band to live in amity with the government. The treaty of amity with the Sioune and Ogallala tribes of Sioux was negotiated by General Atkinson and Major O'Fallon, which treaty was proclaimed February 6, 1826.

The Yanktons, Tetons and Yanktonais entered into a treaty with General Atkinson and Major O'Fallon, representing the United States, acknowledging the supremacy of the government, and providing for the admission of American traders. This treaty was approved February 6, 1826. The Treaty of Washington, July 15, 1830, ceded to the United States a large parcel of land in the neighborhood of Lake Pepin, in consideration of which cession they were to have a reservation for themselves set off, together with grants of lands to their half-breeds. The convention of Bellevue, Upper Missouri, presided over by John Dougherty and Joshua Pilcher, October 15, 1836, dealt with the stipulations entered into by the United States with the Otoes, Missouris, Omahas and Yankton and Santee bands of Sioux in the treaty of Prairie du Chien, July 15, 1830. Colonel Z. Taylor presided over the convention of Wahashaw's tribe of Sioux, December 10, 1836, which ceded to the United States the country between the state of Missouri and the Missouri river. The Wahpaakootah, Susseton and Upper Medawakauton tribes of the Sioux nation met in convention at St. Peters, November 30, 1836, and agreed to the cession of territory stipulated for in the treaty of Prairie du Chien, July 15, 1830. The Sioux chiefs representing the tribe at Washington ceded all their lands east of the Mississippi river, which cession was proclaimed June 15, 1838.

The Susceton and Wahpauton bands of Sioux assembled at Traverse des Sioux, Minnesota, July 23, 1851, and ceded all their lands east of a line beginning at the confluence of Buffalo and Red rivers to the mouth of the Sioux river; thence along western bank of Sioux river to Lake Traverse; thence to its estuary at Kampeska lake, and thence to its northern intersection of the Iowa state line, the consideration being $1,665,000, together with the institution of schools, etc. The treaty with the Medaywakautoan and Wahpaykootay bands was concluded at Mendota, Minnesota, August 5, 1851, by which all their lands in Minnesota and Iowa were ceded, in consideration of various payments amounting to $1,410,000. The treaty between the Yankton tribe of Sioux, concluded at Washington, April 19, 1858, provided for the cession of all lands claimed by them, wherever situate, except 400,000 acres beginning at the mouth of the Choteau river, or Nawizinakoopah, extending up the Missouri river thirty miles, due north to a point, and thence easterly to a point on the Choteau river, and down that river to the place of beginning. They further agreed to ignore all treaties hitherto made by them, except that of Fort Laramie, September 17, 1851, which provided for their annuity rights. They ceded, also, all islands in the Missouri from the mouth of the Big Sioux to the mouth of the Medicine Knoll river. The Treaty of Box Elder, Utah Territory, was negotiated July 30, 1863, by Brigadier-General P. Edward Connor and James Duane Doty with the Shoshonee Indians; and was confirmatory of the Treaty of Fort Bridges, of July 2, 1863. The Box Elder Treaty provided for an addition of $5,000 to the moneys granted in the treaty of July 2, and for conferring upon Pokatello and his people the country extending westward from the Portneuf mountains to the Raft river. The treaty of October 12, 1863, with the Shoshonee Gosships was concluded at Tuilla Valley, Utah Territory, by J. D. Doty and P. E. Connor. It provided for the cessation of hostilities against the citizens and government of the United States, for their withdrawal from the overland routes, for the location of the Pacific railroad through their country, i.e., south of the middle of the Great Desert, east of the Steptoe valley, north of Tooedoe or Green mountains, and west of Great Salt Lake, Tuilla and Rush valleys. The consideration offered the Indians was $1,000 annually for twenty years.

The Treaty of Fort Sully, October 14, 1865, made between Newton Edmunds, E. B. Taylor, Major-General S. R. Curtiss, Brigadier-General H. H. Sibley, H. W. Reed and Owin Guernsey, representing the United States, and Muzzawyahtay (Iron Nation), Tahtonkahwakkon (Medicine Ball) and other chiefs of the Lower Brulé band of Dakota or Sioux Indians, bound the Sioux to abstain from internecene strifes, to withdraw from established routes of travel, to locate on the reservation at the mouth of White river, including the country round Fort Lookout, and to keep on terms of friendship with the United States. In consideration of the fulfillment of this treaty, each family of the band was promised the sum of $25 annually for five years, together with the services of a blacksmith and farmer to the band. The Sans Arc band of Sioux, by the Treaty of Fort Sully, October 20, 1865, agreed to withdraw from the overland routes in Dakota and westward, and live on terms of amity with the people of the United States.

The Two-Kettle band of Sioux, represented by Chatanskah (White Hawk), Etokeah (The Hump), and other chiefs, was negotiated by the commissioners named in the treaty of 1865 with the Lower Brules. This treaty provided for intertribal peace and amity with the United States, for their withdrawal from the established overland routes, for their location on a reservation near Fort Look Out, and for the payment to the band of $6,000 annually for twenty years in such articles as may be deemed necessary for them. Families settling on the reservation were to receive twenty-five dollars annually for five years together with the services of a blacksmith and farmer. The treaty further provided for the payment of $500 to the band and a like amount to the widow and seventeen children of Ishtahchahneaha, or Puffing Eyes, who was killed by United States soldiers.

The Treaty of Fort Laramie was negotiated April 29, 1868, by N.G. Taylor, W.T.Sherman, W.S.Harvey, John B.Sanborn, S.F.Tappan, C.C. Augur and Alfred Terry, United States commissioners, and Mazapoukaska, Tashunkacoquipah, Hehwongechat, Mahtononpah, Little Chief, Makhpiahlutah, Cocamiyaya, Contepeta, Mawatannihavska, Hennapinwanica, Wapashaw and other chiefs of the Sioux tribe. This treaty pledged the Indians to keep peace with the government, on condition that the government should punish white men or others who perpetrated a wrong on the tribe and also punish wrong-doers among the tribe. The territory, commencing on the Missouri river, at 46 N. Latitude, down, east back to a point opposite the northern line of Nebraska, next along this northern line to Long. 104 deg. west of Greenwich, thence north on meridian line to a point where the forty-sixth parallel intersects the same, and east along parallel forty-six to the point at its crossing of the Missouri, together with all existing reservations on the east bank of the Missouri, was set apart for their absolute use, and a number of other privileges granted to them. Article 16 of the treaty reserved to them all the country north of the North Platte and east of the summits of the Big Horn mountains. It also agreed to close up the Montana trail, and remove all United States posts in this ceded territory. The insane policy which countenanced the proclamation of this wild treaty, and gave to the savages full control over a country as large as the German confederation, also taught the warlike Sioux that where so much was conceded there could be little strength. The Sioux, after their Minnesota fights of 1863, were driven across the Missouri, driving the Crows in turn from the Tongue and Powder rivers and causing trouble to the white settlers. This was continued until 1866, when the Fort Phil. Kearney massacre created a sense of the dangerous character of those fierce warriors, and proved that their alliances of 1865 were still powerful. Three forts were then erected in the Sioux country (1866–7), which were torn down a few years later in compliance with the treaty stipulations of 1868. The forts once destroyed, the bloodthirsty pagans were again on the war path, and all those horrible deeds of cruelty credited to them in the history of their wars followed in quick succession. The fact of the succession of Sitting Bull to the throne of Red Cloud was communicated by Lieutenant Quinlan, of Fort Shaw, in August, 1871. On the return of the chief—Red Cloud—from Washington in 1871, he described very vividly to the tribe all the greatness which he had seen and all the magnificence which he wondered at. His tribe of Sioux thought he saw too much to be of further use as chief of their nation, and gave the position to the pronounced foe of the white race—Sitting Bull. This was, in fact, the first step in that aggressive policy which marked the history of the Sioux from 1871 down to the day on which their power was broken.

Fort Peck Agency in 1876 comprised the Yanctonnais, Assinniboines, Gros Ventres, Uncpapas, Brules, and Tetons, numbering between 9,000 and 10,000. The Indians who then led off in the agricultural industry were White Shell, Broken Arm, Red Stone, Long Fox, Little Bull, Walking Porcupine, Wolfskin, Necklace, all Assiniboine chiefs. Agent Thomas J. Mitchell recommended the removal of the agency to Poplar creek, twenty-five miles below Wolf Point, on the Missouri. According to the census taken they numbered 8,498 together with 100 mixed bloods and sixty-three whites lawfully on the reservation. Fort Belknap Agency was discontinued in 1876, and the duties of its agent, Mr. Fanton, transferred to the agent at Fort Peck. The extension of the Sioux reservation in 1870 from the mouth of the Muscleshell to that of the Yellowstone, so as to embrace 600 square miles of territory, was reduced in 1873 when that portion from the Muscleshell to Benton was opened to settlement. A year later Orvil Grant, a brother of U. S. Grant, was given a monopoly of all trade with the Indians here, which drove out M. C. Hunt, who was factor for Durfee & Peck. Thumb moved his post to the mouth of Dry Forks, from which he was again driven by another extension of the reservation. In 1879 the reservation was cut down. August 15, 1876, Congress enacted that no moneys should be appropriated for the subsistence of the Sioux until they relinquished all claim to all territory outside of the reservation established for them in the treaty of 1868.

On September 5, 1877, Crazy Horse was arrested at the Spotted Tail agency, but while being disarmed he stabbed Little Big Man, and was himself stabbed in the side by Crow Dog, the captain of police. His death occurred early on the morning of September 6th. Medicine Bear, the Yankton war chief, died on the Red Water, near Bull mountain, in August, 1883. He participated in nearly all the massacres by the Sioux since 1871, was present participating in the Custer affair, and boasted that in his life-time he killed more white men than any other warrior of the tribe, and aided Rain-in-the-Face in killing General Custer. Some months prior to his fatal illness he asked to be baptized according to the Catholic ritual, and in this faith he died a repentent red sinner.

In December, 1882, the Yanktons, under chief Catfish, seized and appropriated the property of seven white hunters, who were caught hunting on the reservation. This extreme measure was due to the fact that at that time over 1,000 white men were engaged in the buffalo hunt between Dry Fork and Muscleshell creek. Indian Agent Porter and his police offered their aid to the Indians in protecting their reservation, and this added to the fact that the wanderings of the buffalo soon changed the scene of trouble, averted what promised to be another Indian war.

In January, 1883, Chief Red Cloud claimed $5,000 from the government for ponies seized and sold by General Crook in 1876. The amount realized from the sale of these ponies was $5,000, which sum was to be applied, for the benefit of the Indians, in the purchase of cows. The cows were not purchased up to the date of the Indians' claim.

The Aricarees, or White Pawnees, were annual visitors to the Muscleshell region prior to the settlement of the River Crows. In 1739, when the explorer, Verendrye, crossed the Missouri, this branch of the Pawnee nation, together with the Padoucas, hunted over the country from the falls of the Missouri to the Arkansas river.

The Mandans, a branch of the Sioux nation, and an offshot of the Winnebagoes in 1640, were called by the Otchipwes, Waiabish Mishidonagans, or White Beards. From the earliest period in the history of the Jesuit missions in the West the Mandans were distinguished from their brother Sioux by their gray-hairs, and their mud-wall and dug-out dwellings. On the return of Captains Lewis and Clarke from the Pacific they remained a ew days at the chief village of the Mandans, and took with them down the Missouri the venerable chief of the tribe, Big White. On April 25, 1807, the chief was returned to St. Louis from Washington, and sent home in charge of Captain Ezekiel Williams and twenty men. Once in the village, Williams failed not to notice that gray hairs marked male and female, old and young. This branch of the Sioux was never very numerous. The epidemic of 1837 reduced their numbers, as told in the history of that dreadful disease.

Milk River Agency.—The agents at the Milk River Agency, or Fork Peck, were Lieutenant G. E. Ford, U. S. A., organized the agency in 1870; A. S. Reed, appointed September 14, 1870, revoked in November, 1870; Andrew J. Simmons, special agent, January 17, 1871, agent July 23, 1872, resigned in 1873; W. W. Alderson, agent, September 1, 1873; Thomas J. Mitchell 1876; Fort Belknap special agency, W. H. Fanton appointed special agent August 12, 1873. Lemhi Agency, boundary Idaho mountains, Harrison Fuller appointed special agent November 13, 1873.

Indian Neighbors.—The Shoshones of Wyoming and Idaho are descended from the great Comanches, and to-day, after a long separation from the parent tribe, partake of many traits peculiar to the Comanche warrior. To one of the women of this nation Charboneau, a member of the expedition of 1804–6, was married. The wife of Charboneau was a Shoshone or Snake squaw, who had been captured in the year 1800 by the Gros Ventres and by them sold to Charboneau, who, purchasing her as a slave, raised her to the dignity of mistress of his household. The Shoshones of Wind river were very troublesome to the early immigrants passing through the Bridger and South passes. In the winter of 1864 General Connor, with a regular and mobile force of 600 men attacked 800 warriors at Bear creek. The savages failed to follow up a success, and so were driven across the river, losing great numbers of their band. Since their defeat they have proved loyal to the Union, save in the case of the Sioux war, when a number of the tribe aided Sitting Bull's forces.

The Sheepeaters, refugees from the Shoshones and Bonacks, ranged the mountains in the neighborhood of the Yellowstone Park. They dressed entirely in skins, and their diet was mountain sheep, elk, and black-tail deer; roots, inside bark of pine and berries. In 1879 some Shoshones were sent out by the Department of the Interior to hunt them up, who succeeded in bringing them to the Shoshone agency at Little Wind river. In May, 1885, Tenboy, the chief since 1862, visited Butte City. He stated that his tribe numbered 1,180.

The Snakes' claim to their territory south of Montana is literally beyond the space of time over which their unwritten record extends. That they sprung from the Southern Indians is conceded. According to Verendrye, they were here in 1739–40. They owe their tribal name to the Otchipwes, who called them Ginebigonini, or Snake Indians, on account of some peculiar trait in the character of the savages of the tribe, who were seen by the lake Indians, in just the same manner as they named the Assiniboines. From 1810 to 1826 the Hudson's Bay Company dealt largely with the Snakes and Nez Perces.

The Nez Perces have always been a warlike tribe. Belonging to the race of Pacific savages, who in the middle of the sixteenth century checked the advance of the Spaniards, they have lost none of their traditions. This they proved in 1876-7, when they encountered the United States troops and volunteers. James Reubens, a representative of the Nez Perces, says there were 1,250 of the Reservation Nez Perces at home in 1883. Of the 950 non-treaty Nez Perces who belonged to Joseph's band in 1876 there now remain only 283. These are in the Indian Territory and are dying off rapidly. They are very desirous of returning to the reservation, but representations made by the people of Oregon have prevented the accomplishment of their desires. The principal treaties with the neighboring savages have not been successful in securing the peace. The aggressive character of the white race and the wrongs perpetrated by officers of the Government, combined to render the savages desperate, and so fostered an appetite for rebellion, which was appeased by the insurrection movements of 1858 and 1876–7. Early in 1885 the United States Government considered the question of placing this people on their old hunting grounds. Little over 200 remain.

The Bonacks are supposed to be a branch of the Comanche family, whose fathers traveled northward and located their villages on the Colorado river. In the history of French exploration there is no reference made to them; and even the explorers sent out by the United States Government take little notice of this tribe. The individuality of the tribe is so marked that it cannot be associated with the Snake nation, nor yet with the Shoshones. The Bonacks are to these peoples almost as foreign as the Chinese are to the citizens of San Francisco. The date of their coming, too, is lost in its antiquity; their alliances with other tribes, until very recently, are seldom or never spoken of, so that the past of the Digger Bonacks is closed to history, and like the moundbuilders left for the speculators.

In February of 1867, there were about forty lodges of Bonacks camped on Fleshman creek. A stealing party of Flatheads and Pen d'Oreilles took away a little herd of their horses one night, and next morning a party of Bonacks took their trail and overtook them at the Muscleshell river. The Bonacks did not show themselve till night, when they took every horse that their opponents had. The Flatheads went on, but the Pen d'Oreilles, about twenty in number, determined on vengeance and went back afoot. A Bonack hunter saw them and alarmed the camp. One hundred warriors armed and mounted, went to meet the Pen d'Oreilles, who were found on Fleshman creek, about a mile from the Yellowstone. The Bonacks surrounded and fought them all day. After dark the besieged slipped away, leaving two of their number buried in a snow bank. The Bonacks found the bodies and had a scalp dance that lasted for two days. During the early days of Bannack and Virginia City, this tribe was on friendly terms with the settlers; and even when provoked by the desperadoes of the territory,—Ives, Plummer & Co.,—refused to retaliate.

Miscellaneous Treaties.—The treaty of Camp Stevens, in the Walla Walla valley, was negotiated by I. L. Stevens, governor, and Joel Palmer, superintendent of Indians, Oregon June 11, 1855, and approved March 8, 1859. It provided for the cession of the country bordering on the Palouse, Wonareshe, Snake, Queanon rivers, to the summit of the Bitter Root mountains, except the reservation for the general use of the friendly tribes or bands of Spokanes, Walla Wallas, Cayuse, and Umatilla Indians, beginning at the southern tributary of the Palouse river, and extending round the spurs of the Bitter Root mountains. The treaty of Lapwai, W. T., was made by C. H. Hale, Chas. Hutchins and S. D. Howe, Indian agents for Washington Territory, June 9, 1863, with the Nez Perces tribe, provided for the relinquishment of certain portions of their former reservation, and the setting-off the new reservation northeast of Lake Wa-ha, so as to include the Indian farms on the forks of the Clearwater river above Elk City, for which territory they were to receive, in addition to the grants under the treaty of June 11, 1865, the sum of $264,500, to be paid in installments. The treaty of June 9, 1863, was amended at Washington, D. C., August 13, 1868, by N. G. Taylor, United States commissioner, and Lawyer, head chief; Timothy and Jason chiefs of the Nez Perces tribe. The treaty of Klamath Lake, Oregon, was made by J. W. Perst Huntington and Wm. Logan, October 14, 1864, with the Klamath and Moadic tribes and the Yahooskin band of Snake Indians. This treaty ceded all the territory round Goose and Harney lakes to the ridge between the Pitt and McCloud rivers, to the summit of the Cascade mountains, where it was crossed by the forty-first parallel, with the exception of the Klamath lake reservation. The consideration was $8,000 annully for first term of five years; $5,000 annually for second term of five years; and $3,000 annually for last term of five years, together with the sum of $35,000 to be expended in their interest after settlement on the reservation. The same industrial institutions provided for the Walla Wallas, were also provided for them. The treaty of Sprague river valley was concluded with the Wallpah-pe tribe of Snake Indians, August 12, 1865, and ratified July 5, 1866. This was a treaty of peace and cession. The Indians ceded the John Day river country, and agreed to reside upon the reservation provided for in the treaty of October 15, 1864, with the Klamath and Moadic tribes, and Yahooskin band of Snakes, and to induce the Hoonebooey and Watatkah Snakes to cease hostilities against the whites; while the United States granted the sum of $27,000 to be expended in their interest from time to time. The treaty of Fort Bridger, W. T., was made July 3, 1868, with the Shoshones (Eastern Band), and the Bonacks. It provided for the government and care of those lands, and for the establishment of the Shosonee agency at Fort Bridger.

Indian Veneration for the Mountains.—"The Indians," says Abbe Domenech, "have a particular veneration for the Rocky Mountains, which are for them the limits of the known world, and where the most powerful rivers have their sources. They call them the bridge of the world, and believe that the Great Spirit resides on one of the aerial eminences of the range. Many of the eastern tribes designate them by the name of Mountains of the Setting Sun, and place thereon their ideal Paradise, their joyful hunting ground, which is invisible to mortal eyes. It is also there that is situated the land of souls, or of shades, wherein are 'the villages inhabited by the generous and good free spirits,' who during their lifetime sought to please the Great Spirit, and who now enjoy everlasting happiness. The more distant tribes relate great prodigies of these mountains. They fancy that when they shall have breathed their last they shall be obliged to run over them, to climb one of their steepest peaks, passing amidst shaking rocks, snow and furious torrents. In this manner, after months of fatigues and dangers, they shall reach the summit, whence they will discover the Land of Shades. They will then see the souls of the brave warriors and of the good Indians dwelling under beautiful tents, pitched in a field covered with luxuriant verdure, watered by shining rivulets and filled with buffaloes, elks and roe bucks." (Vol. 1, p. 283.)

Disease Among the Tribes.—"The small-pox," says Abbe Domenech, "was first introduced among the Indians in 1837 by the white men. In the space of one month it carried off from among the Riccarees, Assiniboines, Crows, Mandans, Monctarees and Blackfeet upward of twelve thousand persons. The scourge spread consternation and despair throughout these populations. Many people, arrived at the climax of agony, were seen to plunge daggers into their breasts, others threw themselves down precipices, or rolled on the sand, uttering at the same time most piteous cries; whilst others precipitated themselves into the cold waters of the lakes or rivers, where they met with their death instead of the alleviation they had hoped to find from the internal fire that consumed them." The origin of this dreadful plague was due to the cupidity of the Mandan warrior. It is stated by Topping on good authority that,

Early in the spring of 1837 the steamer Assiniboine arrived at Fort Clark with several cases of small-pox on board. There an Indian stole a blanket belonging to a watchman on the boat, who was then at the point of death, and took it away to sow the seeds of death among his tribe, which caused his own death and the death of thousands of his nation. When it was known that he had taken it a benevolent person on the boat went to one of the chiefs, told him the fatal consequences that would follow, and offered a new blanket and a reward besides if he would have it returned; but suspicion, fear or shame prevented the man from giving it up, and the pestilence broke out and began to spread among the Mandans at first, to which nation the thief belonged. Most of the Indians were distant eight miles from the camp killing buffalos for their winter's food, and a messenger was dispatched requesting them not to return as the consequence would be fatal. The Indians sent back word that their corn was suffering to be worked, and that they would return and face the danger, which they thought was fabulous. Word was again sent them that certain destruction would attend their return, but all in vain; come back they did, and the plague began in its most malignant form, their habits and improper food making them a ready prey, and a few hours sometimes terming the loathsome disease by death. The Mandans were enraged because at first it was confined to them, and they supposed the whites had caused it, and saved themselves and the Ricarees from the pestilence, and they threatened the lives of all the former, supposing they had a medicine to prevent it which they would not give them. But by and by Ricarees and whites died also; the disease increasing in malignity hundreds died daily, and bodies thrown beneath the bluff created an intolerable stench which added to its fatality. Men shot each other when they found themselves attacked. One man killed his wife and children, and then loaded his gun, and, placing the muzzle in his mouth, touched the trigger with his toe and blew out his own brains. One young chief made his friends dig a grave for him, and, putting on his war robes, he tottered out to it singing his death songs, and, jumping in, cut his body nearly in two with his knife, and was buried there; and others committed suicide after they were attacked, rather than die of the loathsome disease. The annals of pestilence do not furnish another such example of horrors, or where mortality was so great in proportion to the population. Of the once powerful tribe of the Mandans only twenty-seven persons remained, and one hundred and fifty thousand persons perished, and the details are too horrible to relate. Added to this, the few whites were alarmed lest the Indians should massacre them as the cause of the evil. One influential chief attempted to instigate the Indians to kill the whites, but was himself seized and died before his plans were matured; but in his last moments he confessed his wickedness and expressed sorrow for it, and begged that his body might be laid before the gate until it was buried, with the superstitious belief that if this were done the white man would always think of him and forgive his meditated crime.

Under date, November 8, 1869, General Sully, Superintendent of Indians at Fort Benton, was informed that no less than five hundred of the Gros Ventres, or one-half of the tribe, were carried off by small-pox. To escape the epidemic many of the savages committed suicide. The bodies of the diseased were strewn along the road from the Forks to Milk river, yet the few whites in the district escaped the more serious phases of the disease, those who were attacked being subjected only to a light variola.

Surgeon F. L. Town, U. S. A., in his report for 1869, refers to the ravages of small-pox thus: "A Catholic father (Rev. A. La Combe), who is laboring with the Blackfeet Indians, gave me the following statement of deaths from small-pox in the Blackfeet nation alone, from December 1, 1869, to May 1, 1870: Men, 681; women, 378; and of children, 341. This gives a total of 1,400 deaths from small-pox in a population of perhaps 7,000 or 8,000 souls. The younger members of the tribe suffered most, since many of the older members had previously had the disease. A famine fever (relapsing fever probably) also prevailed in connection with small-pox and increased the mortality. The white population has also suffered from small-pox to some extent the past year." Within the last decade war and pestilence have continued to accomplish the reduction of the Indian race, so that now only thousands remain to represent the tens of thousands who found plenty among the mountains, and who were so near their heaven in the Hills of the Setting Sun.

CHAPTER III.

INDIAN WARS.

IN Montana the Indians have been particularly troublesome since the day of the Gold Creek discovery. Previous to that time, and as early as 1858, the citizens of Utah and the Indians beyond the Cœur d'Alene range occasioned some annoyance to travelers, and in a measure drove James and Granville Stuart to seek a home among the mountains of the Territory. In May, 1858, General Johnson's command entered Salt Lake City only to find its people gone southward. The Mormons were induced to return, and this led to a second series of attacks on immigrants, which were common when the gold mines were discovered in Montana, and ultimately led to the opening of the Bozeman Pass, by which travelers branched off the old trail and henceforth came by Forts Reno, Kearney and C. F. Smith to the Yellowstone, and thence across the Belt range into the Gallatin valley. In 1866–67 the three forts just named were constructed. In January, 1867, Colonel Fetterman and his command were massacred near Fort Kearney and hostilities opened.

War of 1867.—The repeated depredations of Indians from 1862 to 1867, and the Christian-like character of the United States troops in the West, pointed out to the early settlers of Montana the advisability of organizing a militia force for the protection of their homes. In January, 1866, H. A. Kennedy, Thomas A. Steele, J. J. Healy, W. T. Hamilton and A. B. Hamilton made a statement to J. X. Biedler, dealing with the outrages of the Indians since General Meagher's treaty with them of November 16, 1865. Among the list of grievances are the murders of Hencke and LaGree, who went to the Gros Ventre's camp to claim from the savages a number of horses which the Piegans, Bloods and Blackfeet had stolen. A few days later lists of property stolen and settlers or travelers murdered by the savages were submitted, and an earnest request for military protection made. The necessity for such protection was so apparent that steps were taken to establish a militia force. The following certificate of commission was granted February 6, 1866, and is supposed to be one of the first commissions issued in connection with the volunteer movement of 1866–7:

To C. D. J. CURTIS, Greeting:—You, having been appointed to be a captain in the 2d Regiment of the Territorial Volunteers, to rank as such from the 6th day of February, A.D. 1866: now, therefore, know ye, that reposing special trust and confidence in your fidelity and courage, I do hereby appoint you to be a captain in the 2d Regiment Territorial Volunteers, within and for the said Territory of Montana, hereby requiring of you a faithful discharge of all the duties thereunto appertaining, and enforcing upon all inferior officers and privates, and good citizens, obedience to your lawful commands.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of said Territory to be affixed at Helena, this 6th day of February, Anno Domini 1866, and of the independence of the United States the ninetieth.

THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER, Acting Governor.

About the same time Neil Harvey received a military commission, and others were subsequently issued; but the formation of a local military establishment was not then effected. No sooner had the enthusiasm, which fostered this movement for a short time, faded away, than petitions flowed in asking for protection; so that General Meagher was driven to take up the subject again, and in a letter dated Virginia City, March 12, 1866, bring it before the Territorial Legislature. This letter, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, was substantially as follows:—

SIRS:—I have the honor to inclose to you, for the consideration of the House, a petition from S. B. Matthews of this Territory, praying for an appropriation to organise and equip an escort force of 100 men, to proceed to Fort Benton and Fort Union, where the interests of business, in which the Territory is greatly concerned, require their presence. I recommend an appropriation for the purpose—having some reason to believe that the application is demanded by the circumstances.

The message was duly considered; but owing to the opposition of the War Department, nothing could be accomplished toward offering public protection to the freighters, Throughout the remainder of the year the Indians, outside the control of St. Ignatius and St. Mary's missions, grew more aggressive, and perpetrated numerous crimes against persons and property. Again the question of militia organization was revived; but was given little attention until the real state of affairs was made known, and the following letter placed in the hands of Governor Meagher, from John N. Bozeman, dated at Bozeman, March 25, 1867:

GENERAL:—I take the responsibility of writing you a few lines for the benefit of the people of Montana. We have reliable reports here that we are in imminent danger of hostile Indians, and if there is not something done to protect this valley soon, there will be but few men and no families left in the Gallatin valley. Men, women and children are making preparations to leave at an early day. If you can make any arrangements to protect them, they will stay; if not, the valley will doubtless be evacuated.

This letter from the celebrated guide, trapper and hunter of the mountains, created a stir in government circles, and whatever little life existed in the military department showed itself within the next few days. The following order was issued:

General Order No. 1.—Colonel Walter DeLacy, engineer-in-chief, having reported to this office for duty, is hereby ordered to report, without unnecessary delay, to Brigadier-General Thomas Thoroughman, commanding forces in the field at Bozeman City, for assignment to duty. As soon as his duties in this city will permit, Captain Isaac Evans, Assistant Quartermaster, will also report to Brigadier-General Thoroughman for duty in the field.

VIRGINIA CITY, April 4, 1867. MARTIN BERRY, Adjutant and Inspector General.

Following this order, organization was pushed forward. On April 26, the commission of Brigadier-General was issued to Charles J. Curtis, and to him also was given the command of the First military district of Montana. This extraordinary activity was due to the receipt of the following letter:

General T. F. Meagher, Virginia City.—Sir,—On the 16th inst., accompanied by the late J. M. Bozeman, I left here for Forts C. F. Smith and Phil. Kearney. After a day or so of arduous travel we reached the Yellowstone and journeyed on in safety until the 20th inst., when, in our noon camp, about seven miles this side of the Bozeman ferry, we perceived five Indians approaching us, on foot, and leading a pony. When within, say two hundred and fifty yards, I suggested to Bozeman that we should open fire, to which he made no reply. We stood with our rifles ready until the enemy approached within one hundred yards, at which time Bozeman remarked: "Those are Crows; I know one of them. We will let them come to us, and learn where the Sioux and Blackfeet camps are, provided they know." The Indians meanwhile walking towards us with their hands up, calling "Ap-sar-ake" (Crow). They shook hands with Bozeman and offered the same politeness to me, which I declined by presenting my Henry at them, and at the moment Bozeman remarked: "I am fooled—these are Blackfeet. We may, however, get off without trouble." I then went to our horses (leaving my gun with Bozeman), and had saddled mine, when I saw the chief quickly draw the cover from his fusee, and as I called to Bozeman to shoot, the Indian fired, the ball taking effect in Bozeman's right breast, passing completely through him. Bozeman charged on the Indian, but did not fire, when another shot taking effect in the left breast, brought poor Bozeman to the ground a dead man. At this moment I received a bullet through the upper edge of my left shoulder. I ran to Bozeman, picked up my gun, and spoke to him, asking if he was badly hurt! Poor fellow! his last words had been spoken some minutes before I left the spot—he was stone dead. Finding the Indians pressing on me, and my gun not working, I stepped back slowly, trying to fix it, in which I succeeded, after retreating, say fifty paces. I then opened fire, and the first shot brought one of the gentlemen to the sod. I then charged and the other two took to their heels, joining the two that had been saddling Bozeman's animal and our pack horse, immediately after Bozeman's fall. Having an idea that when collected they might make a rush, I returned to a piece of willow brush, say four hundred yards from the scene of action, giving the Indians a shot or two as I fell back. I remained in the willows about an hour, when I saw the Indians cross the river, carrying their dead comrade with them. On returning to the camp I found that the poor fellow was out of all earthly trouble. The redmen were in too much of a hurry to scalp him, or even to take his watch—the latter I brought in. * * * A party started out on yesterday to bring in Bozeman's remains.

The murder of Mr. Lowe on the Benton Road, in April, 1867, and the assault upon Mr. and Mrs. Kennedy about the same time, by the Blackfeet and Bloods raised a thrill of rage throughout the white settlements.

On April 29, 1867, a meeting of the inhabitants of Gallatin Valley was held within Morse's store, with Judge J. Gallagher, chairman, and George D. Thomas, secretary. A number of resolutions and a petition to General Meagher were adopted, the former dealing with Indian depredations, and the latter asking for military organization. This meeting was composed of delegates from various precincts, and won from Meagher a favorable response to their petition. The proclamation of the Governor called on Edgerton (Lewis & Clarke) for 300 men and on Deer Lodge for 100. Several companies were enrolled at Bozeman on the day of the meeting, and were ready to march to the Yellowstone under Colonel Thoroughman on receipt of order.

Virginia City sent one company of 50 cavalry and one of 25 special scouts. Helena boasted of Captain Lyons' company ready to mount into the saddles by May 14, and two or three other companies in course of organization. Captain Lyons' company, of 55 privates and three commissioned officers, was mustered in as Company A, and left Helena for the Gallatin Valley May 19, 1867. Captain Curtis' company of 30 well equipped scouts left Helena May 25, 1867.

The muster-out roll of officers and private soldiers of Company H, 1st Regiment Montana Volunteers, under date August 26, 1867, gives the following names: John Armitage, William O. Gordon, Edward Mitchell, John C. Majors, H. G. Arneaux, A. Campbell, Charles McMahon, James Muir, Daniel McLeod, John Smith, Michael Traynor, R. Warring, Van R. Woodmancy, Michael White, Frank Townley. The above named soldiers were enlisted by Captains W. C. Matlock, R. Hereford and Lieutenant H. S. Neal, between the 10th and 26th of June, 1867, for two months' service.

On June 9, 1867, a flag from Colonel Cummings and a guidon from Mrs. T. F. Meagher were presented to Captain Nelson's company of the Montana militia.

Early in May, 1867, Governor Meagher appealed to the government for permission to muster in eight hundred citizens as a Territorial battalion. The department, through Lieutenant-General Sherman, granted the request conditionally. The nature of this conditional permission is shown in General Sherman's report to the War Secretary of October 1, 1867. Under it the work of preparation was carried forward rapidly, and a military department organized.

HEADQUARTERS OF HELENA BATTALION,
Territorial Militia, May 17, 1867.

A press of official duties rendering it necessary for me to proceed to Headquarters at Virginia City to provide the proper means for the work of recruiting, arming, equipping, supplying and forwarding of troops to the field as fast as possible from this locality, I have this day turned over to Captain James L. Fisk, of Helena, all property and business connected with the Quartermaster's department here, and have appointed him my Assistant Quartermaster-General to make contracts, purchases, issues, and to transact all department business in and for the district, embracing Edgerton, Meagher, Deer Lodge and Jefferson counties.

H. C. CUMMINGS,
Quartermaster-General, Teritorial Militia.

Captain Hughes, commanding Company A, of the Helena battalion, reported at Helena July 8, 1867, on the battle with the Crows. It appears one hundred and fifty Crows marched toward the Gallatin valley on a cattle and horse stealing expedition. They succeeded in running off a number of animals, when the citizens gave chase. The small band of thieves, unconscious of the presence of the militia, ran into their lines where they were treated as they deserved. Subsequently the citizens sent a message that although they killed two Indians and re-captured their cattle and horses, one horse was still missing. Captain Hughes took thirty-five men and proceeded to the camp of the main band of marauders, demanded and received the missing horse, and then demanded the thief. The chief surrendered him; but as he came out in his war paint, ready to fight until the last, the troops lassoed him by the neck and throwing the line over the limb of a tree, subjected him to the penalty of hanging in presence of the band.

In Governor Clay's order No. 1, July 14, 1867, Thomas Thoroughman was appointed commander with the rank of Colonel. The other commissions offered were: Lieutenant-Colonel, George W. Hynson; First Major, Neil Howie; Second Major, J. H. Kinsley; Captains, L. M. Lyda, Company A.; Robert Hughes, Company B.; Charles D. Curtis, Company C.; J. H. Evans, Company D.; Cornelius Campbell, Company E.; John A. Nelson, Company F.; A. F. Weston, Company G.; Robert Hereford, Company I.; William Deasy, Company F. The Governor's staff was commissioned as follows: Martin Beem, Adjutant and Inspector General, with rank of Colonel; Hamilton Cummings, Quartermaster-General, with rank of Colonel; J. J. Hull, Commissary General, with rank of Colonel; Walter W. DeLacy, Chief of Engineers, with rank of Major; George M. Pinney, Aide-de-camp, with rank of Captain; and James K. Duke, Aide-de-camp, with rank of Captain. This order contained the notice that all commissions issued by Governor Meagher other than those mentioned in order No. 1, would be held as complimentary, and that no one will be called into service unless the emergency should arise. The organization of the First Regiment Montana Cavalry, July 14, 1867, was subjected to change in August, 1867, at Camp Smith, near Camp T. F. Meagher.

General Order No. 1, July 1867, promulgated by Governor Smith, reducing the ranks of all the officers commissioned by General Meagher, caused much dissatisfaction throughout the Territory. General Howie declined Governor Smith's offer of First Major; Major Kinsley declined the offer of a Second Majorship, while General Thoroughman, Colonels Blake and Biedler tendered their resignations. General Howie was subsequently commissioned Colonel of the First Regiment of Montana militia.

Governor Smith issued a proclamation in August 1867, calling upon the militia then in the field to re-enlist for a second short term and upon the people to fill the quota called for in General Meagher's former proclamation.

Captain A. F. Weston and an immigrant named Franklin Hodges, were murdered by Indians seventy miles from Fort Thos. F. Meagher, August 26, 1867. Intelligence of the tragedy was brought in by T. H. Mann, a freighter, and W. J. Weston, a son of Captain Weston, on the 27th of August. It appears that on July 16 Weston, his son and Mann, started out prospecting and traveled along the Fort Smith road until reaching the Stillwater, when they halted to camp for the night. Presently they saw the Indians approaching, and knowing their visitors, leaped into their saddles and entered on that race for life. They fought their way through the Indians, Mann killing one of the savages, and reached the main road with the howling red men close on their heels. The horses of Captain Weston and Hodges now began to fail, and as young Weston and Mann pushed forward in the race, they saw their friends in the act of falling from their horses. The refugees met some men near the Stillwater shortly before camping, and in that time related to young Weston and Mann the story of the battle of Fort Smith, which occurred on August 10, 1867, and in which fifty savages were killed.

In a letter from J. M. Gorman, agent of the Northern Overland Mail at Benton City, under date of September 1, 1867, it is stated that on August 10 the Indians ran off five horses from the mouth of Milk river; on the 9th they fired on the mail carriers; on the 18th they raided Station No. 4 on Milk river, taking all the horses, and driving the employes sixty miles to the next station; on the 19th they pursued the mail-rider for ten miles, and caused the loss of the mail bag, and for the remainder of the month the savages seem to have given all their attention to the Northern Overland Mail route.

Dispatches from Fort Meagher, under date of August 30, 1867, gave news of the departure of Colonel Howie, on the 28th, with eighty men and a twelve-pound howitzer. Captain Hart's Virginia City company of forty-one men reported for service on the 29th at the fort, while Captains Curtis and Hughes were momentarily expected with an additional mounted force of over fifty men, together with Captain Mitchell's Virginia Infantry. During the militia movement of 1867, Charles Dunton was killed by Captain Hart. The deceased was a native of Eastport, Maine, and his death was due to an attack on Captain Hart, who acted in self defense.

On September 2, 1867, the news of the battle of Fort Smith, on the 10th of August, and of the skirmish on the Boulder, of the 29th of August, was made known. On August 28, Colonel Howie's command reached the Boulder, after his advance had notified him of the presence of a large force of Indians. The latter, on discovering the presence of the avengers, sought ambush, and intended to wait there until driven from it by the fire of the howitzer. The pursuers, on nearing the Boulder, found the immigrants lying wounded, who would undoubtedly have been killed had they not been well armed, and the Indians so alarmed. Starting next morning, the command marched steadily along until 4 P. M., when a wounded Indian was discovered. In his race for life he was shot down, and scalped in regular Indian fashion. That night and next day a division of Colonel Howie's forces pressed forward, and in the afternoon of the 30th arrived at Stillwater, where the remains of Captain Weston were found; later the remains of Charles Hodges were found, both bodies being terribly disfigured.

Colonel Neil Howie, Captain Curtis and Lieutenant Small arrived at Helena from the front on October 2, 1867. They reported that many men, who would not otherwise have joined the rebels, were induced to do so by the assurance that a prospecting expedition of three weeks' duration was alone contemplated, and that at the end of that time all government property was to be returned. Of the two hundred men that Captain Hughes, the leader of the rebels, had attached to him in the first instance, only about sixty remained, the rest having started off in small bodies on their own hook, or returned to their commands. It was believed that some, but by no means all, of these would form themselves into plundering squads for the purpose of living on the country. All company organizations among the rebels were done away with, Captain Hughes being recognized as sole commander. The twenty-five who mutinied left for the States by way of Fort C. F. Smith. "To-day," says the report, "between eighty and ninety of the faithful troops will arrive on the Prickly Pear, and are soon to be mustered out. These troops belong principally to the command of Captain Matlock, which had not proceeded further than Bozeman when it was turned back."

War Claims 1867.—The legislature adopted resolutions in 1868 and 1869, setting forth the claims of the citizens for compensation for services rendered the government during the Indian troubles of 1866–7. Those resolutions drew forth from congress a fair recognition in 1873, when $513,343 were appropriated. Of this sum, $512,223.13 were paid out by Major Bell previous to October 28, 1874. (Vide U. S. Reports.)

The Piegan War of 1870.—The direct cause of this campaign against this savage band of Blackfeet, was the murder of an old settler—Malcolm Clark, in 1869, and the failure of the tribe to surrender the murderers. Never in the whole history of U. S. law was the cause of justice forwarded with greater vigor. When the authorities failed to capture the murderers, another course was taken—witnesses were examined, the identity of the guilty ones and their guilt clearly established, and an indictment against them for murder obtained in regular form. Accompanying this finding of the grand jury, was a clear statement of the uncertainty of property and life in the settlements, and a request that the authorities would aid the people in seeking justice and protection. This declaration is as follows:

The Grand Jury of the United States for the 3d Judicial District of Montana, have examined a number of witnesses, and from the evidences presented to them, find that the people of this district have suffered within the last few months great loss of life and property from predatory bands of Indians. We have been furnished the names of some nine or ten citizens who have been murdered in cold blood by them. Over 300 head of stock have been stolen within two months past and we believe that within six months fully 1,000 horses have been stolen, and a number of valuable citizens sacrificed, whose names we could not learn. The Piegans, Bloods, and Blackfeet, who all talk in the same language and constitute the Blackfeet Nation, have moved their women and children north of Montana, and in that country have procured ammunition and improved arms. This is a declaration of war on the whites of Montana, and some measures should be adopted to meet the emergency. The civil authorities have not the means and the people are not able to bear the expense of pursuing and punishing these robbers and murderers, who destroy our property and lives, and come and go like the wind. Ours is a contest between civilization and barbarism, and we must risk our lives and sacrifice our hard earned property to defend them, unless the general government give us the means of defense. To this we are entitled, as we have left homes of comfort in the East to plant civilization in the wilderness. It is evidence that the "Pen d'Oreilles," who make periodical journeys from their homes to the valley of the Yellowstone, on hunting expeditions, through some of the settled portions of our territory, are guilty of horse-stealing if not of murder. Their passage through our settled valleys should be prohibited by the authorities. The River Crows murdered two white men near Fort Benton about the 20th of July last and took their horses to their camp.

In none of these cases of murder and theft have the Indians been pursued and punished. Our population is necessarily scattered along the valleys, or isolated in mining camps and gulches, and hence are exposed to sudden attacks from Indians. We make this statement, which is substantiated by truthful evidence, and respectfully request that it may be sent to such officers of the general government as are entrusted with the care of the Indians, and our protection by military force, trusting that they will take the steps necessary to give us full protection, or, if the means in their hands are not adequate, that they will represent our exposed and dangerous position to the heads of government at Washington, who have authority to punish or prevent Indian outrages.

The number of animals stolen from miners during the summer and fall of 1869, is variously estimated. Gen. Alfred Sully in his report, gives 227, including 30 mules stolen from Hugh Kirkendall.

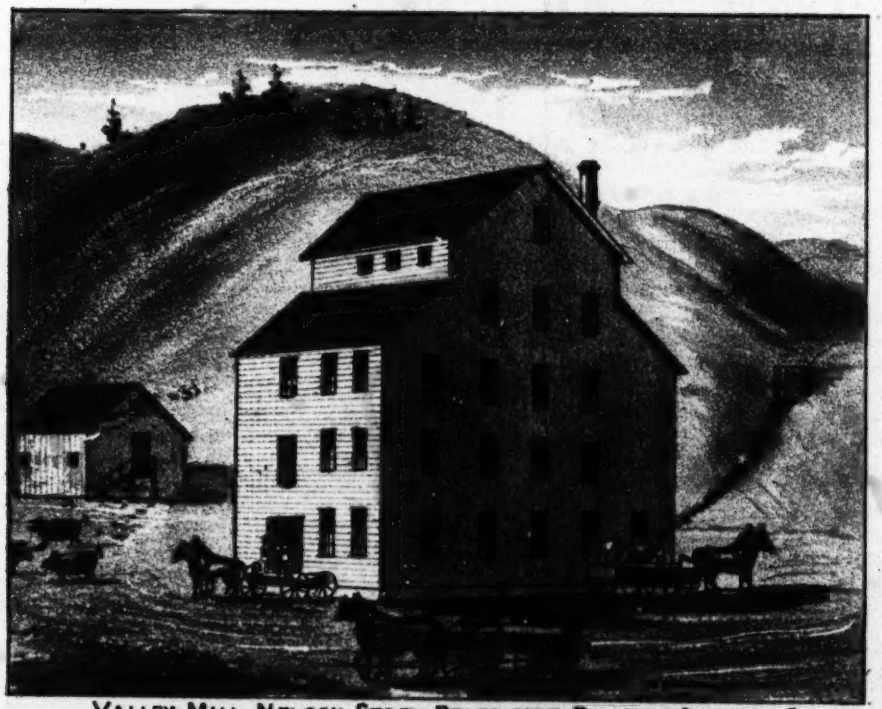
RES. OF NELSON STORY, BOZEMAN, GALLATIN CO.



VALLEY MILL, NELSON STORY, PROPRIETOR, BOZEMAN, GALLATIN CO.

Among the interesting narratives of Col. William F. Wheeler, that relating to this Piegan war holds a foremost place. For years this act in the drama of Montana's settlement was scarcely heard of without her boundaries, and even now would be passed over in this volume with a plain recital of the main facts, had not the Colonel decorated the record with the historical romance pertaining to it. The campaign of Major Eugene M. Baker, 2d U. S. cavalry, against the Piegan Indians, a band of the Blackfeet tribe of northern Montana, in January 1870, was one of the most necessary punishments, as it was one of the most important events, that had ever transpired in the annals of border warfare. In the summer of 1868 and 1869, murders of white men by the Piegans were almost of daily occurrence, and the stealing of the horses of settlers was carried on by wholesale. It was unusual if the daily papers did not record some Indian deviltry in nearly every issue. The people of Choteau, Meagher, Lewis and Clarke, and those residing on the borders of Deer Lodge and Gallatin counties were the principal sufferers. Almost every freight train between Helena and Benton, during the summer of 1869, was attacked. Garrison's herders were killed by the Indians within three miles of Fort Benton, and McQuail and his partner were murdered while working their mines in sight of Silver City. Horses were stolen from the valley in sight of Helena in broad daylight, and the whole herd was stampeded from Boulder Bar, within a half mile of Diamond City, at daylight one morning, and the yells of the Indian horse thieves were heard by the citizens of the town. Hugh Kirkendall's whole train of thirty-two splendid mules was stolen early one morning while camped at the Dearborn. Every stage passenger, freighter, traveler, or prospector on the road between Helena and Fort Benton was compelled to carry his rifle and revolver, notwithstanding which fifty-six white men were murdered during 1869 by ambushed savages.

On August 23, 1869, the Piegans came to the ranch of Malcom Clark, who lived near the mouth of Prickly Pear canon, twenty-five miles from Helena, and by lies about his stolen horses, drew him out of his house in the night and shot him dead. They also shot his son Horace through the face and left him on the ground for dead; but he recovered and is a resident of Choteau county. They intended to carry off Clark's wife and three daughters; but were too busily engaged in securing the 30 or 50 head of horses, owned by Mr. Clark to do it that night. The next morning Miss Ellen P. Clark, his eldest daughter, in later years so favorably known in connection with the schools of Helena, gave the news of the murder of her father to the white men at King and Gillette's toll-gate, and the survivors were brought into Helena and cared for by the citizens. Major Clark had lived among the Blackfeet for 28 years, and had married into their tribe, which rendered his murder remarkable, as he had spent a fortune in administering to their wants, and was always their great friend and counsellor. Private revenge was supposed to be the cause of his sacrifice. He was personally known to nearly every settler of Montana, and had displayed hospitality with a liberal hand to many weary immigrants, who were out of means, on their way from the states to the rich gold fields of the territory. His murder in the center of a most populous county in Montana, and so near the largest town in it, awakened the people to the necessity of some prompt action by themselves or the government, and letters were sent by scores to the military and civil authorities in Montana and Washington, giving details of the murders committed by the Indians. The newspapers teemed daily with articles setting forth the dangers of our situation and demanding protection.

William F. Wheeler had been qualified as United States Marshal, on July 5, 1869, and he proceeded to procure the evidence necessary to indict and convict the murderers in the numerous cases which had occurred during the year. The only case in which the murderers could be identified personally, or where they could be identified for the murder, was that of Malcom Clark. His daughter, Ellen, and his son, Horace, knew personally and by name five chiefs who had participated in the killing of their father. On their evidence Marshal Wheeler obtained an indictment for murder against the five leaders from the United States Grand Jury at the October term of the Third Judicial District Court assembled at Helena. To render matters plainer he searched through the files of the Herald, and found from authentic reports that 56 white people were killed and over 1,000 horses stolen by the Blackfeet from January to October 1869. At the request of the Grand Jury he drew up a report of the facts for the use of the Court, which every member signed, with a request to the Court that certified copies should be sent to all civil and military authorities having any jurisdiction or authority to punish the Indians for their misdeeds. Copies were forwarded to Generals Grant, Sherman, Phil. Sheridan, J. D. Cox, Hancock, De Trobriand, Alfred Sully, setting forth the perilous position of the white people. To General Sully, then United States Superintendent of Indian Affairs for Montana, he gave copies of the warrants for the arrest of the five murderers, and made a demand for their surrender. General Sully acquainted the President and Secretary of the Interior with these facts and asked their instructions. Upon this information a Cabinet meeting was called with Congressional Delegate James M. Cavanaugh present. Mr. Cavanaugh wrote that General Sully was instructed to demand the murderers from their tribe, and if they failed or refused to surrender them on this demand, the savages were to be notified that the government would send United States troops and take them by force or make war on the Indians, Senator Hoar alone dissenting. General Phil. Sheridan was instructed by the acting Secretary of War, to detail the officer in Montana, best fitted for the purpose of conducting an Indian campaign, to proceed against the Piegans in case they refused to comply with the demands of General Sully. Sheridan selected Major Eugene M. Baker, 2d United States cavalry, then in command of Fort Ellis, on account of his brilliant services against the Oregon Indians. Sheridan's telegram to Major Baker was simply: "If you have to fight the Indians, hit them hard."

General Sully was accompanied to Fort Shaw by Colonel Wheeler, and arrived at the post on Christmas day, 1869, where they were entertained by Captain Cutler, then giving his Christmas feast to the officers of the garrison. On the morning of December 26 runners were sent off, to notify the chiefs of the Piegans to meet General Sully in counsel at the Blackfeet Agency, on the Teton. The meeting was held, and the chiefs agreed to deliver the five murderers at Fort Shaw within twelve days. Before the twelfth day expired the murderers were conveyed into Canadian territory, while the chiefs laughed at the idea of surrendering five of their band to the vengeance of the whites. So soon as Sully convinced himself that the chiefs acted in bad faith, he notified General De Trobriand, commanding in Montana, who in turn communicated General Sheridan's order to Major Baker. Acting on this order, Baker's command of five companies left Fort Ellis en route for Fort Shaw. Arriving there, his own force of two hundred and fifty men was reinforced by fifty men of the 13th United States Infantry, then stationed at Fort Shaw, and in the middle of January, 1870, while the thermometer was down in the forties below, made the march of eighty miles from Fort Shaw to the Marias river, where the Piegans were in winter quarters. The Indian town was surrounded at daylight on January 23, 1870, and the troops had actually cut off the horse kraal before an Indian was seen. A soldier, a little in advance of his company, rode near a tepee, when a savage, hearing the tramp of horses, stepped out with his gun across his arm, and, without warning, shot the United States cavalry soldier dead. At this point the campaign began. Major Baker gave orders to keep up a steady fire on the village so long as there was any resistance. In an instant each warrior was in the street returning the fire of the troops. Being completely surrounded, the Indians sought shelter inside their tepees, and through holes, which they cut in the sides of their habitations, continued to fire upon the troops. When the Indians ceased firing, the troops also ceased, while the former were called on to surrender. No less than one hundred and seventy-three savages were killed in this battle, together with fifty women and children. One hundred and fifty women and children and eight warriors escaped. Three hundred ponies were captured; but the five murderers were so far safe beyond the boundary.

Following this wholsome chastisement of the Piegans, came charges of unnecessary severity and cruelty against Colonel Baker in his attack on Mountain Chief's Piegan camp. So serious were those charges that General P. H. Sheridan, commanding the Missouri division, was instructed to inquire into the case, and report to General W. T. Sherman. This inquiry was instituted. A full explanation was given in Colonel Baker's telegram to General Sheridan, under date Fort Ellis, March 23, 1870. This telegram was forwarded to the Department of War, and under date of March 28, 1870, General Sherman telegraphed to General Sheridan as follows: "You may assure Colonel Baker that no amount of clamor has shaken our confidence in him and his officers, and that if any responsible parties will father the reports that have been so extensively published, we will give him the benefit of an official investigation." In this manner the war against the Piegans was closed, and the first great lesson in good manners taught the savages of this territory.

Insurrection of the Nez Perces, 1877.—Owing to the aggressive character of the Idaho immigrants of 1877, Chief Joseph, of the Nez Perces, was driven to cast aside the policy of peace which for some years his tribe observed, and make one desperate effort to save to his race the beautiful valleys which they then possessed. In May of that year the warriors of the tribe descended on the settlers in the Willowla valley, giving up to the tomahawk and bullet many of the whites who ventured to settle there. The United States troops went to the assistance of the settlers, and as a result the alternative of surrender or exile was left to Chief Joseph and his band. The latter course was adopted, and the entire tribe, men, women, children, horses, etc., moved eastward under their leaders, Joseph, Looking Glass and White Bird, June 30, 1877, en route to Bitter Root Valley. On the same day, a company of sixty men was organized at Butte City, and arms were sent forward by Governor Potts and Secretary Mills for distribution to volunteers at Deer Lodge and Missoula. The Indians appeared on the Bitter Root, July 20, among the bands of the Flatheads and Bitter Root Indians, and by July 23 had actually appeared in fighting force outside Captain Rawn's encampment in Lo Lo Pass. Then began that earnest organization which proved to the world that the men who ventured west of the Belt mountains between 1862 and 1877 to settle among the foot-hills of the main range of the Rockies were now prepared to defend that which they traveled so far to obtain. Deer Lodge, Phillipsburg, Beartown, Bearmouth, Yreka, Pioneer City, Deer Lodge Valley, Silver Bow, Flint Creek Valley, Pike's Peak, Glendale, Georgetown, Cable, Upper Warm Spring Creek, Silver Lake, Lost Creek, American Bar, Dry Gulch, Butte, Butte City, all sent forth soldiers, young and old, prepared to assist neighboring settlements, and defend their own. The executive also took measures for defense. Under date of July 20, 1877, Secretary J. H. Mills wrote to Chas. S. Warren, Butte, stating that should the latter raise a company, he would see that the men were armed with breech-loaders. On July 25 he wrote to W. A. Clark, Chas. S. Warren and N. L. Turner, stating that he kept company A, 1st Battery, reserved for their command. On July 30, Captain Mills instructed W. A. Clark to push on his command toward the Big Hole, and also advised him that army supplies would be forwarded thither at once. On July 31, Governor Potts asked authority to raise three hundred men for thirty days. This authority the secretary of war denied, basing his refusal on reports which stated that General Sheridan had made dispositions to meet the Indians and subdue them. When the Nez Perces entered the Bitter Root valley it was their intention to pass through the Flathead country, and enter the Canadian territory via the Kootenai Pass; but Chief Michel, now residing at the Jocko agency, twenty-eight miles from Missoula, informed Chief Joseph's courier that should his Nez Perces attempt to journey that way, the Flatheads would oppose them, and if necessary aid the whites in the annihilation of his tribe. The action of the Flatheads was in concert with that of the white citizens, and when all the facts are known, as unwarranted by circumstances as by Indian hospitality. Duncan McDonald, who interviewed the Nez Perces after their escape to the Canadian territory, and contributed the results of that interview to Captain Mills' journal, declares that the refugees were all desirous of passing through Montana in an orderly manner, without interfering with the lives or property of the people.

The narrative of this exciting event in the history of Montana is taken from the New North West of August 10, 1877. "In the issue of July 28 we published the presence of Chief Joseph, White Bird and Looking Glass in Lo Lo canon with 330 hostiles, the intrenchment of Captain Rawn of the 7th Infantry and a volunteer force in the canon, his call for more troops, and the fact that Governor Potts had gone to Lo Lo to ascertain the situation. Already some Deer Lodge county volunteers had gone to Missoula. Hardly had the New North West been issued, when the Missoulian extra of July 25, headed: 'HELP! HELP! WHITE BIRD DEFIANT. COME RUNNING!' appeared. On its arrival at Deer Lodge over thirty men saddled their horses and went in haste to Missoula, many left for other points, while the majority of efficient men waited the call of the governor. * * * Throughout Deer Lodge county there was quick preparation. Almost every camp called importunately for guns, and wherever it was possible they were supplied. Business was suspended, and the word that was awaited was the call of Governor Potts to arms. The United States military forces in Montana had been ordered to treat all Indians coming from Idaho as hostiles. Captain Rawn informed the Nez Perces they must disarm and dismount or fight. He had but two small companies of infantry, and was entrenched on what was deemed their sole trail to get into Montana. White Bird had declared he would come into and go through Montana. A fight seemed inevitable, and the hostiles were reported 330 strong, well armed and mounted, and under command of the best fighting chief of modern days. * * * Governor Potts reached Missoula on the night of July 25, and on the morning of the 26th and again on Friday, 27th, visited Captain Rawn's entrenchments—log rifle-pits extending across the trail in Lo Lo canon, down which it was deemed certain the hostiles must come if they should advance. The mouth of Lo Lo is thirteen miles from Missoula, while Rawn's rifle-pits were four miles up the canon. The Indian camp was at the first four miles further up, but was subsequently moved down to within three miles. Several talks had taken place between Captain Rawn's representatives and those of the Indians, the latter persisting in their disposition to pass peaceably, and the former that they should disarm. The whites were sparring for time to get up reinforcements, which the Indians, for some unknown reason, were willing to grant. In the meantime General McDowell had ordered Howard forward on the Lo Lo, and his despatches intimated he was coming up in their rear. On the 27th of July there were fully 200 men in the rifle pits, three-fourths of whom were volunteers and Flathead Indians. Captain Rawn intimated to the governor that he had all the forces he needed to hold the pass; that the only apprehension was, they might elude him, and break northward over the low rolling hills toward Missoula and Frenchtown. He requested the governor to return to Missoula, organize all the volunteers he could, and prevent that result. The governor acquiesced in this plan, and issued his proclamation on July 26, 1877, calling out volunteers. This was followed by a letter from Captain Mills calling for prompt assistance. With every horse and man in service this letter had been started from Missoula by mail on one day time, designing a courier should take it up at Bear Mouth; but on arriving there it seemed the proclamation was in the express box, which could not be opened, and the down stage was turned back, reaching Deer Lodge at 10 A. M. Saturday. The express box was opened, but in it were no signs of the proclamation; yet the note from the governor was evidence that assistance was needed, and that he desired every fighting man at Missoula. At once began the most intense excitement. It surpassed for the next twenty-four hours anything we witnessed during the greatest enthusiasm of the war times. Men were frantic for guns, horses and equipments, and as quickly as secured, they were off for Missoula as fast as they could go. Organization was impossible; 'We will organize at Missoula, or wherever we strike Indians,' was the universal response. * * * That night Deer Lodge was depopulated. On July 31, 1877, Governor Potts appointed staff officers as follows: R. H. Mason, Chief of Ordnance; Peter Valeton, Chief Quarter Master; S. E. Larabee, Chief Commissary, and A. H. Mitchell, Surgeon General. According to the Independent, Governor Potts' proclamation reached Deer Lodge on Saturday, and with it the news of the peril in Missoula county, when W. A. Clark, the banker of Deer Lodge, immediately jumped into the saddle and headed his horse for Butte, forty-two miles distant, to carry the news and raise a company of volunteers for the defense of the Lo Lo trail. He left Deer Lodge at 11 A. M. and reached Butte before 2 P.M., where he at once proceeded to organize, and succeeded so far as to leave Butte that night with his company for Deer Lodge. The settlers along the river, aroused by the steady hoof-beats along the hard roads, opened their windows and gazed with awe and alarm at the midnight cavalcade galloping swiftly down the valley. This company was armed and equipped by 7 A. M. on Sunday morning, and had, by that hour, actually started en route to Missoula. While this first organization was being perfected, messengers were sent to all the centres of population round the Silver City, and in an incredibly short space of time a war council was in session. In an hour Company A was sworn in; Company B began its organization and completed it within three hours, and Company C was organized before midnight—all resulting in giving a fighting corps 150 strong to the cause of Montana's defense. By nine o'clock Sunday morning those volunteer's were furnished with fifty-three breech and 100 muzzle-loading rifles and were actually on the march to Missoula.

"YORK RANCH" RESIDENCE OF ALEX. METZEL, UPPER RUBY VALLEY, MADISON CO, MONT. BREEDER OF HORSES & GRADED CATTLE.
(STOCK FOR SALE.)

The last interview between Captain Rawn and the Indians was held July 27, 1877, when Chief Looking-Glass offered to surrender ammunition if allowed to pass peaceably, but Captain Rawn would hear of nothing less than a surrender without conditions. The Chief asked time until nine o'clock on the morning of the 28th to consult with Joseph and White Bird, which was willingly granted. Rawn had then a force of two hundred and sixteen men in the rifle pitts, while Governor Potts was busy in organizing the defense of the northern passes, and Browning's command was marching to the scene. On the 27th also Captain Stuart's company of thirty-two men reached Missoula, having marched ninety miles in twenty-five and one-half hours,—something as remarkable as the march of the Phillipsburg volunterrs through the Indian forces; the former not knowing they were the savages they were called out to murder, and the latter permitting the new soldiers to pass unmolested. On the morning of July 28, Captain Rawn discovered that the Nez Perces, men, women and children, had broken camp and were pushing northward along the wooded hillside, eight hundred yards above the rifle pits. They re-entered the canon a mile below the military position, and moved up the Bitter Root, and by a crescent movement passed the rifle-pits. The report, as given in the Independent, says: "They camped that night in the open valley a few miles from the mouth of the Lo Lo, and during the next week, moved leisurely up the valley, not traveling over seventy miles. In passing Rawn's command they moved with all their families and stock as unconcerned and indifferent to the circumstances as though on an ordinary journey to the buffalo country. In fact every movement since they reached Missoula, has been of this character. In view of all the circumstances it was the boldest, most fearless, audacious and confident tactical movement we have known. It surpassed McClellan's flank movement from the Chickahominy to James' river, or Grant's from the Rapidan to Richmond. They moved armies of wholly fighting men by the flank, with the enemy on the right, offering battle by day and moving by night. Joseph moved his entire possessions of effects and families between the forces of Rawn and those at Missoula, within gunshot of the former, crossed his line of communication, camped almost upon the trail, and with unparalleled intrepidity on open ground in the face of superior numbers and in the enemy's country. It is intimated they would have surrendered if attacked; we do not believe it. The parley about surrendering ammunition was a part of the diplomacy they practiced and they would have fought their way through or down. Every move in Idaho was one of desperate resolve, and they did not fly to Montana to make a surrender they disdained in Idaho."

When the Indian tactics were reported at Missoula, a messenger was sent to Deer Lodge with instructions to bring up re-enforcements, when the Deer Lodge volunteers, thirty-two in number, were dispatched to hold the bridge and ford across the Bitter Root on the Missoula road, and open the line of communication with the rifle-pits. The volunteers advanced toward the assigned position; but they met with no resistance as the Nez Perces had turned up the valley toward the open country. Captain Rawn sent a mounted company under Lieutenant Stevens after the subtle hostiles, and promised to support the lieutenant with his entire command as far as the mouth of the canon. Lieutenant Steven's company obeyed his orders; but on approaching the Indians, Chief Looking-Glass stepped forward, and in an apologetic manner assured the volunteers that unless attacked, neither person nor property in Montana would suffer at the hands of the Nez Perces. Turning to the Bitter Root men, he offered them a way through his camp to their homes, and having no alternative, this offer was accepted and the men of Bitter Root reported at Stevensville on the night of July 28th, while the Deer Lodge volunteers reported at Missoula and some of them at Blackfoot bridge; meantime the men of Phillipsburg, who actually passed through the heart of the Nez Perces, minus a knowledge of them being the Indians they came to annihilate, were garrisoning the rifle-pits, where Captain Rawn kept them free from danger, and literally denied them a chance of becoming better acquainted with the refuges from Idaho.

Beginning of the Big Hole troubles.—When the fact of the Indians' escape from the troops and volunteers became generally known, a thousand thoughts were directed to Big Hole,—the point at which they would pass onward to the mysterious goal of their journey. Governor Potts ordered the Deer Lodge company to make an intercepting movement on Big Hole. Captain Morgan Evans, of Clark's command, was dispatched thither, while the Butte contingent of one hundred and thirty men reported at Warm Springs, and all mustered at Big Hole the succeeding (Sunday) night. The battle of Big Hole occurred on August 9, 1877, three miles below the Bitter Root and Bannack trail crossing. The first dispatch was as follows:

To Governor Potts:—Had a hard fight with the Nez Perces, killing a number, and losing a number of officers and men. We need a doctor and everything. Send us such relief as you can. John Gibbon, Colonel commanding.
Big Hole, August 9, 1877.

A second, third and fourth dispatch followed—the third announcing the deaths of Captain Logan and Lieutenant Bradley, and the wounding of General Gibbon, Lieutenants Cooledge, Williams, English and Woodruff. W. H. Edwards, who arrived at Deer Lodge from Big Hole on the morning of the 11th of August, reported General Gibbon's command to consist of seventeen officers, one hundred and thirty-three regulars, and thirty-two citizen volunteers. Judge Hiram Knowles obtained from Sergeant Wilson the particulars of the fight, the latter stating that the troops came upon the Indians' camp on the 7th, and that on the 8th Lieutenant Bradley managed to get close enough so as to observe the actions of the savages. At this time there were eighty-nine lodges. Among the Indians who were killed at Big Hole were chiefs Rainbow, Blacktail and Lohoolhoolshute. The United States and citizen troops killed were: Captain Logan, Lieutenant James H. Bradley, Corporals W. H. Payne, Isaac Eisenhart and Dan. Hogan, together with Michael Gallagher, Matthew Batterly, W. D. Pomeroy, James Maguire, Robert L. Edgeworth, W. H. Martin, R. E. Sale, D. O'Connor, G. Mantz, John O'Brien, D. McKenzie, L. Drake, Michael Hogan, Daniel McCaffery, H. Britz, F. Stortz, T. Steinbacher, J. Kleiss and E. Page. The citizens killed were: L. C. Elliott, Campbell Mitchell, Alvin Lockwood, John Armstrong and David Morrow. Lieutenant W. L. English who was wounded, died in the Sisters' Hospital at Deer Lodge, August 19, 1877.

General John Gibbon, flesh wound in left leg; Captain C. Williams, Co. F, wounded above abdomen; 1st Lieutenant W. L. English, Co. I, shot through bowels, wound mortal; 1st Lieutenant C. J. Coolidge, Co. A, shot through both thighs and wounded in left hand; 2d Lieutenant C. A. Woodruff, wounded in thigh, leg and head; Sergeant P. C. Daly, Co. D, wounded in right temple; Sergeant James Bell, Co. E, wounded in right shoulder; Sergeant William Wright, Co. E, slight wound in forehead; Sergeant John W. H. Frederick, Co. G, wounded in left shoulder; Sergeant William Watson, Co. F, left hip shattered and flesh wound in left leg; William Burke, Co. G, shot through top of right lung, presumed mortal; John Erickson, Co. F, wounded in right shoulder; L. D. Brown, Co. A, wounded in left shoulder; R. M. Cunliffe, Co. I, flesh wound in left arm and left thigh; William Thompson, Co. A, wounded in left shoulder; Philo O. Hurlbut, Co. K, wounded in right shoulder; George Maurer, Co. F, ball entered face at angle of jaw, carrying away cheek, roof of mouth and front teeth; George Banghart, Co. G, wounded in right shoulder; Christian Lutman, Co. F, shot through both thighs; Howard Clark, Co. K, wounded in left foot and ankle; Edward Hunter, Co. F, right arm badly shattered; John Murphy, Co. D, wounded in right hip; Patrick Fallon, Co. I, shot through both hips, ugly wounds; Mryon M. Lockwood, citizen of upper Bitter Root, shot through both thighs, ugly wounds, but both bullets were extracted; O. Leifer, citizen of Skalkaho, wounded in right foot and ankle; Fred Helt, citizen of Skalkaho, wounded in foot and arm; J. C. Lehmer, Co. A, wounded in foot and ankle; David Healon, Co K, wounded in right wrist; James Keyes, Co. D, wounded in left foot; M. Devine, Co. K, left arm shattered; George Leher, Co. K, wounded in head; Charles B. Gould, 2d Cav., badly wounded in chest; James Davis, Co. I, badly wounded in left ankle and leg; Charles Alberts, Co. A, shot through lungs.

The news of the Big Hole disaster reached Helena at 9 o'clock on the morning of August 11. The citizens at once organized an ambulance, and early in the afternoon Doctors Reece and Steele, with hospital attendants Pope, Nowlan and Stipe were en route to the Beaverhead country. Rev. Palladino and two Sisters of Charity left at the same time to aid the dying and wounded soldiers. The aid offered by Butte was no less prompt and effective. John Downs, Marcus Daly, and Lee W. Foster were appointed to organize relief. This resulted in the formation of an ambulance corps and militia guard under the following officers: W. A. Clark, major; Charles S. Warren, adjutant and quartermaster; James A. Talbot, captain; T. M. Lowry, lieutenant; James W. Wheelock and O. B. Whitford, surgeons. The escort comprised the volunteers named in the following list, together with a few others whose names are mentioned in other pages: Peter McDermott, F. M. Ramsdell, T. A. Rea, Richard S. Jones, James Irvin, P. B. Thomas, George W. Mooney, G. H. Stoner, Dennis Simpson, "Brick" Van Waters, William Woodward, Charles B. Finn, A. W. Camp, Samuel M. Johnson, J. K. Bradley, David Jones, A. J. Noyes, James B. Prowse, John Dolas, Mason Warren, Peter Sherr, Thomas Mitchell, John G. Keith, Frank Rodgers, Edward Hickey, Simon Hauswirth, Robert Hauswirth, James Widner, A. J. Grubb, G. S. Harrison, A. W. Bernard, Richard Pue, Benjamin Venor, Patrick Foley, W. H. Archer, S. P. Alexander N. L. Turner, E. W. Sigsbee, James Johnson, Ezra Alderman, Patrick Talent, L. W. Kennear, Robert Simms, Pat Whalen, B. C. Benson, J. C. McLin, Henry Suprenant, William Sinsell, Addison Smith, C. E. Humphreys and John C. Belk. The transports were five in number, and furnished gratis, as follows; Charles Swan, Concord wagon; Cohn & Brother, ambulance; H. C. Stoner and Peter Sherr, mules and light wagon; William Owsley, Concord wagon; Edward King, Concord wagon. The moneys contributed amounted to $412.

When General Gibbon asked for surgeons, supplies and an ambulance train to be sent to the Big Hole battlefield under sufficient escort to protect it if the Indians still intercepted, Captain Stuart's Deer Lodge company at once started, camped that night at Mill creek and were in the Big Hole valley with over twenty ambulances and spring wagons next day noon. Major Clark with the Butte company reached French gulch Sunday night—thirty-five men, five wagons, two surgeons, supplies, etc. On Monday morning they were met by a courier fifteen miles north of the battlefield stating General Gibbon had started down with his wounded and desired them to await the approach of his train, which soon came in sight. The wounded were at once transferred from the army wagons to the lighter ones sent out, and started for Deer Lodge, arriving here at noon on Thursday.

Under date August 17, 1877, General Gibbon ordered the publication of the following letter: "I desire to return the heartfelt thanks of myself and my command to the citizens of Deer Lodge, Helena and Butte, for the prompt and liberal assistance forwarded to us in the Big Horn basin. By the speedy help sent us and the sympathy and care shown the wounded since their arrival in Deer Lodge, the people of this section have endeared themselves to us in a way which can never be forgotten. I wish especially to acknowledge our obligations to Drs. Mitchell, Steel, Reese, Wheelock and Whitford and their assistants, and the Sisters of Charity who met us on the road and did so much to alleviate our sufferings; as also to the ladies of Deer Lodge, who since our arrival have taken the care of the wounded entirely out of our hands."

After the battle the Indians collected many of the wounded, and killed all the wounded of Gibbon's command left on the field. One lad, a musician, was shot through both legs and unable to follow the command around in its successive movements. He was found afterward with his throat stabbed in three places.

After the wounded were safely placed in the charge of the ambulance corps and Sisters of Charity the volunteers under Captains Clark and Stuart returned to aid General Howard's force. They made the journey to Bannack in two days, and camped near the United States troops, who took three days to complete the march. Here the service of these volunteers may be said to end. The reasons are fully set forth in the series of resolutions signed by Thomas Stuart, R. H. Mason, Robert Irvine, N. Dickenson, John Deshamp, W. E. Hawley, W. B. Judd, A. S. Higgins, Geo. Doll, D. Mossburgh, R. Anderson, J. S. McAndrews. O'Brien O'Bannon, who served with this company until the 19th of August, indorsed the statement subsequently.

After the battle of Big Hole the Indians' squaws marched south, crossed the Utah stage road on August 16, between Hole-in-the-rock and Camas creek stations. The day after the fighting men of the tribe followed the same trail. On the way down the savages did not interfere with the people of Lemhi Valley; but meeting with some obstacles on Horse Prairie, murdered five citizens. The fighting party which fell into the hands of the Nez Perces at Birch creek, on August 20, comprised Albert Green, James Hayden, Daniel Combs, Albert E. Lyons, two white strangers and two Chinamen. Lyons and the Chinese escaped, the former reaching Richardson's cabin seven days later. Lyons had been one of General Connor's best scouts, but on his return to Montana entered upon freighter's work. On the 19th they warned Major Reed and O. J. Salisbury to return at a point below Pleasant Valley. On the 20th they gave battle to Sandford's cavalry and drove that command back on General Howard's reserve, who camped fourteen miles north of Pleasant Valley on the night of the 19th. Early on the afternoon of the 20th Howard's Infantry crossed Dry Creek Station, en route to Camas Meadow, where they arrived in the evening and encountered the Indians. The result of this attempt to force an interview is told in the following telegram:

"DRY CREEK, Idaho, August 20, 8:30 p.m.—A courier is just in from the battle-field which was at the head of Camas Meadow, 20 miles from Dry Creek, at 3 o'clock this morning. Norwood fought desperately. Eight soldiers were wounded and one killed. No dead Indians were found. The Indians stole the pack train of 200 animals. Twenty of the Virginia volunteers are afoot. None wounded or killed. Norwood recaptured fifty-seven animals. Howard starts for Henry's Lake this morning. He thinks the Indians may come through Madison Valley."

Looking Glass commanded on this occasion, and displayed remarkable military science. Captain Randolph Norwood's company of 2d Cavalry lost one man killed, while the 7th Infantry had Lieutenant Henry M. Benson and seven privates wounded. Captain Callaway's Madison county volunteers were present, but escaped casualties. The pursuit begun by General Howard on August 18 was thus checked, and had the effect of giving the savages another fair start in their race to escape the annihilation promised them if conquered. The advance of the Nez Perces by the southern passes was carried out in regular order. General Howard was left far in the rear, and the savages entered the Yellowstone Park without molestation. There they discovered a party of excursionists from Radersburg and Helena. From the former town were George J. Cowen, Mrs. Cowen, Miss Carpenter and her brother Frank. This party was captured near the Lower Geyser basin. The excursionists from Helena were Wm. Dingy A. J. Arnold, of Blackfoot; Chas. Mann, of Radersburg, and A. Oldham, all of whom succeeded in escaping through the aid of a Nez Perces called Charlie. In the effort to capture lawyer Cowen one of the Indians fired at him, the bullet striking his forehead and fortunately flattening there. After a captivity of three weeks Chief Joseph gave the Carpenter family and Mr. Cowen a passport to their homes. An ambulance was despatched from Fort Ellis, which conveyed the party to Bozeman. Dingy and Arnold made their way to Virginia City through the woods, traveling 100 miles. Had the savages not subjected this party to the worst treatment ever offered to mortals the Nez Perces could claim a war conducted in a manner of which civilizatien could boast.

The Helena party were more fortunate than the Cowan excursionists. Richard Detrich and Charles Kenk were killed and Weikart and Stuart wounded. The story of this expedition, as told to Lieutenant Schofield of Howard's command, by Pfester, is as follows:

"Our party consisted of Kenk, Stuart, Roberts, Foller, Weikart, Duncan, Detrich, Wilkie, Ben. Stone, the colored cook, and myself, and were on our way to visit the Geyser Basins. Yesterday we were encamped near Sulphur Mountain, and during the afternoon one of the boys said he had seen either a herd of buffalo or elk, or a band of Indians, about five or six miles above us on the other side of the Yellowstone river. Duncan took a spy-glass and went up on the mountain to determine if possible, what they were. He soon returned and said they were Indians, and proposed that we get out of that as soon as possible. We accordingly packed up and moved back three or four miles, when one of the boys proposed that we go no farther, as Howard was after the Indians, and by to-morrow they would be gone, and we pitched our tents there. We camped for the night, but some of the boys wanted to go back home, but the majority was of the mind to go ahead to the geysers, as we had come thus far, and the journey was almost completed. Kenk and Duncan said they were going back, Indians or no Indians, and Kenk left us and went as far as the falls, but returned about ten o'clock last night, as no one had followed his example. We got up about six or seven o'clock this morning, and Andy Weikart and Wilkie took their horses and went out on a scout. They were to fire their guns if they saw Indians, and we waited three or four hours for them to return. It was nearing dinner time and I left the camp for the purpose of getting wood, leaving some of the boys asleep, and the remainder sitting about the camp fire. I was busy getting wood when all of a sudden, pop, pop, went the guns and I heard the Indians' yip, yip! I looked around and saw the camp full of Indians with the boys jumping and going in every direction. I saw two of the boys coming towards me and I lit out for the river. I reached the river and on looking back heard two shots and some one exclaim, "O, my God!" I don't know who these two were but think it was Jack Stuart and Kenk. I swam the river, came down to Burnett's bridge, and recrossed to this side, and here I am. * * * I don't think any of the boys got away—the Indians piled the bullets in plenty."

McCarthy, of Texas Jack's party, and Weikart, of the Helena party, found Kenk's body and interred it; the remains of Detrich were subsequently found and interred.

The Nez Perces flanked General Sturgis September 13, and went down Clarke's Fork, burning three houses at Rouse's Point and the McAdow saw mill. The Crows aided the United States troops. A day later the Indians entered the Muscleshell. On September 23, the tribe crossed at Cow Island, attacked the rifle pits and continued to fight until 10 A.M., on the 24th. Frederick Barker was killed in this action. They burned thirty tons of government freight and twenty tons of goods for merchants. Colonel Clendennin, with Messrs. Weimer and Walter, took part in the fight. On the 28th, Major Ilges, with eighteen troops and citizens of Benton, attacked a band near Cow Island, killing and wounding several savages.

From a report made by J. J. Healy, who arrived at Fort Benton October 8, with official reports for General Terry, the surrender of Chief Joseph and 350 Nez Perces was learned. The last battle in this campaign was a terrific one. General Miles struck the Nez Perces' camp on the northern side of the Bear Paw mountains, September 30. Lieutenant Jerome, who was sent to the Indian camp to explore during the truce of October 1, was held there until the 2d, when Chief Joseph, who was in quest of General Miles, returned, and dismissed Jerome. The fight was resumed on the 2d October and continued until October 5. General Miles's loss was 23 killed and 44 wounded. The Indians lost 17 killed, including Looking Glass and a brother of Chief Joseph. The troops captured 700 horses, but allowed seventy-eight Nez Perces to escape.

General Gibbon notified Governor Potts of the surrender of the Nez Perces on October 5, October 8, 1879.

During the summer of 1878, the savages who escaped from General Miles returned via Cadotte pass, killed a citizen at Bear Gulch, escaped the pursuit of Captain Wallace's command near Missoula, and reached the camp of the tribe in Idaho.

Looking Glass, whose name is derived from a tin looking-glass which he wore on his breast, was about forty-five years of age in 1877. This savage was about five feet seven inches in height, hair streaked with gray, flat face, and ungainly as a savage can be. Duncan McDonald, a relative of his, is inclined to give him the leading position both in the tribal and military counsels of that time. Chief Joseph was fully six feet seven inches in height, well proportioned, and intelligent. Unlike Looking Glass, his cheek bones are prominent, and his face a tale of determination. Whatever credit belongs to Looking Glass for the success of his stragetic knowledge, to Joseph belongs the honor of leading his fellow savages wherever it was necessary.

White Bird was a true savage, but unfitted to be a leader, and never, in war, acted on his own responsibility, save at Salmon river, in 1877. He was called by the whites Joe Hale, and was known from the Missouri to the Pacific as a close trader, and his name did not escape mention when a horse-stealing expedition returned to the Nez Perces camp. His principal duty was that of chief commissary and adjutant. All matters relating to provisions, arms, ammunition, picket duty, prisoners, was left to him, while to his superiors, Joseph and Looking Glass, the art of war was confided.

The volunteers who served against the Nez Perces in 1877, and who were recognized by the War Department as belonging to the Montana militia of that year, are named on the rosters. Under the several acts of congress relating to the campaign against the Nez Perces, approved March 3, 1881, such volunteers were declared to be entitled to pay for their services, and in carrying out the spirit of these acts, the following order was issued:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF DAKOTA,
FORT SNELLING, MINN., June 24, 1881.

In accordance with instructions from the office of the Adjutant General of the Army, under date of May 9, 1881, as soon as practicable after the 1st of July next, Colonel John Gibbon, Seventh Infantry, will proceed to Helena, Mont., taking station at that place, and visiting such other points in the territory as he may find necessary in carrying out these orders under the act approved March 3, 1881, entitled "An act for the relief of the citizens of Montana who served with the United States troops in the war with the Nez Perces," etc. Colonel Gibbon will collect all claims under the act cited, with the evidence necessary for their adjustment. * * * First Lieutenant J. W. Jacobs, Regiment Quartermaster, Seventh Infantry, will accompany Colonel Gibbon to assist him in the performance of this duty. * * * By command of Brigadier General Terry.

SAMUEL BRECK, Assistant Adjutant General.

A. B. JOHNSON, Second Lieutenant Seventh Infantry, special duty Department A. G. O.

Acting on this order Colonel John Gibbons presided over the court of claims at Helena, and certified that 442 volunteers served against the Nez Perces, and that they were entitled to $6,879, October 5, 1881. The following rosters contain the names of volunteers acknowledged by the government:

Catlin's Company No. 1, July 4 to August 5, 1877.—John B. Catlin, * Scott Sherrill, * George. B. Hartman, Pope Catlin, Frank Lee, M. T. Sherrill, V. Burch, Fred. Held, Augustus Nelson, Oliver B. Jones, P. W. Faun, Joseph Putman, B. Williamson, Jacob Becker, G. Aurscough, James Laby, Henry Wilson, Charles B. Hart, W. S. Moon, Andrew Convey, J. M. Eastland, Allen Harris, John Quirk, John S. Pool, Thomas Sherrill, Julius Grill, Anthony Chaffin, Eugene Lent, James Burnley, Otto Leifer.

Catlin's Company No. 2, August 6 to August 14, 1877.—J. B. Catlin, M. F. Sherrill, V. Burch, F. Held, B. H. Wilkinson, Jacob Baker, Henry Wilson, Charles B. Hart, Thomas Sherrill, Eugene Lent, Joseph Hull, L. C. Elliott, Otto Leifer, A. Lockwood, David Morrow, John Armstrong, Myron Lockwood, W. H. Edwards, George Hubbard, Alexander Mitchell, Jerry Wallace, Joseph Hull, Newton Davis, Amos Buck, Samuel Chaffin, Newton Chaffin, William Chaffin, Squires Madden, William Ryan. Of this command L. C. Elliott, A. Lockwood, David Morrow, and John Armstrong were killed August 9, 1877. Otto Leifer was wounded and sent to Deer Lodge with Myron Lockwood, who was also severely wounded. Leifer received $96, and Myron Lockwood $252. To the other members of the command sums ranging from $4 to $12, were granted, reaching a total of $574.

Clark's Company No. 3, August 12 to August 18, 1877.—Wm. A. Clark, Jas. A. Talbott, T. M. Lowry, Rich S. Jones, Simon Hansworth, G. W. Mooney. G. H. Stooner, D. Simpson, W. Woodward, Charles B. Finn, W. H. Camps, J. K. Bradly, Jacob Jones, James Prowse, John Dolos, Peter F. Sherrs, Thomas Mitchell, V. L. Turner, Mason Warren, John G. Keith, John C. Bilk, William F. Sinsell, Edward Hickey, Robert Hansworth, Robert Simons (dead), A. W. Barnard, William Brenn, Patrick Fox, Andrew Grimes, Wilson Kane, Thomas Lyons, Frank Walter, Edward Stevens, Edward Truman, I. D. Moore, John Moore, Breck V. Walters, Lyman Kinnear, Peter McDermott, Alexander Brown. Members of this command, received payments of $6 and $7 each, except Brown, who received $2. The total payment was $263.

Callaway's Company No. 4, August 15 to August 25, 1877.—James E. Callaway, William W. Alward, John Allebaugh, Thomas Baker, Thomas T. Baker, John Barley, J. Boyle, Simon Buford, Joseph Buckland, Henry Brown, Charles Chadwick, Frank Dadow, Thomas J. Farrell, Henry Fishback, Sargeant Hall, J. F. Hart, J. Hackness, C. C. Houser, Thomas Ganey, R. O. Hickman, Rev. Frank Kellegher, Joseph Kelly, Frederick Kohls, James M. Kyle, James Mitchell, J. S. McCormick, William Morris, Worthy Noble, George D. Dell, Henry O'Donnell, W. H. Patrick, Henry Sermon, A. Shelleberger, D. S. Sumner, John Scully, W. W. Stevens, Isaac C. Smith, George W. Peck, Alvin Talbott, George Thexton, Walter Wynne, Edward T. Yager. George O'Dell died previous to 1881. Scully joined General Howard's command as guide. Isaac C. Smith and Edward T. Yager were surgeons of the company.

Donnelly's Company No. 5, September 20 to September 27, 1877.—John J. Donnelly, William Foster, Sol. A. Jantis, Charles B. Buckman, Louis Cobell, Joseph Morrison, J. W. Hanna, W. B. Smith, Samuel Neall, J. C. Lilly, Ed. L. Smith, John Samples, C. E. Deanville, Ed. Tingle, James Dare, G. A. Croff, C. S. Davis, J. H. Evans, Hiram Baker, Crow Davis, Trev. Hale, Murray Nicholson, Powder Bull, Wm. Preston, P. H. Estes, Wolf's Head, George Farmer, Jos. Gauty, Isaac N. Clarke, Eph. Woolsey, J. W. Tatton, Richard Maloney, Thomas O'Hanlon, John Egan, W. S. Evans, George C. Smythe, John Kavanaugh, E. B. Richardson or Bradley, George Hammond, Martin Moran, William Rowe, William Murphy, Jeff. Talbert, Nicholas Walsh. Edwin B. Richardson, alias Bradley, was killed September 25, 1877. George C. Smythe died since that time. The members were granted from $6 to $10 each, aggregating $431.

Kenney's Company No. 6, July 14 to July 30, 1877.—E. A. Kenney, W. J. Stephens, Thomas Andrews, W. J. McCormick, J. D. Sheehan, F. C. Ives, Isaac Beattie, John Hayes, A. B. Hammond, C. Barbour, S. C. Dunham, O. W. Squires, W. S. Hall, William McWhirk, W. J, McNamara, A. Lefleur, F. M. Kiem, O. V. G. Gregg, G. H. White, W. J. Lyons, John Rankin, W. W. Fulkerson, A. Cave, J. H. Miller, J. G. Dooley, M. Cummings, P. Hanton, George Lancaster, G. A. Baker, E. Hammel, A. Plummer, N. Daggett, William Boyle, James Osborne, Daniel Woodman, O. Lugbaum, George Gerber, V. Limburg, C. McWhirk, M. Coleman, A. R. Higgins, J. R. Latimer, H. Buckhouse, G. A. Pelkey, James House, I.

* Received $32.00, remainder of command received $30.00. Total $604.00.

Thompson, C. B. Mahoney, David Walters, William Kelley, M. Duncan, D. Gigler, G. A. Wolf, P. Cluck, W. Tesson, C. Waller, A. Dow, R. A. Pelkey, W. E. Bancroft, T. W. Miles, R. H. Childs, L. Guvin. The total amount paid this command was $418, in sums ranging from $5 to $21 per member.

Captain Landram's Company No. 7, July 7 to August 4, 1877.—J. A. Landram, J. Chatfield, W. N. Smith, N. B. Leter, Alec Clark, George Wade, John Vinson, Frank Ess, A. S. Blake, J. P. Martin, C. Greenfield, M. D. Fulkerson, Oscar Clark, Mat. Fowler, M. Kerchner, M. Wright, Wm. Brown, Wm. Turmage, Frank Tudor, W. E. Bass, D. C. Bass, W. Hall, Neil Brooks, S. C. Tylor, J. D. Baggs, George Baggs, Thomas Fruen, B. N. Harris, S. I. Barber, James Dryer, J. O. Clark, Henry Harrell, F. C. Ives, V. R. Woodmancy. Members of this command received $28 each for their services, aggregating $1,004.00.

Captain McLean's Company No. 10, July 24 to Aug. 1, 1877.—J. G. McLean, J. K. Pardee, D. B. Jenkins, W. T. Allison, Jos. Arthur, Thomas Baer, Geo. Calderwood, G. Tummins, John Duffy, George Ferine, Albert Fisher, Henry Gilbert, Hector Horton, Louis Laiblin, Alfred Lock, Henry Lamb, John Ullery, Thomas McKay, Daniel Morse, J. W. Merrill, George W. Morse, Thomas McTighe, John Price, N. B. Ringling, Thomas Ryan, John Westfall. Each member of this company was granted the sum of $8.00 for services in the field, aggregating $208.

Captain Stuart's Company No. 11, July 24 to August 3, 1867.—Newton Dickenson, George Doll, William E. Hawley, Arthur S. Higgins, Robert Irvine, Daniel Berry, Boner Constancin, Roswell H. Mason, Howard Zenor, Thomas Stuart, William B. Judd, Samuel D. Stuart, W. W. Dixon, Archibald Heath, I. L. Napton, Hiram Knowles, Robert S. Kelly, Wm. B. Edgar, M. N. Gilbert, Henry S. Reed. The sum of $180 was distributed equally among the members of this command.

Captain Stuart's Company No. 12, August 12 to August 22, 1877.—Reece Anderson, Charles Bielenberg, Edward Dashiel, Newton Dickenson, George Doll, Wm. Hawley, Arthur Higgins, Robert Irvine, R. H. Mason, James S. McAndrews, O. B. O'Bannon, H. Zenor, Samuel D. Stuart, Edward Legsbre, W. B. Judd, Thomas Stuart, Raphael Lovatta, Alex. Brown, Thomas Beebe, Daniel Mossberg, John Thomas, Lafayette Strickland, Peter Lansing, Richard Johnson, George Miller, Geo. W. Irvine, J. H. Wildman, James N. York, Oliver Barnes, Mahlon N. Gilbert, Dumas L. McFarlan, Chas. Complainville, Louis Whitford, John Deschamps. Twenty members of this command were in the field until August 22, and were offered the sum of $10 each, while those who served only to August 18 were granted $6 each, aggregating $284.

Individual Claims for Service from October 1 to October 3, 1877.—William Roe, Jack Delano, C. D. Ladd, Trevanion Hale, John Castner, John O'Brien, Charles Danvale, James Arneaux, Powder Bull, E. Jeff. Devereaux. This scattered company were offered $30, or a sum of $3 each.

Individual Claims for Services in July, August and September, 1877.—Luther M. Johnson, twenty-one days, beginning July 24; Samuel J. Heron, twenty-nine days, beginning July 27; J. H. Bear, eighteen days, beginning August 1; John Sheehan, thirty-three days, beginning August 5; A. J. Noyes, seven days, beginning August 12. The volunteers named above received $1 per day, or a total of $108.

The following claims, made under the act of March 3, 1881, for losses of horses and arms, sustained while serving against the Nez Perces, were granted by Colonel Thos. H. Ruger, of the 18th United States Infantry, district commander, and a report of same made to the Adjutant General, December 11, 1881:

George Doll or O'Dell	$125	A. M. S. Carpenter	$150
W. D. Sumner	150	William Morris	175
W. W. Stevens	100	Raymond Brothers	300
W. H. Patrick	125	Patrick Murphy	125
W. M. Alward	50	Victoria Bostwick	125
Sergeant Hall	125	John Sheehan	100
Ira C. Smith	250	M. M. Lockwood	125
James Mitchell	125	W. H. Edwards	180
Walter Wynne	125	William Ryan	20
George Thexton	125	T. Hale	125
H. W. Warmington	100	Wm. Preston	75
E. T. Yager	100	Tremaine Hale	150
Thomas J. Farrell	100	P. H. Eates	125
Thomas J. Farrell	100	Joseph Hill	150
James E. Calloway	125

This sum of $3,750 was certified by Colonel Ruger, December 11, 1881, and recertified January 5, 1882, on account of horses lost in the service of the United States, except $20, allowed Wm. Ryan for a gun reported lost. Had not Colonel Ruger exercised the greatest caution, the claims would amount to tens of thousands of dollars.

The companies organized at Helena in July, 1877, to serve against the Nez Perces, were the Helena Cavalry, under Captain Thos. P. Fuller, and the Helena Light Artillery, under Captain Chas. D. Curtiss. The first company comprised Captain Fuller, Lieutenant A. J. Davidson, Second Lieutenant F. P. Sterling, Surgeon Thomas Reece, Chaplain Clark Wright; non-commissioned officers L. F. Evans, E. W. Toole, C. B. Vaughan, W. F. Chadwick, J. H. Jurgens, Andrew J. Smith, M. A. Meyendorff, Andrew J. Fisk, Wm. A. Dewar, and Bugler C. H. Bartruff. Theprivate troops enrolled were Jacob Medary, Frank Taylor, B. H. Tatem, W. F. Sanders, Simon Devine, R. H. Williams, O. B. Toole, R. E. Fisk, J. P. Keller, W. C. Riddle, J. C. Kerley, B. C. Kingsbury, R. C. Wallace, Francis Pope, D. W. Fisk, W. E. Cullen, H. W. English, G. E. Conrad, I. Greenbrood, C. L. Hayne, John H. Shober, W. H. Stipe, J. J. McFarland, S. H. Crounse, A. M. Walker, Carl Schuch, J. Armitage, C. O. Ewing, Daniel Madden, and J. H. McFarland.

The Helena Light Artillery, under Captain C. D. Curtis, was organized July 30, 1877, with the following members: Captain C. D. Curtis, Lieutenant Alex. Beattie, Second-Lieutenant Wm. Simms; non-commissioned officers H. Hennessy, R. H. Harwood, E. D. Bonnell, C. H. Richardson, Ed. Hatt, L. Duncan, and Chas. Kencke. The roster of private troops gives the names of H. R. Horr, F. Miles, Hugh McQuaid, J. J. McCoy, George McFarland, George A. Wells, T. Welcome, C. W. Cannon, Henry Torrey, John L. Woods, R. C. Wallace, Henry Guthrie, George Herrman, James Mason, J. B. Porter, L. F. LaCroix, H. Lyons, James A. Oldham, B. Cathlet, H. Richards, Wm. McLean, S. Bymm, Ross Dugan, Frank Spencer, T. Findlay, S. McKinsey, C. K. Wells, J. R. Boyce, Sr., James H. Shook, W. R. Bullard, Jas. W. Wilkinson, John H. Curtis, J. M. Blake, F. L. King, L. Meyers, S. T. Hauser, John Moody, M. Morris, James M. Ryan, Joseph McGee, W. J. Henderson, C. Woodman, Ed. McGraw, C. M. Jefferies, H. M. Porter, W. H. Allen, W. F. Hundley, V. H. Webster, A. Crandall, and Martin Fuller.

The Sioux War.—The causes which led to this war are explained, and a brief history of its first phases given, in Secretary of War Cameron's statement to the President, July 8, 1876. This statement was called for by Congressman Banning's resolution, asking the Secretary of War to report to the House the object of the expeditions of Generals Crook, Gibbon and Terry against the northwest Indians.

On July 6, 1876, Lieutenant Sibley, of General Crook's command, with twenty-five picked troopers, the scouts Frank Grouard and Baptiste Pourier, the mule-packer John Becker, and John F. Finnerty, late congressman, left Camp Cloud to discover the position of the Indians. The command traveled forty miles, and camped near the Little Big Horn. Next morning the men were again in the saddles, en route to the supposed place of the Indian encampment. From this moment until the return of the reconnoitering party, the lives of the men were in imminent danger. The story of the adventures of this command, as told by Mr. Finnerty, is worthy of a leading place in the history of this conquest of the Indians; but owing to its length, cannot find more than a reference in these pages. A few days after the troops returned from this perilous ride, General Crook's command advanced against the hostiles.

General Crook engaged the Sioux, June 17, 1876, on the Rosebud, about one hundred and twenty miles from General Terry's headquarters, at the mouth of the Powder river. The General's command was made up of twelve hundred men, including two companies of mounted infantry, with Snake and Crow auxiliaries. The command lost ten killed and thirty wounded, while the Sioux lost fifty killed and a large number wounded. The battle lasted four hours, when the hostiles retired to cover. During the engagement, numbers of warriors were killed, of whom thirteen were left on the field. Several Indian ponies were killed, and General Crook's horse was shot in his tracks. The casualties on the side of the troops were nine killed and thirteen wounded. The list of killed comprises the names of Sergeant Marshal and Private Roe, company F, 3d Cavalry; Privates Allen and Flynn, company I; Sergeant Newkerken, Privates Bennett, Potts, Conner and Mitchell, company L. The wounded were: Enoch, Cartz, Smith, Stewart, O'Brien and Lossey Cosky, company I; Cook, Edwards, Snow and Cramer, company L. Captain Henry, Sergeant O'Donnell and Private Steiner, of the 2d Cavalry, were wounded. One Snake scout was killed, and three Snakes and four Crows wounded. Skirmishes followed this encounter, until the Sioux actually concentrated between Terry and Crook, and thus mobilized, as it were, the small command of Custer found the savages. Prior to following up the history of the Sioux war, let us inquire into the causes which led to the massacre of Custer's command. After the close of the war of the rebellion, 1865–6, Sheridan's division commanders, Custer, Davin and Merritt, were commissioned lieutenant-colonels, and brevetted brigadier and major-generals in the United States Army, on the recommendation of Sheridan. On July 28, 1866, the 7th United States Cavalry was organized, with Custer lieutenant-colonel; A. J. Smith, colonel; Alfred Gibbs, major; William Thompson, F. W. Benteen, Miles W. Keogh, Ed. Myers, Robert M. West, Louis M. Hamilton, Albert Barnitz and Michael V. Sheridan, captains; Samuel M. Robbins, M. Berry, Owen Hale, Myles Moylan, F. V. Commagere and Thomas W. Custer, lieutenants. The command was strengthened March 17, 1867, when Joel H. Elliott and W. S. Abert were commissioned majors; T. M. Dayton, L. P. Gillette, George W. Yates, Thomas B. Weir, captains; Abell, Brewster, Bell, Wallingford, Cook and Jackson, lieutenants; James T. Leavy, B. S. Bassett, W. B. Clark, John M. Johnson, Ed. S. Godfrey, second-lieutenants. Of this command of twelve companies, or three battalions, Custer was de facto colonel, when it was dispatched to the plains in 1867 with the Hancock expedition.

The court martial following his campaign of 1867, and his suspension following the court martial, were fully understood by General Sheridan, who far from considering Custer in disgrace gave him a full suit of appartments at Fort Leavenworth. The languid campaigns of Generals Sully and Sandy Forsyth, in the Indian Territory, suggested to Generals Sherman, Sully and Sheridan the recall of Custer, and this was accomplished by a letter dated Fort Hayes, Kansas, September 24, 1868, and signed by P. H. Sheridan, major-general commanding. On September 30, he reported to General Sheridan, at Fort Hayes, and a few days later was in command of his regiment. The battle of Washita followed. In general field orders No. 6, made by Brev.-Lieut.-Col. J. Schuyler Crosby, A. D. C., A. A. A. on General Sheridan's staff, November 29, 1868, 103 warriors were reported killed, 53 squaws and children, 875 ponies, 1,123 buffalo robes and skins, together with supplies, captured, and the Arrapahoes and Kiowas scattered. Major Joel H. Elliot and Captain Louis McL. Hamilton and nineteen enlisted men were slain. General Custer's command was ordered to Dakota, in March, 1875. The same year his services on the northern plains commenced opposite the mouth of Tongue river. August 10, 1873, Sitting Bull's force of 1,500 warriors attacked companies A and B, 7th Cavalry, and companies C, I, F and K, of the 22d Infantry on the north bank of the Yellowstone, three miles below the mouth of the Big Horn. Patrick Bresland, of the 22d Infantry, mentioned the death of Dr. Honzinger, Baliran and Ball of the 7th Cavalry, at the hands of Rain-in-the-Face, and also that the station where the Yellowstone expedition of 1873 left the river and crossed the divide to the Muscleshell was named Pompey's Pillar by General Stanley. After this experience he received a leave of absence, and returning to his command, was named Commandant of Fort Abraham Lincoln. The Custer expedition of 1874, for the protection of the Black Hills followed after this. The capture of Rain-in-the-Face and the outbreak of the Sioux under their great chiefs, claimed his presence in the field. The following staff and regimental officers, were with his command in July, 1876: First-Lieutenant W. W. Cook, Adjutant; First-Lieutenant H. J. Newland, R. Q. M.; Major M. A. Reno, com. right wing; Captain W. F. Benteen, left wing; Captain William Keogh, First Battalion; Captain G. W. Yates, Second Battalion; Captain F. B. Wier, Third Battalion; Captain F. H. French, Fourth Battalion; Captain M. Mayland, Co. A; Captain F. A. McDougall, Co. B; Captain F. W. Custer, Co. C; Second-Lieutenant W. S. Edgerly, Co. D; First-Lieutenant A. E. Smith Co. E; Captain G. W. Yates, Co. F; First-Lieutenant D. McIntosh, Co. G; First-Lieutenant F. W. Gibson, Co. H; First-Lieutenant J. P. Porter, Co. I; Hodgson; First-Lieutenant E. S. Godfrey, Co. K; First-Lieutenant J. Calhoun, Co. L; First-Lieutenant E. Mathey, Co. M; First-Lieutenant C. C. Doandio, Co. M; Second-Lieutenant D. G. Wallace, Co. G; Crittenden, 20th Infantry, Assistant Surgeons Lord and DeWolf; Second-Lieutenant H. M. Harrington, Co. C; Second-Lieutenant L. R. Hare, Co. D; Second-Lieutenant J. G. Sturgis, Co. E; Second-Lieutenant W. V. A. Rielly, Co. F; Second-Lieutenant C. A. Varnum, Indian Scout. According to General Sheridan, whose report is based upon the best official information, Custer's column moved twelve miles up the Rosebud June 22, 1876, and then camped. The next day, June 23d, he continued up the Rosebud thirty-three miles, passing a heavy lodge pole trail, though not very fresh. June 24th, the advance was continued up the Rosebud, the trail and signs constantly growing fresher, until the column had marched twenty-eight miles, when camp was made. At 11 o'clock that night, the column was again put in motion, turning from the Rosebud to the right up one of its branches which headed near the summit of the "divide" between the Rosebud and the Little Big Horn. About 2 o'clock in the morning of June 25th, the column halted for about three hours, made coffee, then resumed the march, crossed the divide, and by 8 o'clock were in the valley of one of the branches of the Little Big Horn. By this time Indians had been seen, and as it was certain they could not now be surprised, it was determined to attack them. Custer took personal command of troops "C," "E," "F," "I," and "L," Major Reno was given troops "A," "G," and "M;" Captain Benteen, troops "H," "D," and "K;" Captain McDougall with troop "B," acted as guard to the pack train. The valley of the creek was followed towards the Little Big Horn, Custer on the right of the creek, Reno on the left of it, Benteen off still further to the left, and not in sight. About 11 o'clock Reno's troops crossed the creek to Custer's column and remained with them until about half past twelve o'clock, when it was reported that the village was only two miles ahead and running away.

Reno was now directed to move forward, at as rapid a gait as he thought prudent, and to charge, with the understanding that Custer would support him. The troops under Reno moved forward at a fast trot for about two miles, when they came to the river, halted a few moments to collect the men, and then deployed. A charge was made down the river, driving the Indians rapidly for about two miles and a half, until near the village which was still there. Not seeing anything, however, of the sub-divisions under Custer and Benteen, and the Indians swarming upon him from all directions, Reno took position, dismounted in the edge of some timber which afforded shelter for the horses of his command, continuing the fight on foot until it became apparent he would soon be overcome by the superior numbers of the Indians. He then mounted his troops, charged through the Indians, re-crossed the river, and gained the bluffs upon the opposite side. In his charge First-Lieutenant Donald McIntosh and Second-Lieutenant Benjamin H. Hodgson, 7th Cavalry, with Acting Assistant Surgeon J. M. DeWolfe, were killed. Reno's force succeeded in reaching the top of the bluff, but with a loss of three officers and twenty-nine enlisted men killed and several men wounded. Almost at the same time Reno's troops reached these bluffs Benteen's battalion came up, and a little later the pack train, with McDougall's troop escorting it. These three detachments were all united under Reno's command, and numbered about 380 men, in addition to their officers. Meanwhile nothing had been heard from Custer, so the re-united detachments under Reno moved down the river, keeping along the bluffs on the opposite side from the village. Firing had been heard from that direction, but after moving to the highest point without seeing or hearing anything of Custer, Reno sent Captain Weir with his troop to try to open communication with the former. Weir soon sent back word that he could go no further, and that the Indians were getting around him, at the same time keeping up a heavy fire with his skirmish line. Reno then turned everything back to the first position he had taken upon the bluff, which seemed the best for a defense, had the horses and mules driven into a depression, put his men, dismounted, on the crests of the hills making the depression, and had hardly completed these dispositions when the Indians attacked him furiously. This was about six o'clock in the evening, and the ground was held with a further loss of eighteen killed and forty-six wounded, until the attack ceased about nine o'clock at night. By this time the overwhelming numbers of the enemy rendered it improbable that the troops under Custer could undertake to rejoin those with Reno, so the latter began to dig rifle pits, barricaded with dead horses and mules and boxes from the packs, to prepare for any further attack which might be made the next day. All night long the men were working, while the Indians were holding a scalp dance, within their hearing, in the valley of the Little Horn below. About half past two o'clock in the morning, of June 26, a most terrific rifle fire was opened upon Reno's position, and as daylight increased hordes of Indians were seen taking station upon high points completely surrounding the troops, so that men were struck upon opposite sides of the lines from where the shots were fired. The fire did not slacken until half past nine o'clock in the morning, when the Indians made a desperate charge upon the line held by Troops "H" and "M," coming to such close quarters as to touch with a "coup-stick" a man lying dead within the lines. This onslaught was repulsed by a charge from the lines assaulted, led by Colonel Benteen. The Indians also charged close enough to send their arrows into the lines held by Troops "D" and "K," but they were driven back by a counter-charge of those troops accompanied in person by Reno. There were many wounded, and the question of obtaining water was a vital one; for the troops had been without any from six o'clock the previous evening, a period of about sixteen hours. A skirmish line was formed under Benteen, to protect the descent of volunteers down the hill in front of the position to reach the water. A little was obtained in canteens, but many of them were struck in securing the precious fluid. The fury of the attack was now over, and the Indians were going for something to eat and more ammunition, as they had been shooting arrows, or else that Custer was coming. Advantage was taken of this lull to rush down to the stream and fill all vessels possible with water, but the Indians continued to withdraw and firing ceased, excepting occasional shots from sharpshooters sent to annoy the soldiers near the water. About 2 o'clock P.M. the grass in the bottom was extensively fired by the Indians, and behind the dense smoke thus created the Indian village began to move away. Between six and seven o'clock in the evening the village came out from behind this cloud of smoke and dust, the troops obtaining a full view of the cavalcade as it filed away in the direction of Big Horn mountains, moving in almost full military order. All thoughts were now turned again toward Custer, of whom nothing had been seen or heard since he gave his orders on the previous day for the first advance by the detachments under Reno and Benteen, and which orders contemplated the support of these by the force retained under Custer's personal command. No one dreamed of the real explanation of Custer's absence, and the impression was that this heavy force of Indians had gotten between him and the rest, forcing him toward the mouth of the Little Big Horn, from which direction the column under Gibbon, with General Terry, was expected. During the night of June 26 the troops under Reno changed position so as to better secure a supply of water and to prepare against another assault, should the warriors return in strong force; but early in the morning of the 27th, while preparing to resist any attack which might be attempted, the dust of the moving column was seen approaching in the distance. Soon it was discovered to be troops who were coming, and in a little while a scout arrived with a note from General Terry to Custer, saying that some Crow scouts had come to camp, stating that Custer had been whipped, but that their story was not believed. About 10:30 o'clock in the morning General Terry rode into Reno's lines and the fate of Custer was ascertained.

General Alfred H. Terry, in his official report, dated Camp on Little Big Horn, June 27, 1876, noticed the military movements in the neighborhood of Massacre Field, and submitted for the information of the War Department, the following important explanation:

"At the mouth of the Rosebud, I informed General Custer that I should take the supply steamer Far West up the Yellowstone to ferry General Gibbon's column over the river; that I should personally accompany that column, and that it would in all probability reach the mouth of the Little Big Horn on the 26th instant. The steamer reached General Gibbon's troops, near the mouth of the Big Horn, early in the morning of the 24th, and at 4 o'clock in the afternoon all his men and animals were across the Yellowstone. At five o'clock the column, consisting of five companies of the seventh infantry, four companies of the second cavalry, and a battery of three Gatling guns, marched out to and across Tullock's creek, starting soon after 5 o'clock in the morning of the 25th. The infantry made a march of twenty-two miles over the most difficult country I have ever seen. In order that scouts might be sent into the valley of the Little Big Horn, the cavalry with the battery was then pushed on thirteen or fourteen miles farther, reaching camp at midnight. The scouts were sent out at half past four on the morning of the 26th. The scouts discovered three Indians, who were at first supposed to be Sioux, but when overtaken they proved to be Crows, who had been with General Custer. They brought the first intelligence of the battle. Their story was not credited. It was supposed that some fighting, perhaps severe fighting, had taken place, but it was not believed that disaster could have overtaken so large a force as twelve companies of cavalry. The infantry, which had broken camp very early, soon came up, and the whole column entered and moved up the valley of the Little Big Horn. During the afternoon efforts were made to send scouts through to what was supposed to be General Custer's position, and to obtain information of the condition of affairs; but those who were sent out were driven back by parties of Indians, who, in increasing numbers, were seen hovering in General Gibbon's front. At twenty minutes before 9 o'clock in the evening, the infantry had marched between twenty-nine and thirty miles; the men were very weary, and daylight was failing; the column was, therefore, halted for the night at a point about eleven miles in a straight line above the mouth of the stream. This morning the movement was resumed, and after a march of nine miles Major Reno's intrenched position was reached. The withdrawal of the Indians from around Reno's command, and from the valley, was undoubtedly caused by the appearance of General Gibbon's troops. Major Reno and Captain Benteen, both of whom are officers of great experience, accustomed to see large masses of mounted men, estimated the number of Indians engaged at not less than twenty-five hundred. Other officers think that the number was greater than this. The village in the valley was about three miles in length, and about a mile in width. Besides the lodges proper, a great number of temporary brushwood shelters were found in it, indicating that many men, besides its proper inhabitants had gathered together there. Major Reno is very confident that there were a number of white men fighting with the Indians. It is believed that the loss of the Indians was large. * * *"

A dispatch to the Herald, dated Stillwater, July 2, 1876, and signed by W. H. Norton, conveyed the news of the catastrophe to the people beyond the Belt range. This telegram was based on the account given by Muggins Taylor, one of General Gibbon's scouts, who arrived at Stillwater on the night of July 1. The official returns of the number slain, as given by Secretary of War Cameron, July 8, 1876, are 251 killed and 53 wounded. The former figures include General Custer, Captains Keogh, Yates and Custer, Lieutenants Cook, Smith, McIntosh, Calhoun, Porter, Hodgson, Sturgis, and Reilly, of the 7th Cavalry, Lieutenant Crittenden, of the 20th Infantry, Acting Assistant Surgeon De Wolfe, Lieutenant Harrington, of the cavalry, and Assistant Surgeon Lord. Boston Custer, a brother, and Reed, a nephew, of General Custer, were with him and were killed. Mark Kellogg, a Bismarck Tribune reporter, and Charles Reynolds, were also slain. Captain Benteen and Lieutenant Varnum, of the cavalry, and fifty-one men were wounded. On the arrival of General Gibbons the dead were buried, and the wounded men rescued and attended to.

Miles' Pursuit of the Sioux.—The pursuit of the Sioux after the Little Big Horn affair was weak in the extreme. In October, 1876, this military inactivity was brought to a close by the exit of 1,000 lodges of Sioux from the Standing Rock Agency, and the non-appearance of the supply train at the time it should arrive. Scouts failed to learn of this train, and on October 17, 1876, General Miles ordered out the 5th U. S. Infantry. On the 18th the troops met the supply train. Colonel Ottis stated that after the first day's march the herd was attacked at about 3 A.M. by Sitting Bull's band, and a couple of dozen mules stampeded. The following day it was harrassed so much on its march that it was obliged to put back. It was again started out and was again attacked, this time during the day; about 300 or 350 Indians taking part in the fight which followed. Failing in stampeding the mules or capturing the train, they sent in a flag of truce, and repented of this attack, promising not to molest the trains any more, stipulating, however, that the train guard should not in future kill any more buffalo. They then left, and the train moved off without any more trouble. After receiving this information General Miles decided to order the 22d Regiment to Tongue river and proceed with the 5th Regiment to punish the Sioux. On the 19th of October this plan was put in practice. The 5th Regiment proceeded fifteen miles to Cherry creek, where camp was made. On the 20th the command reached Cedar creek, where the train guard had seen the savages last, and where also, they did not delay showing themselves to the 5th Regiment. A few councils between Sitting Bull and General Miles were held on October 20 and 21, 1876, but the chief resolved to fight rather than agree to the terms of peace proposed by Miles. A battle ensued in which the Indians were repulsed with heavy loss in men and supplies. Later the Minneconjous and Sans Arcs surrendered, giving as hostages their chiefs, Black Eagle, Red Shirt, Sunrise, Sitting Eagle, White Bull and Foolish Bull.

The winter expedition of 1876–7 completed organization in November 1876 after General Crook's return from the Red Cloud Agency. The column left Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory, November 6, and arriving at Fort Fetterman a few days later, made it the rendezvous. The column was made up of ten companies of calvary, eleven of infantry, four of artillery, and a motley company of scouts and soldiers numbering between two hundred and three hundred men. The troops under orders on November 3 were: 4th Cavalry, companies B, D, E, F, I and M; 5th Cavalry, companies H and L, and companies K of the 2d and K of the 3d. Companies C, F, H and K of the 4th artillery; A, R, D, I, F and K of the 9th Infantry, D and G of the 14th, and C, G and I of the 23d. General Crook commanded. General Mackenzie, Colonel of the 4th cavalry, commanded the cavalry and Lieutenant-Colonel R. I. Dodge the infantry and artillery. The other officers ordered into the field were as follows: 4th cavalry, Captains, Mauck, John Lee, Wirt Davis, W. C. Hemphill; Lieutenants, Martin, Callahan, Mason, Bealis, Irwin, Shoemaker, Rosenquest, Budd, Otis, Miller, Lawton, McKenney, Dorst and Tyler. 5th cavalry, Major G. A. Gordon; Captains, John M. Hamilton and A. B. Taylor; Lieutenants, Rockwell, Wheeler, Ward and Swift; Artillery, Captains, H. C. Cushing, Jas. B. Campbell and F. G. Smith; Lieutenants, Taylor, J. M. Jones, Cummins, Crozier, H. R. Anderson, Howe and French. 9th infantry, Major G. F. Townsend, Captain Devine; Lieutenants, Foote, Lee, McCaleb, Pease, Rockefeller and Baldwin. 14th infantry, Captains, Vanderslice and Krause; Lieutenants, Austin, Hasson and Kimball. 23d infantry, Captains, Otis W. Pollock and Charles Wheaton; Lieutenants, Hay, Dodge, Pratt and Clarke. Medical corps, Assistant Surgeon James R. Gibson, chief medical officer; Assistant Surgeons, Price and Wood, and Acting Assistant Surgeons, Owsley and Petteys. On General Crook's personal staff were; First Lieutenant John G. Burke, 3d cavalry; Aide-de-camp Walter S. Schuyler, 5th cavalry: Aide-de-camp W. P. Clark, commanding Indian scouts; Captain George C. Randall, commanding the entire detachment of Indians, including Sioux, Snakes, Crows and Pawnees, and Captain Frank North in command of the Pawnee scouts. Captain John B. Furey Quartermaster, and First-Lieutenant C. H. Rockwell Chief Commissary of Subsistence.

In August, 1877, Sitting Bull showed a decided inclination to re-enter his old hunting grounds. On the 13th of that month he recrossed the line en route to Fort Peck. It appears that the chief's brother-in-law had stolen thirty horses from the Widow Ouillette, and brought them south to the Missouri. Sitting Bull pretended to be very angry about the affair and desired to follow and punish the thief, but was dissuaded by Major Walsh. It is now believed that the Sioux chief was a party to the theft, which was arranged and executed to afford him an excuse for crossing the line. The Gros Ventres reported large bands of Sioux traveling from the North toward Fort Peck. The grass had been fired and the whole country north of the South Fork of the Marias river was in a blaze. Ed. Kelly and a freighter at Twenty-eight Mile Springs lost about twenty-three head of horses, and about forty head was run off from the Blackfoot Agency. It is unnecessary to detail the encounters with the Sioux during the year 1877. Governor Miles played off his small command with such consummate tact that the savages were checked on every side. The following order is characteristic of this campaign. This is dated Tongue River cantonment, August 22, 1877, signed by N. A. Miles, and addressed to Major James S. Brisbin, commanding battalion of 2d cavalry.

"MAJOR:—I send you at once all the force you ask for, and in addition the best steel rifled gun, in my judgment, in the country for Indian service. Major Lazelle has orders to move down to a point near Sentinel Buttes, and will be available to co-operate, furnish supplies, or, if a large force of Indians is found, to join you for any service. Please do all in your power to destroy or drive in that band of Indians, and spare neither horseflesh nor pains to accomplish the work. When the commands turn back or west, should the Indians retreat toward the headwaters of Powder river, I wish the grass burned behind you in that whole section of country, and the region of the Little Missouri left untenable for Indians or game."

Governor Potts, in his address to the Legislature, January 13, 1879, dealt very fairly with the Indian question, and suggested that Montana be organized into a military department with General Miles in command.

During the early part of 1879, Interpreter Lambert, of Fort Peck agency, was murdered. The crime was credited to the Sioux, but subsequently it was learned that the perpetrators were members of the Crow tribe, three of whom were arrested at the time of the discovery of their crime, and two more, demanded from the tribe by General Miles, were afterwards brought to justice. The Sioux, however, suffered in this instance for the crimes of their Crow enemies. General Miles' troops gave chase, and on the 17th of July his advance came up with the red devils. Company C, 2d Cavalry, and a detachment of Company I, 5th Infantry, Lieutenant Borden, with Indian scouts, consisting of Crows, Cheyennes, Assiniboines and Bonocks, a force of seventy white men and fifty Indians, all under command of Lieutenant Clark, were sent forward a considerable distance in advance of the main body on detached service after half-breeds, when they unexpectedly ran on to a large party of hostile Sioux under Sitting Bull himself. The Indian scouts at once began firing on them. Although the hostiles would doubtless have moved off quietly if time had been given, for the meeting was a mutual surprise, the scouts at once began to fight, and the "hostiles" naturally began a defense. They held their ground, though gradually falling back, until they got their squaws and children across Milk river, a distance of some twelve miles, when some 250 of the warriors recrossed the Milk and began to fight in good earnest. When the Indian scouts saw these Sioux returning, many of them were in favor of leaving the soldiers to take care of themselves, but Little Wolf, of the Cheyennes, made a speech, calling his men cowards, etc., and Old Snake (though a young warrior), of the Crows, brought his warriors up with no trouble, and they just went in, the other Indians among the scouts keeping quiet. The hostiles, when they returned from the north side of the Milk river, evidently meant to clean out the little body of troops. That they would have done so and the Custer massacre been repeated there was no doubt, had it not been for the splendid fighting done by the Cheyennes, under Little Wolf, and the Crows, under Old Snake, who alone prevented the soldiers from being entirely surrounded, the Indian allies keeping open communications to the rear until aid came up. When the hostiles came back from the north side of the Milk, the soldiers had but a few rounds of ammunition left, while the hostiles had a large number of sharpshooters armed with rifles of greater range, and could easily pick off the soldiers had they been able to get close enough, but the Crows and Cheyennes, by their splendid fighting, kept them off. The hostiles' loss was eight bucks and two squaws killed, and our loss was two Cheyennes and one Crow killed, and two soldiers of Company C, 2d Cavalry, wounded. After the main body of the expedition came up the hostiles began a retreat, being closely followed to the Canadian line some forty-five miles. So hot was the pursuit that Sitting Bull abandoned from fifty to one hundred tons of buffalo meat, some horses, and a good many travois (Indian wagons made of poles, the butts dragging along the ground and the tops fastened to the horse like wagon shafts).

The expedition captured on our territory some 645 Red River carts belonging to Canadian half-breeds, and about 700 of "the breeds" themselves. After their capture they were given their choice to return north of the Canadian line and remain there, or to cross to the south of the Missouri out of the Indian reserves, which embrace all the territory north of the Missouri west from Fort Buford, at the mouth of the Yellowstone, as well as a considerable distance east of that fort, west to the Marias river, which empties into the Missouri from the north twelve miles east, by land, from Fort Benton. They all decided to return to Canadian territory but 150, who resolved to settle in the Judith Basin. Early in August the expedition, having settled temporarily with the Sioux, entered on the return journey to the principal posts.

Captain S. T. Hamilton, of Company I, 2d Cavalry, with twelve men of that company and one wagon, was detached to escort the half-breeds and their 147 Red River carts and ponies, to Judith Basin. After seeing the half-breeds safely in the Basin, Captain Hamilton and his command continued west to Fort Logan (old Camp Baker), then came back down the valley of the Muscleshell to the Big Bend, where it turns north, then crossed the divide to the south-east into the Yellowstone, and down that valley to Fort Keogh.

Major Gordon's command, consisting of a detachment of Company I, 2d Cavalry; and Companies C, G and M, of the same regiment, together with thirty Crow Indian scouts and a large force of Crows and Cheyennes, recrossed the Missouri near Camp Loder on August 19 and 20, en route to Forts Keogh and Custer.

General Miles' command divided on its return, August 1, on the Milk river, near the mouth of Rocky fork, General Whistler then left with the infantry for Poplar River agency, on the Missouri. On August 5, General Miles, with a small escort, left for Fort Peck, leaving seven companies of 2d Cavalry on Beaver creek, near where the fight of July 17 was—under Colonel Baker—Colonel B.'s command continued down the Milk river to the mouth of the Little Rocky, Colonel Baker continuing with four companies down to Fort Peck.

Succeeding this last chastisement of the Sioux, Montana was insured a term of peace. The United States troops were so placed as to keep a strict watch upon the Indians on both sides of the boundary line. It was known that the savages were maturing their plans secretly so as to prevent them from becoming more than an object of suspicion to either the Canadian police or United States forces. In diplomatic circles, also, the Indian refugees in the Canadian Northwest claimed some attention. Mr. Evarts, in his correspondence with the British minister, took the position that Sitting Bull has committed crimes and depredations in this country for which he would have been properly punished had it not been for his escape to Canada, where a shelter was afforded him. The fact that the Canadian authorities did afford Sitting Bull shelter, Mr. Evarts thinks, entitles his government to hold the Canadian government responsible for any incursion that may be made upon this territory by Sitting Bull and his followers. Never was the government in such a favorable position to enforce a principle. One million of armed men could within twenty-one days be cast, as it were, into Canada, and the whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific held until every item of United States claims was settled. Matters were settled amicably by the diplomatists, and the United States saved the trouble and expense of acquiring the large and unprofitable territory, which Canada then was.

In 1880 and 1881 the Sioux were very seldom seen on this side of the boundary until their surrender in the summer of the latter year. Then Bull's Ghost, Bull Dog, Fool Heart, Big Road, Crow King, Gall or Gaul, Low Dog, Little Hawk, Circle Bear, Sacred Eagle, Crazy Thunder, Crawler, Don't-go-out, Bob-Tail Hawk, Black Moon, Rain-in-the-Face and Hump returned from their exile, entered the Fort Yates reservation and there surrendered. Within two miles of the hostiles' camp were 30,000 men, women and children of the Sioux nation, including, Cheyennes, Suasaves, Minneconjous, Ogallallas, Uncapapas, Yanktonnais, Brule, Blackfeet and Sans Arcs. The hostiles were turned over to the Interior Department, represented by United States Indian Agent J. A. Stephan, or Father Stephan, by Captain Howe and Lieutenant Ogle, of the 17th United States Infantry. Captain Howe called the chiefs and the interpreter into the inclosed space in front of his tent, and telling them that he was no longer their father and that they must look to the agent, said he had some presents for them as tokens of his good will. They received this announcement with a "How" of approval, and Lieutenant Ogle, after making them a neat little speech, distributed the presents. These were a suit of clothes for each, a flannel shirt with a flaming red shield in front (which several of them immediately proceeded to put on over their own clothes), papers of tobacco, and last, but not least, a quantity of paint. As soon as Rain-in-the-Face received his proportion of this, he took some in his hand and, spitting on it, rubbed it over the upper part of his face and his hair until both were of the color of gold; then Chief Gaul, who was spokesman for the Indians, said they wanted guns that they might hunt. Captain Howe told them that he had no authority to give them and that he must apply to the agent. A few days later Sitting Bull surrendered, an account of which event is given in the reminiscences of Captain Walter Clifford, who was in charge of the men who brought this terrible savage to Fort Buford.

After the surrender the chief and his 1,500 fellow braves were removed to the Standing Rock agency, where they were fed, rested, clothed and fattened at the expense of the hospitable public. In August, 1881, Chiefs Red Bull, Thunder Hawk, Bear's Rib, Walking Shooter, Fire Heart, and Big Head were treated to a ride on the steamer Peck to Pierre, D. T., and thence on August 7 on the cars to Washington. Sitting Bull and 1,200 of his warriors were previously treated to a similar pleasure trip. Sitting Bull was the war Chief of the Sioux since 1872; but Gall or Gaul was the political—the head chief to whom the credit is given of directing the Custer massacre in 1876. The tribe is now following in the footsteps of the few good Indians. Within the past few years the chiefs and their families have been received into the Roman Catholic Church. Louie Sitting Bull, son of the chief, is at the Catholic Institution at Feehanville, near Chicago. Louie is one of the few Indian boys at the school who give the teachers considerable trouble. He is lazy, dogged, sullen, and shiftless. He is not a handsome youth. He is nearly six feet tall, heavy, awkward and ungainly. His features are large, his nose flattened and his ears ragged. Both ears have been pierced, or rather punched, several times. There are holes through them that you could put a lead pencil into. One of the original punches has been torn to the edge, and a new hole has been made higher up. One of his ears has a hole through the top of it. Other children of the tribe are scattered through various institutions of this class, while the zealous missionaries of the Christian churches are working industriously among them, so that there is still hope for the partial civilization of this barbarous nation.

CHAPTER IV.

PETTY INDIAN AFFAIRS.

UNDER this head the catalogue of petty quarrels between the aborigines and the whites within Montana and the immediate neighborhood of the Territory is given. To each of those hostile meetings the greater conflicts which have marked Montana's history since 1867 owe their origin. The aggressive character of the white invader opposed to the law of natural right, which the Indian observed in general, occasioned many broils, and from such petty troubles grew up that hatred between the savages and the whites, which had to be drowned in the best blood of the warriors of each race. It cannot be denied that very many crimes against justice were perpetrated by government officials in their dealings with the savages. Through this official perfidy the Indians were forced to believe that the government broke faith with them, and, like the vigilantes, who enforced justice with an iron hand before a government was given to them, these savages, unused to restraints, assumed the power of ruling over their country, and administered justice with remarkable moderation while they held this power. For years previous to 1858 the Indians opposed the settlement of a certain class of citizens among them, and the Indian troubles were introduced.

The Palouses, Nez Perees, Colvilles, Callispells, Spokanes, Cœur d'Alenes and others were defeated in 1858 by Colonel Wright's command, and a number of the warriors, who were thought to be engaged in murdering and robbing the whites, taken from the midst of the tribe and hanged in front of the camp. This salutory lesson is remembered.

Trapper Hubble ventured into the Yellowstone country in 1864. Charley Cocke and Friend Woody joined him within a short time, and in April, 1865, all were engaged in trapping beaver ten miles below the site of old Fort Smith on the Big Horn. Here they were attacked by two hundred Sioux Indians, and may be said to have battled successfully with the whole tribe.

The Mission Creek affair took place in May, 1865, when Campbell and his associate were killed by the Sioux and Ford wounded. The latter made a heroic defense, and when darkness called a truce he succeeded in escaping. He made his way to a point opposite Davies' Camp on the Yellowstone, where he was discovered. His deliverers took him to Fridley's house at Bozeman, where he was cared for until his recovery.

Colonel Smith was killed on the Yellowstone by Indians, June 9, 1865. It appears that about this time the Broad Guage Company gave W. J. Davies a contract to build three ferry-boats—one for the Yellowstone, one for Clarke's Fork, and one for the Big Horn. This Davies floated lumber from Tomlinson's mill near Emigrant to the mouth of the Mill Creek canon, where he built a house, and there also built the boats. Michael Boyer, Cartwright, Colonel Smith were members of the party, and here on Rocky creek Smith met his death, while Michael Boyer was wounded.

In August, 1865, while William Bunn and Colonel Kimball were en route to the Yellowstone from Bozeman, they were saluted by Indians just above O'Rear creek. It appears that about the same time the savages killed a man named Smith and attacked Harry Morgan, who was holding Davies' cabin. They approached Kimball in a friendly manner, and then shot him deliberately. Bunn ran for his life, but the terror of his meeting with the Indians caused his death at Bozeman within the year.

Cy Mounts, Joe Merrivale, Louis and John Renshaw, Little Baptiste and an Indian boy were going to the Yellowstone from Bozeman with ox teams. When near the top of the divide a party of forty Indians came in sight over the hill. Cy and his comrades drew their wagons to a fair place from which to fight and awaited the Indians, who took the hills on the other side. Joe Merrivale could speak the Sioux tongue, and asked them what they wanted. They answered "blood," and that none of his (Merrivale's) party should ever see the sun again. Cy Mounts knew that the Indians were making threats by the actions of the Cheyenne boy with him, who picked up a rock and ground his teeth. They also bragged to Merrivale of killing the two white men across the divide. They were told to "turn themselves loose," and the fight began. * * * A Crow Indian who had been chased in the morning and had heard their firing when they killed Kimball, rushed over the hills to Bozeman and informed the residents that the Sioux and the white men were fighting, and a party of eight mounted and hurried out. The united parties went back to Bozeman, and, organizing a force of seventy men, started after the Indians that night. The next day they were joined by about one hundred Crows; all but ten of these Indians deserted the party when they came in sight of the hostiles, which was done late in the afternoon, just as they were crossing the Yellowstone. Darkness stopped the pursuit.

In September, 1866, a party of thirty-eight men and two ladies proceeded down the Yellowstone to a point below the Big Horn, where a camp of Cheyennes and Arrapahoes was discovered. The savages exerted every means to get the party to land; but, owing to the judgment of Cy Mounts and others, the invitation was not accepted. Near the lower end of Pease Bottom the Indians fired on the boats and killed one of the oarsmen named Randall. Below the mouth of Powder river the boat containing the ladies was swamped. About this time Charles Rich's train, bound for Bozeman, was attacked by Red Cloud's party at the Dry Fork of Powder river.

On September 23, 1866, ten Indians dashed into a herd of cattle within a few hundred yards of Fort Phil. Kearney, established in August, 1866, and carried off 120 head. Captain Brown, with ten men, accompanied by fifteen men of the Standifer party, started out in pursuit. The Indians were overtaken, the cattle recaptured, and 300 Indians routed. On December 21, 1866, the massacre on the Bozeman road, ninety-five miles from Fort Smith, took place. A number of Indians approached the fort; Colonel Fetterman, with eighty-one men, offered them battle. The troops unfortunately pursued the red devils beyond the ridge, out of sight of the fort, where the battle was continued. Firing soon ceased, and the Colonel, with his aides, proceeded to the scene, when to their horror, they found the Indians scalping the troops. Eighty-one men—the entire command—were murdered and scalped by 3,000 Indians, bringing the list of white men murdered by the Indians up to 133 from August to December, 1866. Engaged in the massacre were Crows, Sioux, Arrapahoes, and Cheyennes. Those demons, when scalping the soldiers, placed powder in their ears and mouths and setting the fuse, blew up the bodies. About twelve months previous to this tragedy, Jeff. Standifer left Helena with a large party of white men—many of them old mountaineers—for the purpose of exploring and prospecting the Yellowstone and Big Horn country. After the main party split up, some thirty-five of the boys moved down the streams and loitered and prospected about under cover of the troops sent out to establish Fort Phil. Kearney. One by one those wanderers were picked off by the unerring arrow or rifle of the savage, and scalp dances indulged around their bodies, until to-day there is not a single one of the thirty-five left to recite the tale of their awful persecution and extermination. One of the last survivors was Robert Bailey, well known here and on the West Side, who was carrying the mail between Kearney and Laramie, when he was finally surrounded by bloodthirsty demons, just before the fatal raid on the post, and slain—not, however, without first killing, with his own weapons, fifteen of the savages, as was attested by his comrade, who crawled away wounded, but afterward died. Jeff. Standifer, with a party of seven men, again took the trail down Wind river, where four of the party were killed, and one was wounded by the Arrapahoes. There were five men in the next party that went down the Yellowstone in 1866. They were attacked by Arrapahoes just below the mouth of Clarke's Fork, while in camp. One of their number was killed and the others went into the brush and escaped; they having lost their boat and provisions, had to walk back. A little above the mouth of Clarke's Fork they saw another party coming down in a boat. This they stopped and told their story to, and after discussion all concluded to go back. In the latter party were two women and five children. The men could pack but few provisions, and having bad luck in killing game, they suffered from hunger as well as fatigue. One man came ahead to Bozeman and told the tale. Jack Mendenhall and Bill Heffner, with four others, started at once to their relief. The rescuers found the party at Little Timber. The women and children were worn entirely out and could have gone no further. The relief party had brought plenty of extra riding horses and provisions, and they all arrived at Bozeman safely and in fair spirits. The Indian known as Marshall Ogden assisted the Andrews party March 3, 1866, while camped at the forks of the Muscleshell against the Blackfeet. Nat. Crabfield was killed by Piegans on April 24, 1868, within three miles of Camp Cook. Le Roy Wyatt, who came to Montana in 1865, was killed by Indians within ten miles of Fort Ellis in April, 1868. On April 24 the remains of an unknown white man, who was drawing coal from the Yellowstone, were found in rear of Bozeman, above Aub's mill, and on the 26th of April the body of Cahill was found within three miles of the fort.

On April 17, 1867, Colonel Bozeman and Thomas Cover started from Bozeman en route to Fort Phil. Kearney, and when forty miles out were slaughtered by Blackfeet Sioux. Public meetings were held, Governor Meagher issued a call for volunteers, and on Monday morning April 29, a number of militia were under arms, ready to meet the 11,000 Sioux said to be between Helena and Fort Phil. Kearney. Mountain Chief, his two sons and two nephews, renegades from the Blackfeet, were the murderers of Colonel Bozeman. This small band camped with Bear Tooth's tribe of Crows after the murder. (Vide Gen. Hist.)

While the steamer Silver Lake was lying to at Painted Woods, in August, 1867, forty miles above Fort Rice, a number of Indians fired into her, sending a bullet through the body of the captain's son. In the latter part of September, 1867, a man named Maltby, with two companions, left the canon in a boat and went down the river. Nothing more was heard of them till 1870, when by a Brule Sioux interpreter, came the report that that tribe had, in 1867, near the mouth of the river, captured three men who were going down in a boat, and burnt them at the stake.

Captain Hart and a company of Montana militia, engaged in the affairs of 1867, were in pursuit of a body of Sioux. When about five miles from the Boulder they heard irregular firing ahead of them, and dashing on, soon came in sight of a party of forty Indians who had three men, deserters from Fort C. F. Smith, corralled. When the Sioux saw the approaching whites they fled; the militia chased them for three miles, but finding they could not be overtaken ceased the pursuit, and going back to the scene of the fight camped. Two of the deserters died shortly after.

On June 13, 1868, the Fort Smith Crows made a dash at Hugh Kirkendall's herd of mules grazing near Fort Ellis, and carried off thirty-four of them. The savages were pursued by Major Horr and the mules recovered. The Indians lost three of their number. On June 2, Abraham Coon was killed on the Fort Totten and Stevenson road, by the Indians. W. S. Hamilton, John Fatig, and B. B. Davis, while traveling down the Yellowstone in August 1868, were attacked by the Sioux; Hamilton was wounded, while five Indians were killed and many wounded. In August, 1868, the Red Cloud Sioux robbed McKenzie and Renshaw's train. On the night of the robbery members of the band attempted to steal some Crow horses, when five of the number were killed. The engagement between Colonel Forsyth's company and Red Cloud's company of sixty men occurred at Dry Forks October 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21, 1868. The command lost five killed and sixteen wounded. The loss of the Indians was large, including a Cheyenne and Sioux chief, and the great medicine man of the Sioux. Early in the spring of 1868, a freighter named Hart was camped near Fort Ellis. One morning he went out to get his stock, which were running loose, and when about half a mile from the post he was shot dead by a war party of Indians who were hidden in a patch of cherry brush, near which he passed. In the fall of 1863 twelve herders had charge of McAdow's work cattle on Shield's river. Early in March, 1869, a man named Crowell was killed by the Blackfeet at this ranch, the herders having barely time to escape. A party of soldiers under Lieutenant Thompson, pursued the marauders killing about the whole band and losing one soldier. Crandall and Finley mined in Crevice gulch the summers of 1867–68 and '69. In the fall of the latter year they concluded to prospect for new diggings; so they went up Slough creek to the divide and over to Clarke's Fork, and down it to the first large creek that comes into that river from the right. A party that went down Clarke's Fork about a week afterward, found their dead bodies lying near camp and buried them. The signs left indicated, what was afterward proven, that this murderous deed was committed by Arrapahoes. During the fall of 1871 James Gurley and Bill Cameron found their bones exposed and buried them deeper, also making the grave. The stream on which they made their last camp has been known ever since as Crandall creek. Dr. Frost had a ranch above the lower canon and lived there with his Indian wife. One day in September, 1871, he, with his squaw and child, went down to the agency to draw rations and get a needle gun. When going back and but a mile and a half from the agency he was attacked by a Sioux war party and he, his wife and child, and a squaw who was going up on a visit, were killed. John Brown was camped near the divide between the Yellowstone and Boulder and just below the Indian trail that ran from the agency to the Natural bridge on the Boulder. He was engaged in hunting for the agency. In the latter part of February 1871 he was attacked by Indians and after a sharp fight was killed by them. When his squaw heard the firing she left camp and went direct to the agency. Some of the people in the country thought that the Crows were the Indians that killed him, but the fact of his having one of their squaws for a wife, and had lived with her tribe for a long time, is sufficient to disprove the charge.

Early in the spring of 1872 two Banocks Indians stole a small band of horses from some Crows, who were camped near the agency. The Banocks were friendly with the whites and took their horses through the settlements on their way to Idaho. The Crow agent empowered Gus Callahan and Scotty Donnelly to go after and arrest them. The Banocks were overtaken and captured near Virginia City. As the boys were bringing them back, Callahan wished to kill both, to which Donnelly would not agree. When near the Madison river crossing Callahan gave one of the captives a chance to run, and shot and killed him as he was leaving. Soon afterward they allowed the other to escape and brought the horses to the agency. Banks, an old trapper, about two months after the killing of the Banocks, was following his vocation on Mission creek and was camped about five miles from the Yellowstone, one day while lighting his after dinner pipe, six Bannacks came into camp and sitting down commenced smoking with him. As he was taking the pipe from one, another sitting on the other side shot him in the back of the head, killing him instantly.

In June, 1872, the Northern Pacific surveyors, with Colonel Baker and three companies of troops from Fort Ellis, went down the Yellowstone, and taking up the survey where it had been left the previous year, went on down. They saw no Indians till they were about twenty miles below the mouth of Pryor's creek, where on a large bottom (now known as Baker's battle ground) they saw a few Indians in the hills. The camp was made near a heavily wooded slough, and among large cottonwoods; there were thirteen civilians along, who were camped about 150 yards from the main party; at about three the next morning the civilians were awakened by the tread of horses; they quickly and silently jumped up and seized their guns and cartridge belts. A party of Indians, unaware of their proximity to the whites, rode right into the camp, and as they came near, the civilians gave them a volley, which killed two Indians, one of them dropping from his horse, into one of the just vacated beds. Two men, a sergeant and a civilian, were killed, and another soldier wounded.

August 14, 1872, the Sioux and Arrapahoe Indians attacked the companies of the seventh Infantry under Captains Rawn and Browning, and Lieutenants Reed and Quinlon. Sergeant McClellan of Company C, was killed, while the Indians lost ten killed. Another report of the same date says: 450 warriors of the Sioux, Arrapahoes and Cheyennes attacked the Hayden and Union Pacific Railroad survey parties, 150 miles east of Bozeman, on the Yellowstone. One of Lieutenant Logan's command was killed and three wounded. Charlie Hoffman was post trader at the Crow agency, and was well liked by the Indians, yet was once put in a precarious position by them, without fault of his own. In the summer of this year (1872) an under chief of the Crows named Little Iron, killed for some private spite a Flathead who was visiting at the camp. Some Crow friends of the Flathead threatened to kill two Banocks who were friends of Little Iron. The latter and his clique swore if the Banocks were shot, to kill the trader, who, to save himself and settle the difficulty, had to talk nice and give presents right and left, and at last induced them to smoke a peace pipe together.

In October, 1873, Charley Norris, an old prospector, and Jose, a Mexican, were in the employ of Frost, then just appointed Crow agent; they went from the agency to Benson's and stayed there two days; on the morning of the third day they started back. They had left their rifles at the agency, and with the exception of a pistol carried by Jose, were entirely unarmed. When within one half mile of the agency buildings, a party of fifteen Sioux darted from a coulie and gave chase to them; they put their horses at full speed, and would have escaped from this party but were headed off by a squad of ten others, who killed and scalped them within six hundred yards of the stockade.

Early in the spring of 1873, Joseph Lee and George Ackerly, had put their traps, blankets and cooking outfit in a boat and trapped down the Yellowstone to Pompey's Pillar; here they cached their furs and then walked back to Benson's, and getting horses went down and packed their things up the river, getting back all right, though they saw a war party of Sioux, and had traveled all of one night to get away from them. In the fall they outfitted at the Crow agency and went down the country toward the Big Horn for the winter's wolfing. They were never seen again alive.

In July 1874, Hardy O'Dare, one of the herders for Dunphy Bros. at Shield's river was killed by the Sioux. On February 9, 1874, Lieutenant Robinson, of the fourteenth Infantry, Corporal Coleman Company K., second cavalry, were surrounded by forty Indians near the saw mill, ten miles from Fort Laramie, and there murdered. Louis Gagnon was killed by Indians on Warm Spring creek, February 5, 1874. Frank A. Terreault was killed by the Sioux at Cone Butte, in March, 1874. Terreault was better known as the little deaf Frenchman. John Rock was murdered at the mouth of Sun river by a band of ten Indians, supposed to be Piegans, March 29, 1874, while his brother, James Rock, escaped.

James Hildebrand was killed by Indians about sixteen miles south of late Crow agency 27th of July, 1875. His was the first interment at the agency. James Hughes was killed by Indians July 5 or 6, 1875, at Quinn's ranch. On the 22d of September, 1875, Jack Allan, James Nolan and Will Campbell were killed by the Kootenai Indians twenty miles from Scribner. Early in 1875, soon after Countryman's store was opened, Hugh Hoppy, who operated the hotel at Benson's landing, sent his men down to build a house suitable for his business. They met a small white man and a most eccentric one, who they would not allow to proceed, but sent him to the agency. He stayed one week there when he disappeared. The Crows found this crazy man dead at the mouth of Clarke's Fork two month's later. In July 1875, a squad of men with ox-teams moved to a camp about eighteen miles down the Stillwater, to get out logs for the agency. About two weeks after their arrival here, a party of Indians came on to Mexican Joe, who was herding the cattle about a mile from the camp, and killed him. The firing was plainly heard by White Calfee, who was in camp but he being alone, could do nothing but saddle his horse and save himself by going to the agency. The body of the herder was found the next day lying in the creek, thrown there it is supposed by the Indians. About the first of October, 1875, a German named Fred Harlan went out, against advice, alone to a bait. Just after he disappeared in the hills back of the fort, a volley was heard in that direction and a party of about eight men went right out there and found Harlan's body lying just at the head of a little coulie. The signs indicated that he had no chance to fight but was killed by the first volley, which was fired from close quarters. At Fort Pease a large number of wolf skins were being brought in daily and it bid fair to be a prosperous season for the trappers, till near the middle of December, 1875, when the Uncapapa Indians again came and in strong force. The first sign of their presence was shown on the 16th of December, 1875, when they attacked Topping & Co., on the Big Horn and fought them for seven hours. On the morning of the 15th of December, 1875, Orin Mason, Jeff Thompson and Billy Castro, left Baker's battle ground, for the Big Horn river, to take a part in the winter's wolfing. They had their riding and five pack horses loaded with provisions, ammunition, etc. Their intention was to go to Topping's camp, but not knowing its exact location, they went too high up and came in sight of this river about ten miles above its mouth. As they came to the edge of its bottom, about a hundred Indians came dashing from coulies on each side and in front. They saw at once that all they had to hope for was to save themselves, so they left their horses and ran to a little washout near by and from it fired at every Indian that showed his head. About fifteen minutes after the fight commenced, Orin Mason, while raising his head to take aim at an Indian was hit in the forehead by a bullet and instantly killed.

On January 2, 1876, Hubble, Charley Cocke, Johnny Dolan, E. S. Topping and four others, went down the Yellowstone from Fort Pease, to look at some wolf bait and to put out others. Two hours after their departure, Pat Sweeney, Neil Gillis, Jim Dewings, By Nutton and Muggins Taylor, saddled each a riding horse, and went up the coulie, on which Edwards had been killed, to the table-lands. Here they found a band of buffalo, and killing some fat cows, packed each of the horses with choice meat and started back to the stockade, each leading a horse. They found at the head of the coulie which they had come up, the fresh signs of horses going at full speed. The Indians attacked soon after. Giles, Nutton, Dewing, Taylor and Sweeney were wounded. The Sioux lost thirteen in dead and wounded. Sweeney died eighteen days later, January 20, 1876. A band of Minneconjous and Cheyennes led by Lone Elk, on May 3, 1876, attacked Black Hill miners, forty miles south of Fort Alexander, and killed Jno. Martin and C. T. Williams, the latter of whom was at one time a miner in Confederate gulch. A party of three men had been killed on Rose creek previously. At Rose creek, twenty miles west of Phillipsburgh, Wm. Jory, Amos Elliott and Jack Hayes were killed by Indians in 1878. John Wauham and Gus Cottle, two cattle men, were butchered in August, 1878, near the south fork of Sun river.

From the Montana Historical Directory of 1879, the following list of assaults by the Indians is taken. In almost every case an Indian warrior paid a life forfeit; but it is impossible to obtain the names or number of the savages who fell in those assaults: William Berry, killed by Bloods, on Elbow river, in 1874; Joe Munroe, killed by Bloods, on Old Man's river, in 1874; Miller, killed by Bloods, on Old Man's river, in 1872; McMullen, wounded by Assiniboines, near Cow river, in 187-; two unknown men, killed by Assiniboines, near Milk river, in 1874—the bodies were found tied to trees and filled with bullet holes; Ed. Grace, killed by Assiniboines, in 1873; a party of men, women and children, killed by Bloods, near Porcupine mountains, in 1865; a soldier, name unknown, killed by Piegans, on Marias hill, 1873; Wei and Mitchell, killed by Piegans, on Badger creek, in 1875; Joe Day and Howard, killed by Piegens, near the Marias river, 1875; John Rock, killed by Blackfeet, mouth of Sun river, 1875; one man, name unknown, found dead near the Marias, in 1875; Jack Gorman and Frank Keissee, killed by Assiniboines, in 1875; Frank Robinson, killed by Gros Ventres, near Cow creek, in 1877; Joseph Spearson, killed by Bloods, on Belly river, in 1870; Nelson Kyse, George Huber, and one man, name unknown, killed by Sioux, on Squaw creek, near the mouth of Muscleshell river, August, 1866; Andy Harris, killed by Assiniboines, on Milk river, in 1867; one soldier, killed by Piegans, at Camp Cook, in the spring of 1867; Bozell A. Bair, wounded by Piegans, on Eagle creek, in 1867; Paul Vermet, killed by Indians on, the Teton river, in 1866, Champion, killed by Arraphoes, at Fort Hawley, in 1867; Malcom Clark, killed by Piegans, in 1869; Charles Carson, killed by Piegans, on Dearborn river, in 1866; Jennie Smith, scalped alive by Sioux, at mouth of Muscleshell river, in 1869—the unfortunate woman recovered and is still alive; Jake Leader, killed by Sioux, at the mouth of Muscleshell river, in 1869; McGregor, Taber and two other men, names unknown, were killed, and one man wounded by Sioux, near Fort Peck, in 1868; Ross and McKnight, killed by Sioux, at mouth of Muscleshell river, in 1871; Nat Crabtree, killed by Piegans, near Camp Cook, in 1868; old man Lee, killed, and Charley Willams and Drew Denton, wounded by Sioux, near Carroll, in 1870; McArdle and comrade, killed by Crows, near Benton, 1869; Tom Ross, killed by Sioux, near Fort Peck, in 1873; Michael Thebo, killed by Piegans, on the Teton, in 1868; James Quail, killed by Piegans, near Silver creek, in 1869; one man, name unknown, killed by Piegans, on Sun river, 1868; Clark, killed by Piegans, on Sun river, in 1868; Dauphant, killed by Sioux, near the mouth of Milk river, in 1865; Charley Desronin, killed by Indians, near the Bear Paw, in 1870; Little Frenchie, killed by Assiniboines, on Milk river, in 1869; one man, herder for Carroll and Steele, name unknown, killed by Indians, on Milk river, in 1869; Sam Rax, killed by Bloods, on Eagle creek, in 1869; Jim Matkins, wounded by Piegans, near Benton, in 1868; old man Long, Foster and Jurden, killed by Sioux, near mouth of Pouchette; seven unknown travelers, killed by Sioux, on the Missouri river, above Fort Peck, in 1868—see history; two men names unknown, killed by Sioux, at mouth of Muscleshell, in 1868; four men, names unknown, killed by Sioux, at mouth of Muscleshell, in 1873; George Horn, killed by Assiniboines, on Cow creek, in 1874; Bill Morrison and John Hughes, killed by River Crows on Arrow creek, in 1877; Antelope Charley and Cook, killed by Piegans mouth of Eagle creek, in 1873; Little Rock, killed by Sioux, on Judith mountain, in 1874; one man, name unknown, killed by Piegans, on Warm Spring creek, near the Judith river, in 1874; Buckshot and Poulett, killed by Assiniboines, at Rocky Spring, in 1871. The following named citizens were killed by Nez Perces, in the months of September and October, 1877: Edward Bradley, Charley Steele, James Downey, Charley Buck, J. J. Barker, and one colored man, name unknown. (See also history.) John Lynch and John Myers, found murdered in their cabin near Beartown; killed by a band of Nez Perces Indians, returning from British possessions to Idaho, July 8, 1878. Amos Elliott, William Elliott and Jack Hayes, killed on Rock creek, near Phillipsburgh, by same band, on July 12, 1878.

In March, 1884, Swansy Tollifero, a cowboy, fired at an Indian of the Cheyenne tribe. Some time afterwards the savages sought the cowboy; but, being unable to find him, burned his employer's (M. J. Anderson) house. In May, 1884, the Indians concerned were brought to trial at Miles City, when a dramatic scene took place: "Black Wolf heard the verdict of acquittal in silence, and, turning to his brother, Howling Wolf, talked with him a few minutes. Then came the scene of the day. The trial of the other nine Indians was called, and four of them arose in court and said that they were the guilty ones, and would so plead, rather than their innocent friends should suffer with them. Howling Wolf said: 'I am a man and not a boy. I was one of those that burned the house, and I confess it, that my brothers that did not play with the fire must not suffer.'" The Indians were tried at Miles City, found guilty, and four of them sentenced to imprisonment. One died in prison, while the remaining three Cheyennes were pardoned in May, 1885.

In reviewing this chapter on Indian wars—the end of barbarism in the Northwest—one cannot fail to notice the peculiar similarity which the incidents related bear to a buffalo hunt. The Indians, as a general rule, desired to escape coming in contact with the troops or volunteer soldiers of the white race; but when brought to bay gave battle, and, like the buffalo, fell before superior animals. Now that the senses of the savages are reduced to a condition in which they can see their helplessness plainly, it becomes them to make a strong effort toward assuming the labors and privileges of the white people. To achieve this they must cast aside all thoughts of their old hunting and fighting days, throw down the spear and rifle, and with the plow and spade dig out for themselves, from their rich lands, the wealth and independence which such lands offer to the industrious agriculturist. To accomplish this they should claim the co-operation of all honorable white men who are capable of distinguishing between injustice and justice.

CHAPTER V.

TRADING AND MILITARY POSTS.

IN the transactions of the Hudson Bay Company, 1810–23, the names of Finan McDonald, Warren Dease, P. S. Ogden, Alexander Ross, James McMillan, George Simpson, John Grey, McKenzie, of Mayville, Howes, Leith, Anderson, Joseph Felix La Rocque, Olivier La Pensée, Chief Factor Rowan, formerly of the Northwest Fur Co., and Andrew McDermott, are given in connection with the fur trade in Montana, Idaho and the Saskatchewan country. In 1823 trader Anderson was killed by Piegans in the battle of Hell's Gate, near the site of Missoula (Fur Hunters—Ross). Shortly after this J. B. Ducharme, the senior old resident of Montana, with a small party came to the Territory, in which he has made his home ever since (vide Biography).

In 1847, the Hudson's Bay Company established a trading post on Crow creek, on the northern portion of the present Flathead reservation, and the place is still known as the Hudson's Bay Post. Angus McDonald, who came to the mountains as early as 1838 or '39, and who is now a resident of this county, was probably the first officer placed in charge of the new post, if we except the traders of 1823–26.

In 1849, Major John Owen started from St. Joe, Missouri, as sutler for a regiment of United States troops known as the Mounted Rifles, destined for Oregon. The troops came as far as Snake river, when winter caught them, and they built winter quarters on the bank of that river about six miles above Fort Hall, where they spent the winter. The camp was called Cantonment Loring and the place was long known by that name. Major Owen remained at Cantonment Loring until the troops resumed their march in the spring of 1850, when he relinquished his sutlership, and spent the summer on the emigrant road, trading with the emigrants bound for California and Oregon. In the fall of 1850 he came to the Bitter Root valley, and having bought the improvements of the Catholic Fathers, erected a trading post at that point and christened it Fort Owen, a name which it still continues to bear. The fort was constructed of a stockade of logs placed in an upright position with one end planted in the ground. This stockade was necessary to protect the inmates and their property from the incursions of the numerous war parties of the Blackfeet Indians, that continued to make raids into the valley up to 1855. It was the custom to drive the horses inside of the stockade each night during the spring, summer and fall of each year, to prevent them from being stolen by the Blackfeet; and even this precaution did not always save them. One night a party of Blackfeet came to the Fort, and with knives and sticks dug up some of the logs forming the stockade, and drove away all of the horses belonging to the fort. In the fall of 1852, while hauling hay, a young man named John F. Dodson, from Buffalo Grove, Illinois, was killed and scalped by the Blackfeet, in sight of the fort. The writer of this has in his possession a diary kept by Dodson from the day that he left Illinois in the spring of 1852, up to the day he was killed. The last entry that he made in it was on the day before he was killed, and is as follows: "Sept. 14th, 1852. I have been fixing ox yokes and hay rigging. Helped haul one load of hay. Weather fair." The next entry is in the handwriting of Major Owen, apparently made the next day, and in these words: "Sept. 15th. The poor fellow was killed and scalped by the Blackfeet in sight of the Fort." (Woody Reminiscences.)

The bold voyageurs of those aggressive companies, and preceding companies of less note, had found their way to the west end of Lake Superior, and thence threaded the intricate communication which leads, by lakes and streams and portages, to Lake Winnipeg, and thence up the Saskatchewan, and had penetrated even to Lake Athabaska and to Great Slave lake and to the Pacific. They had planted one hundred trading posts. With military precision they had divided their vast territory into departments, and over each department placed a factor or superintendent. The company's last post in United States territory was that of Fort Hall, in Idaho, disestablished in 1854. This post was built by Nathaniel Wythe, of Massachusetts, in 1836 in opposition to the American Fur Company, and sold subsequently to the Hudson's Bay Company.

The Missouri Fur Company.—In 1808 the Missouri Fur Company was founded by Pierre Choteau, Emanuel Lisa, William Clarke, Sylvester Labadie, Pierre Mesnard, and Auguste Choteau, with a capital of $40,000. Major A. Henry commanded the first expedition sent out under the direction of the company, and to him, as well as to the enterprise of the principal traders themselves, is the success due which waited on their trading establishments in the Rocky mountain region.

The trade of the Yellowstone, previous to 1822, was controlled by Emanuel Lisa from his post below the Big Horn, to which reference is made in the history of exploration.

Emanuel Lisa, after whom the fort below Council Bluffs was named, as well as the old trading-post on the Yellowstone about the year 1806, was one of the most energetic and business-like men connected with the Missouri fur trade. He it was who entertained Major Long's party, September 17, 1819, and on the same day he saw the steamboat Western Engineer at anchor five miles below Council Bluffs, near Fort Lisa. He was a wealthy Spaniard, and, with the means at his command, was the initiator of the upper river fur trade. Reaching Belleview in Nebraska in 1805, and pushing on toward the Yellowstone the same year, he established posts, in one of which the refugee Colter found food and shelter after his race for life.

Benjamin O'Fallon was one of the principals in the Missouri Fur Company, and also United States agent for Indian affairs. To him is due the negotiation of many of the treaties with the western tribes, as well as the comparative friendliness with the fur company of which he was a member.

The Rocky Mountain Fur Company.—In the spring of 1822 William H. Ashley, president of the Rocky Mountain Fur Company of St. Louis, equipped two boats to ascend the Missouri and Yellowstone rivers and left St. Louis. The expedition started early in the spring, but before the end of June he lost more than one-fourth of his employes by violent deaths and more than one-half of his property by accident, deceit, and war with the Indians. Colonel Ashley, assisted by Mr. Henry, erected Fort Van Buren, two miles below the mouth of the Big Horn, and continued to trade for about fourteen months in face of great opposition from the Missouri and American companies. Under him Ducharme served on Green river prior to beginning trapping for himself in Montana in 1824.

Baptiste Ducharme, son of Francois Ducharme, of L'Honorie, near Montreal, Canada, was born there March 15, 1781. In the year 1800 he left Canada and settled where St. Louis, Missouri, now stands, trading and trapping until 1820, when he returned to Canada. In 1822 he returned to St. Louis and engaged with Ashley to trade with the Green River Indians for eleven months. There he, with thirteen other trappers, was left by Ashley & Co. Mr. Ducharme and part of his party worked their way up Green river and crossed the Wind River mountains, on to the headwaters of Wind river, thence to the headwaters of the Madison, Gallatin and Yellowstone rivers. They found the streams well supplied with beavers, which they caught and sold to traders belonging to the Hudson's Bay and American Fur Companies. He would follow down the Madison to the Missouri, then up the Gallatin, thence down the Yellowstone, then crossing the Judith country to Fort Benton; then to the Hell's Gate river, following it up until he could cross to the Jefferson; thence to the head of Snake river. Such was the country he traveled over and trapped in for eighteen years, living the life of an Indian, and subsisting upon wild meat and the natural productions of nature, and no other associates but the Banocks, Snakes, Shoshones and Crows, the Blackfeet being the only tribe having any hostile feelings toward the whites. In 1840 he followed the Snake river down to the Columbia, then down the Columbia to Fort Vancouver, thence up the Willamette valley to Corvallis, near which place he located a farm upon which he lived for seventeen years. In 1857 he returned to what is now Montana, bringing with him his horses, cattle and farming implements, with the intention of opening a farm and raising cattle. He stopped on the Hell's Gate river, and located a farm, where Frenchtown is now located. In 1859 Mr. Ducharme, in company with Mose Reeves and Louis Brown, whip-sawed lumber and built a flouring mill on Mill creek, one and a half miles from Frenchtown. He now lives in a comfortable home near Frenchtown, and all his earthly wants are supplied by the beneficent hands of F. J. Demers.

Jim Bridger, born in Illinois, 1805; went on the plains with General Ashley in 1823, subsequently entered the employ of the Rocky Mountain Fur Company, and on the consolidation of the Rocky Mountain Fur Company and the American Fur Company in 1834, was continued as bourgeoise or trader, which position he held until 1839, when the consolidated company disbanded. In 1839 he, with Frappe and Vasquez, went into the trapping trade, and in 1841 established a post near what is now known as Fort Bridger, where Frappe was killed by Indians. In 1842, Bridger and Vasquez erected their post on the site of Fort Bridger. In 1853 he fled from the Mormons, and in two years later returned, when he sold his outfit to the Mormons. In 1857 he was General Johnson's guide in his expedition against the Mormons. In 1864 he acted as guide for the troops in the Powder River country, and in 1866 was the guide of Colonel Carrington's command. Jim Bridger's stories are all exaggerations; even distances he would magnify; yet he was a true guide, and to his natural tact and knowledge of Indians and their country much of the success of expeditions to the mountain region is due.

Dr. Pilcher, a noted fur trader of the Missouri Fur Company was, in 1822, at the head of one branch of the trade, and to him is credited many of the assaults made by the Indians upon Ashley's party. Again, shortly after the building of Fort Van Buren, Astor sent up a batteaux and had a post established thirty miles below the Big Horn, which he named Fort Cass, in honor of Louis Cass, of Michigan.

Peter Sarpy.—In 1824, Colonel Peter Sarpy, after whom old Fort Sarpy on the Yellowstone was named (if not established by him), was appointed agent of the American Fur Company, at Belleview; this position he held for thirty years.

Captain Bonneville, writing to the Montana Historical Society, in 1875, says: "You ask me if I know of the thermal springs and geysers. Not personally, but my men knew about them, and called their location the 'Fire Hole.' I recollect the name of Alvarez as a trader. I think he came to the mountains as I was leaving them. The American Fur Company had a trading post at the mouth of the Yellowstone, also one higher up. Mr. Tullock, I think, was in charge of that up the Yellowstone."

In July, 1829, Fort Union was built by Kenneth McKenzie, and trade was revived. In 1831 this fort was burned and rebuilt.

In 1844, Kipp & Co. settled at the mouth of the Marias river, and in 1845 moved down the Missouri and erected Fort Chadron, opposite the mouth of the Judith river.

In 1846, Major Culbertson erected Fort Benton by order of Pierre Choteau, Jr., & Co., then managing the American Fur Company. With him were Cercure and Lorain, carpenters, and Roundeau, butcher. Opposite was Fort Clay, built early the same year by Kipp & Co. Other posts were built previous to 1862, all of which are referred to in the history of Trading Posts and United States' Forts.

Pierre Choteau, Jr., & Co. sold their interests in the American Fur Company, in 1864, to a company named the Northwest Fur Company. In 1865 this passed out of the catalogue of Northwestern firms, and that of Durfee & Peck took up its place among the traders as the Northwestern Fur Company. This company continued business at Fort Buford until 1871, when they sold their interests to Leighton & Jordan. The very conservative dealings of Durfee & Peck with the venal administration of the War Office under Belknap are referred to in the sketch of Fort Buford.

Andrew Dawson, after whom Dawson county was named, came to St. Louis from Edinburg, Scotland, at an early date, where he obtained a position as clerk in the employ of the American Fur Company. In this position he labored at Fort Pierre and again above Bismarck at Old Fort Clark. Subsequently he superseded Major Culbertson at Fort Benton and ultimately became owner of that post. Afterward he became a member of the American Fur Company when it passed into the management of Pierre Choteau, Jr., & Co., including Major Culbertson, James Kipp, Peacott, McKenzie and Andrew Dawson, and continued a member until 1864, when this company's business passed into the hands of the Northwest Company. Quoting from the Glendive Times, June 15, 1882: "Dawson was a hard drinker and was a helpless invalid for years previous to his death, which in a manner accounts for his extreme filth. He returned to Scotland where he died, detested by himself and everyone surrounding him."

Fort Hanley was erected about 1867 for the Northwestern Fur Company. Its location thirty miles by water above the confluence of the Muscleshell and Missouri is pleasant.

Power's, Baker's, Stewart, and a number of other posts for trade were erected throughout the territory, notices of which appear in the history of the counties.

Fort Pease, on the Yellowstone, erected by Major Pease, Fort Sarpy, Fort Tullock, Countryman's, and other trading posts on the Yellowstone may be called temporary settlements.

Reminiscences of Old Trading Posts.—Under the title Adventure on the Upper Missouri, the late James Stuart wrote a most valuable paper on the old trading posts, which was published in the Historical Society's volume for 1876. The society is inclined to consider it the most authentic sketch of the fur traders, as Mr. Stuart obtained his information from the best authorities.

Fort Union was the first fort built on the Missouri river, above the mouth of the Yellowstone. In the summer of 1829, Kenneth McKenzie, a trader from the Upper Mississippi, near where St. Paul, Minnesota, is now located, with a party of fifty men, came across to the Upper Missouri river looking for a good place to establish a trading-post for the American Fur Company. (McKenzie was a member of said company.) They selected a site a short distance above the mouth of the Yellowstone river, on the north bank of the Missouri, and built a stockade, two hundred feet square, of logs about twelve inches in diameter and twelve feet long, set perpendicularly, putting the lower end two feet in the ground, with two block-house bastions on diagonal corners of the stockade, twelve feet square, and twenty high, pierced with loop-holes. The dwelling-houses, warehouses and store were built inside, but not joining the stockade, leaving a space of about four feet between the walls of the buildings and the stockade. All the buildings were covered with earth, as a protection against fire by incendiary Indians. There was only one entrance to the stockade—a large double-leaved gate, about twelve feet from post to post; with a small gate, three and a half by five feet, in one of the leaves of the main gate, which was the one mostly used, the large gate being only opened occasionally when there were no Indians in the vicinity of the fort. The houses, warehouses and store were all built about the same height as the stockade. The above description, with the exception of the area inclosed by the stockade, will describe nearly all the forts built by traders on the Missouri river from St. Louis to the headwaters. The fort was built to trade with the Assiniboines, who were a large tribe of Indians ranging from White Earth river, on the north side of the Missouri, to the mouth of Milk river, and north into British possessions. The principal articles of trade were alcohol, blankets, blue and scarlet cloth, sheeting (domestics), ticking, tobacco, knives, fire-steels, arrow-points, flies, brass wire (different sizes), beads, brass tacks, leather belts (from four to ten inches wide), silver ornaments for hair, shells, axes, hatchets, etc.—alcohol being the principal article of trade, until after the passing of an act of Congress (June 30, 1834) prohibiting it under severe penalties. Prior to that time, there were no restrictions on the traffic. But notwithstanding the traders were often made to suffer the penalty of the law, they continued to smuggle large quantities of spirits into the Indian country, until within the last few years (i. e. 1873). * * *

A. Woolman

HELENA.

After the fort was established, and proved to be a permanent trading point, large quantities of potatoes, beets, onions, turnips, squashes, corn, etc., were raised, sufficient for each year's consumption. The wages for common laborers were $220 for the round trip from St. Louis to Ft. Union, and back again to St. Louis, taking from fifteen to sixteen months' time to make it. Carpenters and blacksmiths were paid $300 per annum. The traders (being their own interpreters) were paid $500 per annum. The store and warehouse, or two stores were built on each side of the gate, and on the side next to the interior of the fort the two buildings were connected by a gate similar to the main gate, the space between the buildings and stockade filled in with pickets, making a large, strong room, without any roof or covering overhead. In each store, or stores, about five feet from the ground, was a hole eighteen inches square, with a strong shutter fastening inside of the store, opening into the space or room between the gates. When the Indians wanted to trade, the inner gate was closed; a man would stand at the outer gate until all the Indians that wanted to trade, or as many as the space between the gate would contain, had passed in; then he would lock the outer gate, and go through the trading hole into the store. The Indians would then pass whatever articles each one had to trade through the hole to the trader, and he would throw out of the hole whatever the Indian wanted, to the value in trade of the article received. When the party were done trading, they were turned out and another party admitted. In that way of trading, the Indians were entirely at the mercy of the traders, for they were penned up in a room, and could all be killed through loop-holes in the store without any danger to the traders. The articles brought by the Indians for trade were buffalo-robes, elk, deer, antelope, bear, wolf, beaver, otter, fox, mink, martin, wild-cat, skunk, and badger skins. The country was literally covered with buffalo, and the Indians killed them by making "surrounds." The Indians moved and camped with from 100 to 400 lodges together—averaging about seven souls to the lodge; and when they needed meat, the chief gave orders to make a "surround," when the whole camp, men, women, and the largest of the children, on foot and on horseback would go under the direction of the soldiers, and form a circle around as many buffalo as they wanted to kill—from 300 to 1,000 buffalo. They would then all start slowly for a common point, and as soon as the circle commenced to grow smaller, the slaughter would begin, and in a short time all inside the circle would be killed. The buffalo do not, as a general rule, undertake to break through unless the circle is very small, but run round and round the circumference next to the Indians until they are all killed. Ft. Union burned down in 1831, and was rebuilt by McKenzie in the same year. The new fort was 250 feet square, with stone foundation, with similar buildings, but put up in a more workmanlike manner, inside of the stockade. The fort stood until 1868, when it was pulled down by order of the commanding officer at Ft. Buford (five miles below Union). Robert Campbell and Sublette built a trading-post where Ft. Buford now stands, in 1833. They also, the same year, built a trading-post at Frenchman's Point, sixty miles above Union, the next year (1834). They sold out to the American Fur Company, who destroyed both posts the same year. Campbell went to St. Louis and went into business on Main street. Sublette went to the Green river country in command of a party of trappers. In 1832, the first steamboat, named the "Yellowstone," arrived at Ft. Union. From that time, every spring, the goods were brought up by steamboats, but the robes, peltries, etc., were shipped from the fort every spring by Mackinaws to St. Louis. In the winter of 1830, McKenzie, desirous of establishing a trade with the Blackfeet and Gros Ventres (the Minatarees of Lewis and Clarke), sent a party of four men—Burger, Dacoteau, Morceau, and one other man in search of the Indians, and to see if there was sufficient inducements to establish a trading-post. The party started up the Missouri river with dog-sleds, to haul a few presents for the Indians—bedding, ammunition, moccasins, etc. They followed the Missouri to the mouth of the Marias river, thence up the Marias to the mouth of Badger creek, without seeing an Indian, finding plenty of game of all kinds, and plenty of beaver in all the streams running into the Missouri. Every night when they camped they hoisted the American flag, so that if they were seen by any Indians during the night they would know it was a white man's camp; and it was very fortunate for them that they had a flag to use in that manner, for the night they camped at the mouth of Badger creek they were discovered by a war-party of Blackfeet, who surrounded them during the night, and as they were about firing on the camp, they saw the flag and did not fire, but took the party prisoners. A part of the Indians wanted to kill the whites and take what they had, but through the exertions and influence of a chief named "Good-woman," they were not molested in person or property, but went in safety to the Blackfoot camp on Belly river, and stayed with the camp until spring. During the winter they explained their business, and prevailed upon about one hundred Blackfeet to go with them to Union to see McKenzie. They arrived at Union about the first of April, 1831, and McKenzie got their consent to build a trading-post at the mouth of the Marias. The Indians stayed about one month, then started home to tell the news to their people. McKinzie then started James Kipp, with seventy-five men and an outfit of Indian goods, to build a fort at the mouth of the Marias river, and he had the fort completed before the winter of 1831. It was only a temporary arrangement to winter in, in order to find out whether it would pay to establish a permanent post. Next spring Colonel Mitchell (afterward colonel in Doniphan's expedition to Mexico) built some cabins on Brule bottom, to live in until a good fort could be built. The houses at the mouth of the Marias were burned after the company moved to Brule bottom. Alexander Culbertson was sent by McKenzie to relieve Mitchell, and to build a picket stockade fort 200 feet square on the north bank of the Missouri river, which he completed during the summer and fall of 1832. This fort was occupied for eleven years, until Ft. Lewis was built by Culbertson on the south side of the Missouri river, near Pablois' island, in the summer of 1844. Ft. Brule was then abandoned and burned. In 1846, Ft. Lewis was abandoned, and Ft. Benton was built by Culbertson, about seven miles below Ft. Lewis, and on the north bank of the Missouri river. It was 250 feet square, built of adobes laid upon the ground without any foundation of stone, and is now standing (1875), and occupied as a military post. The dwellings, warehouses, stores, etc., were all built of adobes. The Piegans, Blackfeet and Blood Indians, all talking the same language, claimed and occupied the country from the Missouri river to the Saskatchawan river. Prior to the building of the winterquarters at the mouth of the Marias, they had always traded with the Hudson Bay Company at the Prairie Fort or Somerset House, both on the Saskatchawan. There was a bitter rivalry between the Hudson Bay Company and the American Fur Company. The Hudson Bay Company often sent men to induce the confederated Blackfeet to go north and trade, and the Indians said they were offered large rewards to kill all the traders on the Missouri river, and destroy the trading-posts. McKenzie wrote to Governor Bird, the head man of the Hudson Bay Company in the north, in regard to the matter, and Bird wrote back to McKenzie, saying: When you know the Blackfeet as well as I do, you will know that they do not need any inducements to commit depredations. At the time the Blackfeet commenced to trade on the Missouri, they did not have any robes to trade; they only saved what they wanted for their own use. The Hudson Bay Company only wanted furs of different kinds. The first season the Americans did not get any robes, but traded for a large quantity of beaver, otter, martin, etc. They told the Indians they wanted robes, and from that time the Indians made them their principal article of trade. The company did not trade provisions of any kind to the Indians, but when an Indian made a good trade, he would get a spoonful of sugar, which he would put in his medicine-bag to use in sickness, when all other remedies failed. In 1842, F. A Chardon, who was in charge of Ft. Brule, massacred about thirty Blackfeet Indians. The Indians had stolen a few horses and some little things out of the fort from time to time, and Chardon concluded to punish them for it. He waited until a trading party came in, and when they were assembled in front of the gate, he opened the gate and fired upon them with a small cannon loaded with trade balls. After firing the cannon, the men went out and killed all the wounded with knives. The Blackfeet stopped trading, and moved into the British Possessions, and made war on the post, and were so troublesome that Chardon abandoned Brule in the spring, went to the mouth of the Judith, and built Ft. F. A. Chardon on the north bank of the Missouri river, a short distance above the mouth of Judith river, which was burnt up when Culbertson built Ft. Lewis and made peace with the Blackfeet. In 1832, McKenzie sent Tullock, with forty men, to build a fort at the mouth of the Big Horn river. Tullock built the fort named Van Buren, on the south side of the Yellowstone, about three miles below the mouth of the Big Horn river. It was 150 feet square, picket stockade, with two bastions on diagonal corners. In 1863, I saw the location. The pickets showed plainly; they had been burned to the ground, and several of the chimneys were not entirely fallen down. The fort was built to trade with the Mountain Crows, an insolent, treacherous tribe of Indians. They wanted the location of their trading-post changed nearly every year, consequently they had four trading-posts built from 1832 to 1850, viz: Ft. Cass, built by Tullock, on the Yellowstone, below Van Buren, in 1836; Ft. Alexander, built by Lawender, still lower down on the Yellowstone river, in 1848, and Ft. Sarpey, built by Alexander Culbertson, in 1850, at the mouth of the Rose Bud. Ft. Sarpey was abandoned in 1853, and there has not been any trading forts built on the Yellowstone since, up to the present time (1875). Kenneth McKenzie, after Lewis and Clarke, was the pioneer of the Upper Missouri. He was a native of the highlands of Scotland. When young, he came in the service of the Hudson Bay Company to Hudson's Bay. In 1820, he quit the Hudson Bay Company, and started to explore the country from Hudson's Bay to Red river and Lake Winnepeg; thence to the Lake Superior country; finally concluded to locate on the Upper Mississippi. In 1822, he went to New York, and got an outfit of Indian trade goods on credit, and established a trading-post on the Upper Mississippi, and remained in that part of the country until 1839, when he came to Missouri and established Ft. Union. He was in charge of all the northwestern fur-trade until 1839, when he resigned, to enter the wholesale liquor trade at St. Louis, Mo. He resided at St Louis until his death, in 1856 or 1857. Alexander Culbertson assumed his position as fur-trader, in 1839.

Boats continued to be drawn up the Missouri by the cordelle or tow-line in the hands of voyageurs until 1832. From Independence, Mo., to Fort Benton, a distance of 3,000 miles, the most incessant and persevering exertion was required to stem the turbulent current of the Missouri. On account of the shifting channel, it was frequently necessary for those voyageurs to plunge into the water, regardless of heat, cold or exposure, and cross the river, in order to find depth of water sufficient to float the boat. Obstacles were numerous, delays frequent, and hardships grievous to be borne. In 1832 the cordelle was reduced from 3,000 to 700 miles, the American Fur Company sending up a steamboat that year to Fort Union, six miles above the mouth of the Yellowstone. For a number of years subsequently the Fur Company sent up a steamboat annually to Fort Union. This first boat was suggested by Pierre Choteau, after whom Choteau county is named. It was built at Pittsburgh, for river service, was named the Yellowstone, ran from St. Louis to Fort Pierre, in 1831, and, as stated, succeeded in making the full trip from St. Louis to Fort Union, in 1832. Above this point the voyageur was engaged for many years after, and may be said to have followed his toilsome trade up to the period when Gold creek called the miners to Montana. A description of these couriers and trappers, as they appeared a few years before their fall is given by Abbe Domenech. He says: "At St. Louis, during a festival given in honor of M. Laclede, founder of the town, we had the opportunity of seeing a hundred of these voyageurs and trappers dressed in the most curious manner. Many of these white savages bear names that are quite celebrated in the annals of the desert, and the accounts of their exploits would fill entire volumes with the most interesting details. The greater number of these children of the wilds are on friendly terms with the redskins, and they generally finish by marrying Indian girls, owing either to the frequent intercourse they keep up with the tribe, or on account of the security and the advantage they derive from these marriages. * * * Their glory is extinct; they are no more. The masters and the great navigators of the inner seas of the new world are gone, and in a short time hence the very name of the voyageurs, will be no more than a pleasing legend of the American solitudes." (Abbé Em. Domenech, pp. 244–5).

United States Military Posts.—The building of Forts C. F. Smith (to guard the Bozeman and Jacobs' route of 1863–4) and of Forts Phil. Kearney and Reno, in 1866–7, afforded proof positive that the government was determined to check all hostilities, whether directed by Indians or white men, and to guarantee to the travelers or immigrants a safe road to the country beyond the mountains. The policy was effectual in a great measure, and if not discontinued would undoubtedly have the effect of bringing peace into the territory. The treaty with the Indians, negotiated in 1868, provided for the evacuation of the three forts mentioned. No sooner was the faith of the government observed than the Sioux took possession of the buildings, gave them up to the fire, and claimed sole dominion over the country and new settlers, irrespective of treaty stipulations. To remedy this false step, the War Department authorized the construction of defenses and barracks in addition to the posts, which were not evacuated, and to this order is due the re-establishment of forts throughout the territory. There were four companies at the Big Horn building, C. F. Smith. Captain John W. Smith, of Bozeman, was the post trader at this place, and with him was Jim Beckwith, a mulatto, who had been a sub-chief among the Crows many years before. In a quarrel he had killed another chief and had to leave the tribe. After several years spent on the Pacific coast he came back, and had regained some influence in the tribe. As soon as the troops came to the Big Horn, Smith sent him to the mouth of that river to bring up the Crows who were camped there. Beckwith was taken sick at the camp and died while being brought back in a travois. The Crows came to the new post, and by order of the commandant were allowed to trade for large quantities of powder and lead. Several times during the fall the Crows and Sioux would make peace for a day, during which time the former tribe would trade this ammunition to the latter, receiving in exchange five times its value in buffalo robes. Soon afterward the Sioux would burn the powder, but the lead came back to the whites in the form of bullets.

General Connors, with a large force of troops, went to Powder river in the fall of 1865 and built a fort there, which he called Fort Connors. According to a statement made by T. R. Coleman, now of Chicago, then of the 16th Kansas Cavalry, this post was built in July, 1865, near the Big Sandy range, close to the forks.

Camp Cook on the south bank of the Missouri, at the mouth of the Judith river, was the first permanent military camp in the territory, being garrisoned by the first battalion of 13th United States infantry in the fall of 1866, under Major Clinton. This post was subsequently abandoned. After its establishment a fierce Indian named Strangled Wolf was killed, which occasioned some trouble. Lieutenant W. H. Keeling then Assistant Acting Quartermaster at the camp, writing under date January 18, 1867, to Mr. Fisk, of Helena, refers to this tragedy, and also explains very concisely the false ideas which prevailed regarding the climate of that northern region.

The Camp Cook National Cemetery for Union soldiers is situated one-half mile southwest of Camp Cooke, and about the same distance south of the Missouri river on the Government Reservation. It is inclosed by a cotton-wood picket fence, and in this inclosure the bodies of eighteen Union soldiers are interred. The names of the deceased soldiers and citizens are as follows: William Rubolz, May 3, 1867; Robert Carr, December 10, 1866; Thomas C. Cosgrove, October 7, 1867; I. Demahrl, November 9, 1866; Peter Hansart, December 17, 1866; William Howell, December 27, 1866; John Jones, June 24, 1867; David Lee, Feburary 26, 1867; George Malendie, April 12, 1867; B. S. McKellen, August 20, 1866; James McVee, June 25, 1867; Henry Olldack, January 11, 1867; Pitanista, November 30, 1866; James Geo. Schutte, Feburary 9, 1867; Abram Shelly, January 15, 1867; James L. Snyder, Feburary 12, 1867; Michael Walsh, May 30, 1867. McKellen was a citizen and Pitanista, a Piegan, the others being privates of 13th United States infantry.

Fort Buford.—During the month of July, 1866, Fort Buford (one and one-half miles below the old trading post of Fort Union, and opposite the mouth of the Yellowstone, on the site of Cambell & Sublette's trading post of 1833), was erected by Colonel Rankin. Eleven months after the building of the post the Indians assaulted the position, but were repulsed. The savages well reinforced, renewed the attack, succeeded after losing three hundred of their number, in capturing the post, and putting to death Colonel Rankin and his entire command. The story is told that Colonel Rankin shot his wife himself, rather than expose her to savage cruelty. The locality known as Fort Buford is a military reservation. In 1870 it was three miles square; but owing to a few settlers entering upon the enterprise of house building at old Fort Buford, Secretary Belknap and other honest members of the government destroyed their hopes by extending this reservation to thirty square miles. The Missouri trade from Yankton to Fort Benton may be said to have been then in the control of Durfee & Peck, and it is supposed that through their influence with Belknap the reservation was extended to thirty square miles, so that the new settlers would be driven off, and their trade left intact. Through whatever influence was brought to bear this wrong was perpetrated, and the entire trade of that district left in the hands of the Northwestern company. In the spring of 1871, Leighton and Jordan were appointed Post Traders, and purchased the interests of Durfee & Peck. Their business has proved a great wealth giver, and will continue so while the reservation of 1871 is allowed to stand sentinel over this district, cutting off all competition and retarding its settlement.

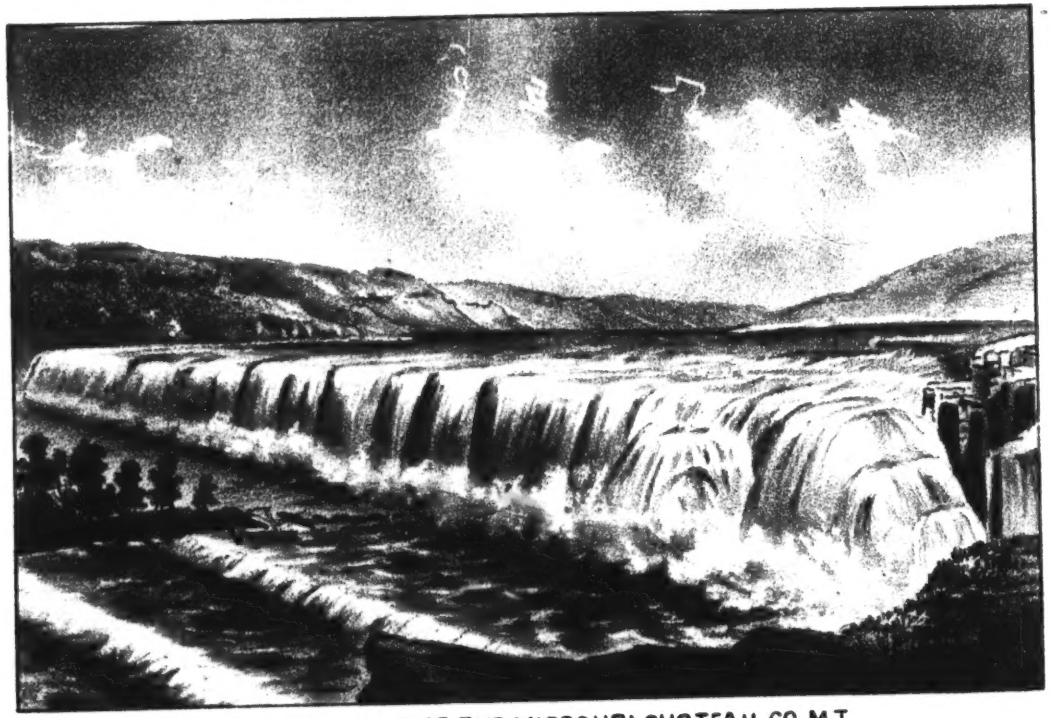
Fort Shaw.—This post was established June 30, 1867, when four companies of the 13th United States infantry, under Major Wm. Clinton, camped on the spot. The new post was named Camp Reynolds. The object of a military post on Sun river is to protect and keep open the route from Helena to Fort Benton, on the Missouri, and prevent, as far as possible, the incursions of Indians into the settlements to the south. The 13th infantry had moved up the Missouri river during the summer of 1866, and the first battalion, under Major Clinton, took part that fall and built Camp Cook, since abandoned, near the mouth of the Judith river. The name of Camp Reynolds was changed to Fort Shaw, August 1, 1867, pursuant to Department Orders of July 4, 1867, and in remembrance of the services of Colonel Robert G. Shaw, of the 54th Massachusetts Volunteers (colored), who was killed at Fort Wagner, July 18, 1863. In August, 1867, the troops were lodged in tents, but before the winter set in one-half of each set of company quarters, a part of the hospital, a wooden store-house, and three sets of officers' quarters were erected. Early in the spring of 1868 the building of the post was resumed, and during the season the walls of the remaining buildings of the post were erected and roofed, and in 1869 the work of completing the buildings was being carried on. The military reservation occupies the whole valley for ten miles at least. The valley basin is simply an extensive depression in the elevated plains of the country, and presents, in the main, a prairie bottom from two to three miles wide, with a higher prairie surface of moderate width extending along the foot hills on either side. The bluffs are therefore merely steep ascents to higher levels beyond. The post is built round a square of four hundred feet inside, in accordance with the plans of General Reeve in 1867. Adobe brick 6x12x4 inches were used in the walls. The company barracks are four buildings of one hundred and two feet front each, while the store-houses and offices are equally pretentious.

The soldiers buried at Fort Shaw National Cemetery are referred to as follows: Daniel H. Lee, private of the 13th United States Infantry, was found dead, November 26, 1867, on the prairie, about three miles from the fort. He was last seen alive on the evening of November 24, at Sun River crossing, five miles from the fort. At that time he was patronizing the tavern at the crossing, and was intoxicated. Those facts, with the want of marks of violence, led to the conclusion that his death was due to exposure while in a drunken condition. John Hanson, another private of the 13th United States Infantry, committed suicide by shooting himself through the head, July 26, 1867. William Collins, of the same regiment, died from acute dysentery, December 9, 1867. Christopher Nelson (Dalager), a citizen, died from typhoid dysentery, October 16, 1867, and was buried in the cemetery; so also was Daniel Smart, another citizen, September 29, 1867. (See U. S. S. G. Reports.)

Fort Ellis.—Fort Ellis, ten miles from Bozeman, was established August 27, 1867, under orders from B. M. General Terry, then commanding the Department of Dakota. The fort is situate on the Gallatin river at the head-waters of the Missouri, about 6,000 feet above sea level, in Lat. 40 deg. 30 min. N. and Long. 112 W. The aspect is south over the high prairie lands opening to the west, with bold mountains hemming it in on north, east and south.

In November, 1867, the commissariat buildings were completed, the three buildings for officers' quarters and the bakery were finished in December, 1867. In January, 1868, the hospital, commandant's house, guardhouse and blacksmith shop were erected, and in February of that year an ice-house was built. In October and November, 1868, the second terrace of officers' quarters and the stockade were completed. This stockade inclosed a rectangle 390 by 458 feet and was ten feet in height. Water is supplied from the Gallatin river, 600 feet above the fort. The water is pure.

The quartermasters' stables were built of logs, and roofed and floored with earth; while the cavalry stables—four log buildings—were roofed with boards. The barracks are built of unhewn pine logs, with mortar filling, and pine board floors.



BLACK EAGLE FALLS OF THE MISSOURI, CHOTEAU CO. M.T.

RES. OF M. FURNELL SUN RIVER CHOTEAU CO. M.T.

Cultivation is confined to the valley of the Gallatin and streams. Irrigation is necessary, the soil fertile, producing large crops of wheat, rye, oats, barley, potatoes, beets, carrots, turnips, ond all the northern vegetables. The mountain ranges in the vicinity are bold in the extreme. Cliffs of sandstone and limestone, clothed in red fir, cedar and white pine, stand out in wild confusion. Bituminous coal of good quality is found in immense beds. Gold is found near the post, and at Immigrant Gulch, thirty miles distant, gold mining is a great industry. The rivers and rivulets produce trout in large numbers. Black-tailed deer, elk, antelope, mountain sheep, grizzly bear, black bear, wolf, mink, ermine and beaver inhabit the forest and prairie.

The Crows occupy the country south of the Yellowstone, and numbered in 1870 250 lodges. Notwithstanding the ravages of smallpox and syphilis, the tribe still increases. Fort Ellis was originally garrisoned by a detachment of the 13th United States Infantry. In 1869, two companies of the 2d Cavalry augmented this force, and since that time a force of infantry and cavalry has occupied the post. (S. G. Reports 71.)

Fort Parker, 35 miles from Bozeman, was erected in 1869 by Colonel L. M. Black, and was at that time the best that was in the Territory. It is on an elevated plateau 60 feet above the valley. It is a commanding position from which a view of the country for miles away can be had and the approach of hostile bands be watched. On the eastern side of the fort runs a beautiful crystal stream. In front about one mile to the north runs the Yellowstone to mingle its waters with the Missouri as it flows on to the sea. In the rear and on the western side lofty snow-capped mountains rear their heads as imposing monuments of the perfection and purity of the works of God and nature. This fort was destroyed by fire October 30, 1872.

Fort Thomas Francis Meagher was established August 27, 1867, by the following order of Colonel Howie:

Headquarters Montana Militia, in the field,—In respect to the memory of the lamented Thos. Francis Meagher, the patriot, scholar and soldier, by whose proclamation as the Acting Chief Magistrate of Montana, this protective movement was inaugurated, and under whose wise supervision it was placed on a basis of effectiveness, and who lost his life while engaged in rendering the organization still more efficient, this military post shall be known as Fort Thomas Francis Meagher.

The site selected was near an ice-cold spring capable of supplying 5,000 cavalry if necessary, with an abundance of timber contiguous, three miles below McAdow cañon or Yellowstone cañon, and four miles south of the former camping grounds named Camp Green Clay Smith.

Camp Ida Thoroughman was established June 13, 1867, by Colonel H. N. Blake, Major John Kinsley, Captain Robert Hughes, Captain Frank Davis, Surgeon James Dunboy, Captain Reuben Foster and Captain Neil Campbell in honor of Brigadier-General Thoroughman's daughter. Fort Meagher, Camp Ida Thoroughman and Fort Green Clay Smith cannot be considered more than temporary camps for the volunteers of 1867.

A post was built under the direction of Captain Matlock on the head-waters of the Muscleshell in 1867.

Fort Pease, located on a high bottom about 10 to 15 feet above the Yellowstone. It is about 225 feet square; three sides inclosed with log-houses and the fourth with poles. It is at a good landing. On the 5th of March, 1876, there were four graves there, in which were buried James Edwards, killed July 12, 1876; Fred Harland, killed November 1, 1875; Patrick Sweeny, wounded January 2, 1876, and died January 16, 1876; and Joseph Jessey, killed January 29, 1876. This fort was evacuated March 4, 1876. The expedition under General Brisbin arrived on that date and relieved the remnant of the garrison. Of the 46 men who were in quarters when the Indians circumvalated the post, 6 were killed, 8 were wounded, 13 fled by night to the settlements, so that 19 formed the little garrison when General Brisbin's aid arrived. In May, 1876, the Indians destroyed this fort by fire.

Fort Benton is situate at the head of the navigation of the Missouri river, 5,000 miles from the Gulf of Mexico, 64 miles east of Fort Shaw by water, in latitude 48 deg. north, longitude 110 deg. west, at a height above sea level of 2,780 feet; 245 miles by trail from Fort Ellis, 144 miles northeast of Helena, 25 miles east of the Belt range and 45 miles south of the Bear-paw mountains. The American Fur Company built this fort in 1846, sold it to the Northwest Fur Company in 1864, and from them it passed into the hands of the U. S. A.

Commissariat Department in October, 1869, when it was used as the storehouse for supplies for the northern military posts. (See Fur Traders.)

From the report of Assistant-Surgeon A. B. Campbell, under date July 13, 1870, it is learned that this military reserve was three miles in length by one mile in width, all prairie, save the river valley, without springs or ponds, as the nearest spring is eight miles distant on the Fort Shaw road, and the nearest pond, which is alkaline, twenty-eight miles distant on the same road. The wells in Benton City are of varied quality, some as pure and cold as the waters of the northern lakes, others alkaline and nauseous.

The highest temperature in the shade was 104 degrees F., in the sun 139 degrees F.; the lowest temperture, 30 degrees F., and the mean about 50 degrees F. During the snow storm of May 31 and June 1, 1870, the mininum temperature was 29 degrees F., while on June 3 the thermometer registered 130 degrees in the sun. Winds prevail from the east and south, and gales are frequent. The winter is mild as a rule, but is subject to icy periods, which last from forty-eight to seventy-two hours.

Camp Baker (Camp Logan) was established in November, 1869, for the protection of miners in Diamond City and neighborhood. The same year a reservation was located twelve miles south of the original Camp Baker, and orders were issued to build a new fort. The Old Camp is situated in latitude 47 degrees, longitude 111 west at a height of 7,000 feet above sea level. It is seventy miles southeast from Fort Shaw as the crow flies, but the trail is 200 miles; 120 miles north of Fort Ellis, and twenty-five miles northeast of Diamond City. The buildings of the camp are 450 feet from the west bank of Smith's river, or Deep creek, eighty feet above low water, and fifty miles above the confluence of that stream and the Missouri. The buildings consist of seven small huts, each 16x25 feet, built of pine logs and roofed with pine slabs covered with earth, each lighted by a small window in the door, and warmed by opened fire-places. Three of these cabins for officers' quarters have pine-board floors, while the other buildings have plain clay floors. The stables, 116x26 feet, the bakery 16x15 feet, the store-house and cook-house 42x15 feet, are substantial log buildings. The hospital and guard houses were built of canvas resting on posts; subsequently the post was improved, the name changed to Camp Logan, and again abandoned. The rocks in the vicinity comprise granite, limestone and syenite; the trees are yellow and red pine, cedar, aspen, willow and cottonwood. The wild animals of the locality comprise principally the common and the black bears, mountain sheep, mountain lion, antelope, deer and elk.

Fort Missoula.—The site for the military post at Missoula was selected by Lieutenant A. C. Worden in July, 1876, and the following year the post was erected by companies A and I, of the 7th U. S. Infantry, under Captains Rawn and Logan, who also formed its first garrison. The fort is 3,375 feet above sea level, in latitude 46 deg. 50 min. north and longitude 37 west. It is situated on the right bank of St. Mary's fork, of the Bitter Root river, four miles from its confluence with the Hell Gate river. The area of the military reservation is 2,777 acres, of which 1,577 acres are timber land.

Fort Keogh is the leading military post within the territory, which modern experience with the Sioux suggested. It was built to supply the place of a fort dismantled in 1875–6, and to prove to the Indians, as it were, that Uncle Sam in his military relation to them is the most extravagant and inconsistent combination of governing ability known to them. The post was erected in 1877 by Brevet Major General Nelson A. Miles, and was at once garrisoned by the 5th United States Infantry, and a battalion of the 2d United States Cavalry. To-day it presents the appearance of a large village, and is complete in all the requirements of a center of population. The Fort Keogh military reservation was established by the President's proclamation of March 14, 1878, declaring the following boundaries. "Starting at a mid-stream point of the Yellowstone river opposite the mouth of Tongue river; then due west six miles; thence due south ten miles; thence due east to mid-stream of Tongue river; thence along mid-stream of Tongue river to the point of beginning; reserving as a site for ferry or bridge the following described tract, viz.: commencing at the initial point, a mound erected about one hundred feet from the east bank of Tongue river, and six feet six inches from the north face of the most northern of three trees growing there in a cluster; thence 12 deg. 32 min. 30 sec. north of east 656 feet; thence 12 deg. 32 min. 30 sec. east of south 974 feet; thence 12 deg.

32 min. 30 sec. south of west to mid-stream of Tongue river; thence along mid-stream of Tongue river to intersection of prolongation of line joining the initial point, and northeast corner of said site with line of said mid-stream; thence along said prolongation to point of beginning. Total area reserve about 90.03 square miles." Speaking of the post, Major McElrath says: "To the vigilance and bravery of its commanding officer (General Miles) more than to any one other instrumentality, the credit is due for the cleansing of Eastern Montana of the hordes of hostile savages, who as lately as 1877 rendered the Yellowstone valley uninhabitable for whites. It may safely be claimed that the aboriginal bugbear has been exterminated in that locality. There are, it is true, as in all the western territories, multitudes of Indians in the valley, but they are either the 'reconstructed' attaches or captive allies of Fort Keogh, or friendly tribes living on their special reservations; but the so-called 'hostiles' no longer threaten the Yellowstone valley, nor need there be the slightest risk of invasion by them so long as Forts Buford, Keogh, Custer, Ellis and Assiniboine are effectively garrisoned and efficiently utilized.

Towards the close of 1877 General Miles was allowed to retain twenty-nine Indian scouts and their families—thirty-nine children and forty-four women. These were engaged in the Custer massacre, and on March 23, 1877, surrendered themselves to the troops. Three hundred more of the same band gave themselves up in April, 1877. Their war ponies were sold for $2,450.20. With half this money Captain Ewers purchased a very fine herd of eighty-five young cows and heifers at about $10 a head, and $400 worth of seeds for planting. The cattle were branded and distributed among the families. The ground for the garden was broken up late in the season, yet they have raised 1,000 bushels of potatoes, 150 of turnips, thirty of corn, fifteen of onions, eighteen of parsnips, ten of carrots, 1,000 melons, 1,000 head of cabbage, 4,000 summer squash, 500 Hubbard, 300 pumpkins and 300 dozen cucumbers. Besides these, they raised a large quantity of beans, peas, radishes and tomatoes. Their winter crop has been stored in two large root houses, built by the Indians themselves. The general says that the head warriors of the Ogallala Sioux and Cheyennes could have been seen gathering their crops and rolling logs with which to secure them for the winter. This work has been done under the supervision of one soldier—George Youkam, a plain, honest Illinois farmer boy, who came out as a recruit last fall." (McElrath.)

Fort Custer was established in 1877 to supply the place of one of the posts dismantled previously. In August, 1877, General Sheridan gave the following particulars regarding the building of this fort: "General Buel has 100 mechanics at work, and expects 100 more—his three companies of infantry are assisting in the building operations. Two thousand cottonwood logs had been cut for projected buildings and the survey has been made. General Buel is determined to preserve the timber in the vicinity of the post, and has accordingly forbidden the cutting of timber within a radius of eight miles. The lodge poles left by the Sioux when they fled so precipitately after the fight with Custer are being utilized in the construction of the barracks."

Before the close of the year the company's quarters were completed.

The location of the post at the junction of Custer river and the Big Horn, near the scene of the Custer massacre, is well adapted to meet the purposes of such an establishment.

This post came into existence after the actual necessity for it was a thing of the past. Until November, 1882, there were few incidents to disturb the monotony of barrack life. At that time Lieutenant Griffiths met a tragic death. Out upon telegraph duty, he had sent his men ahead—when presently his riderless horse joined the troop. The lieutenant was found dead and horribly mangled, it being supposed that he was dragged a mile, when his head was literally kicked to pieces. The funeral was a mournful affair.

Fort Assiniboine was built to guard against incursions of the Sioux, who quartered themselves on our Canadian neighbors after their unlooked for victory over the United States troops in the Yellowstone country. The history of the fort is taken from the River Press: "The largest and finest military post in the west was established May 9, 1879, and occupied by troops the same date. It is situated on Beaver creek about five miles from its confluence with Milk river, and distant from Benton about sixty-five miles. The view of the post shows on the right thirty-five sets of officers quarters, on the left quarters for ten companies. The large building in the center of the view is the post hospital, on one side of it the post chapel and on the other the gymnasium, bowling alley and theatre in one building.

The parade ground is 2,000 feet in length and 400 feet wide. The length of the octangular space including all the post buildings 3,600 feet; width, 1,900 feet. Whole number of buildings at the post, fifty-nine. The large store of Broadwater, McCulloh & Co., post traders, and the handsome residence of R. L. McCulloh do not appear in the cut, being just behind the point from which the view was taken. There are two post schools, one for the children of enlisted men, and at which attendance is compulsory; the other for the enlisted men, and held in the evening. The school rooms in the chapel building are large and attractive. The chapel is an elegant structure, and was dedicated October 22, 1882. The teachers of the school are Geo. P. Pratt, sergeant company C, 18th infantry; Henry C. Hapgood, company C, 18th infantry, with Post Chaplain S. G. Dodd as officer in charge. The post reading room is a worthy adjunct, and has on its tables thirty-three daily and weekly papers and fifteen monthly magazines. A large number of the enlisted men avail themselves of the privilege they afford. The reading room is under the supervision of Lieutenant R. F. Bates, 18th infantry, post adjutant. The post has an admirable system of water works, recently completed. The source of supply is Beaver creek, adjacent to the post. A forty-horse power engine is used in raising the water to the reservoir, and the same power also runs the post saw mill. There are 5,843 feet of pipe, twenty-seven hydrants, and the ten fire plugs. The success of the water works is complete and their value inestimable. Engineer E. T. Marston is in charge. A post garden of fifty-two acres can be irrigated by the water works if necessary.

The Fort Maginnis military reservation is seven by nine miles square. Fort Maginnis was established in July, 1880, by Captain Dangerfield Park, in command of two companies of the 3d infantry. The buildings are frame, resting on stone foundations. The cause of establishment is due to a desire to encourage settlement and to protect the settlers. The founding of the fort is due to Congressman Martin Maginnis, and in his honor the fort was named. The Granville Stuart ranch is located three miles south on Ford's creek near the Judith mountains. Five hundred acres.

Cantonment Porter was established below Glendive as a temporary protection to travelers. Near Terry's Landing a two company post was erected. Here was the head of Yellowstone navigation, where supplies for Fort Custer were landed. In the history of Montana's counties, references are made to temporary posts both trading and military.

CHAPTER VI.

GOLD AND SILVER MINING.

IN the whole range of human industry there is not one which has occasioned so much wild enthusiasm, subjected men to its dominion more thoroughly, brought forth so many rare characteristics of self-sacrifice, or created such sudden wealth as that of gold-mining in America. The slightest whisper of a discovery oftentimes led to the total depopulation of a mining camp and the creation of a new settlement. In the stampede which followed a new find most extraordinary instances of human endurance and courage and enterprise were afforded. The history of mining in Montana is full of incidents which suggest the idea that these golden deposits were placed in the heart of her great mountains by an inscrutable power as the only bribe that could be offered to attract the attention of the people toward the Rocky Mountain region. Were the intention such it could not be attended with better results; for among the erratic geniuses which enterprises of this description group together are men skilled in the ways of progress and ready to seize upon the first opportunity to build up themselves, then to build up their fellows, and next to build up the country in which their destiny placed them and where wealth waited upon their well-directed labors. Many of such men were among the early miners of this territory, and are to-day the leading spirits in all enterprises which contribute to the welfare of the territory.

In the pages devoted to biography and personal reminiscence the minutiæ of the history of Montana's mines and miners is related. Of over 2,200 such sketches in this work no less than 1,200 contain special references to early mining history, while in almost every chapter something relating to the golden gulches and hills of the Territory is stated definitely. For this reason, and in view of the fact that the progress of each mining district is noted in the history of the several counties, this chapter is confined to a review of early mining enterprises and mining statistics.

The record of gold discovery in the territory now called Montana dates back to 1739, when Verendrye reported to the French government the mineral riches of these mountains. Previous to the Lewis and Clarke expedition, however, little was known of the territory save what could be gleaned from the wanderer, Dixon. The existence of the precious metals became known to the members of this exploratory party, and to them must be credited the first mention of a Montana industry which has contributed its millions to the wealth of the country since 1862. All the explorations carried out in later years have resulted in a mention of the mineral riches of the territory. Lieutenant Mullan, Dr. Atkinson, the Stuart brothers, all aided in drawing attention to the rich mines which awaited development, and to the Stuarts the credit of hastening such development must be given. This becomes more apparent when we review the authentic history of early mines and miners by Granville Stuart, published by Captain Mills in his journal of September 16, 1875. "In the year 1852," says Mr. Stuart, "a half-breed named Francois, but who was known among his associates by the name of Benetsee, and who had just returned from California to the Rocky mountains, began to prospect on what is now known as Gold creek, in Deer Lodge county, and found light float gold; but, as his prospecting was necessarily of a very superficial character, he found no mines that would pay. The fact of gold being found there, however, became noised about among the few mountaineers still in the country, and in the spring of 1856 a party, among whom were Robert Hereford, late of Helena, John Saunders, called 'Long John' (who could throw a stone with almost the force and precision of a rifle ball), Bill Madison and one or two others, who were passing 'Benetsee' creek on their way to Salt Lake from the Bitter Root valley, where they had spent the winter trading with the Indians and prospecting a little, found more gold than had been obtained by Benetsee. One piece weighed about ten cents, and they gave it to old Captain Grant, who used to show it, up to the time of his death in 1862, as the first piece of gold found in the country. The matter rested here until the spring of 1858, when Thomas Adams (now of Washington city), Reece Anderson, E. H. Burr, John H. Powell, and James and Granville Stuart searched for gold in that vicinity and found as high as ten cents to the pan of gravel; but, as they had neither provisions (they were living on wild meat straight, without salt) nor tools, they could not accomplish anything, more especially as the Blackfeet stole four of their horses and so harrassed them that they abandoned the country for a time, returning, however, in the fall of 1860, firm in the faith that this was a rich gold country. In the meantime, during the summer of 1860, a mining enthusiast named Henry Thomas (but who, as soon as his peculiarities became known, was designated 'Gold Tom,' by which he ever afterwards went), came by the way of Pen d'Oreille Lake and began to prospect on Benetsee creek about one mile west of where Pioneer City now stands. Almost unaided, he sank a shaft over thirty feet deep in the glacial detritus along the creek, getting a little gold all the way down. He also washed some on the surface at this point during this and the following summer, but only made about $1.50 a day, owing to the great disadvantage under which he worked. His windlass and four little sluice boxes, hewed out with an axe and now fast falling into decay, may still be seen where he worked. Alas! poor Tom! The writer lost sight of him in '66 or '67, and often wonders if he fell a victim to the ignus fatui of Cœur d'Alene, Peace River, Stickeen, Cassiar, White Pine, Pioche, Yellowstone, and last, but not least, the Black Hills, and, wherever he may be, may fortune smile upon him with a broader grin than fell to the lot of any of the pioneers at 'Pioneer creek' in 1860–1–2. He usually preferred to be alone, and would spend days and weeks among the mountains with no other companions than his horses and trusty rifle; yet he was not at all misanthropic. In the fall of 1860 and spring of 1861 Anderson and the Stuarts prospected in the dry gulches, putting into Benetsee creek and found what they considered good paying mines, but they did little towards working them that season for two reasons: First, they had very few and imperfect tools and no lumber until they could get it whip-sawed; and second, all the party except the writer went to Fort Benton for the purpose of purchasing supplies from the steamboats expected up the river that year. The one boat (the Chippeway) that started up was burned near the mouth of Milk river, and the summer was lost in waiting for her. On this boat were William Graham, of Philipsburg, and Frank L. Worden, of Missoula. Early in the spring of 1862 the Stuarts, Adams, Burr and Powell began to mine, having had lumber sawed by hand at ten cents a foot, and picks and shovels packed up from Walla Walla, four hundred and twenty-five miles distant, by Worden & Higgins' train, that brought their goods to Hellgate, and on the 8th day of May they set the first string of sluices ever used in Montana, and began to mine by the old pick and shovel process. In 1861 the Stuarts had written to their brother Thomas, who was in Colorado, to come out here, as they thought this a better and richer country than that, which opinion, by the way, they have seen no reason to change, and still adhere to. Thomas showed the letter to many friends of his, and the result was that quite a number left there in the spring of 1862 for Deer Lodge. The first of these, a party of twelve, arrived at Pioneer on the 20th of June, and among them was J. M. Bozeman, who was murdered by the Indians on the Yellowstone in 1867, and after whom the flourishing town of Bozeman, in Gallatin valley, was named. The party found good prospects in a branch of the Benetsee, or Gold creek, as it now began to be called, which branch took the name of Pike's Peak gulch, from the fact of the discoverers being from Pike's Peak, as Colorado was then generally called. Other parties also began to straggle in from Pike's Peak and Utah, and about the 29th of June Samuel T. Hauser, Frank Louthan, John Alt, and W. B. Dance arrived, being the advance guard of a number who came up on the steamers from St. Louis, and who were on their way to Florence, in the Salmon river mines, not having heard of the discoveries at Gold creek, where, however, many of them stopped, and are now among our oldest and most respected citizens." (Vide Personal Reminiscences.)

This plain statement of fact has been questioned in one particular by Lieutenant Bradley and others. They claim that John W. Silverthorne, one of the oldest settlers of the territory, was also her first gold miner. This claim is founded on the facts set forth in Bradley's letter, and might be easily sustained, had not Matt. Carroll, himself one of the leading and oldest settlers of Montana, who knew Silverthorne well, qualified the statement by saying that the gold in question was found in the Kootenai mine north of the boundary. This Silverthorne claim, following this paper of Mr. Stuart, appeared as a letter written at Fort Shaw, September 21, 1875, by Lieutenant James H. Bradley, and addressed to the editor of the Helena Herald. In this letter Lieutenant Bradley states:

I read with interest the extract from the Northwest, contained in your weekly issue of the 16th instant, relative to the "First Gold Mining in Montana." Anything Mr. Granville Stuart has to say about the early history of Montana is sure to be interesting and valuable, and it is probably rare indeed that his views should require subsequent modification. But in reference to the first gold mining done in Montana, I am in possession of some facts apparently not known to Mr. Stuart, and which may be equally unknown to the great majority of your readers. * * *

It is probably generally known that the American Fur Company, founded by Mr. Astor and subsequently controlled by Pierre Choteau, Jr. & Co., had a trading post at or near the site of the present town of Fort Benton, in 1832. Major Alexander Culbertson was for a number of years in charge of that post, and was at the time of which I have to speak, namely the year 1856. In the month of October a stranger appeared at the fort, coming by the trail from the southwest, now the Benton and Helena stage road; he was evidently an old mountaineer, and his object was to purchase supplies. Producing a sack, he displayed a quantity of yellow dust which he claimed was gold, and for which he demanded $1,000, offering to take it all in goods. Nothing was known at the fort of the existence of gold in the adjoining country, and Major Culbertson was loth to accept the proffered dust, having doubts of its genuineness. Besides, even if gold, he was uncertain of its value in this crude state, and he was, therefore, about to decline it, when an employe of the fort, a young man named Ray, came to the aid of the mountaineer, and by his assurances as to the genuineness of the gold and the value of the quantity offered, induced Major Culbertson to accept it. Still doubtful, however, he made it a private transaction, charging to goods to his own account. The mountaineer was very reticent as to the locality where he obtained his gold, but in answer to numerous questions, he stated that he had been engaged in prospecting for a considerable period in the mountains to the southwest, that his wanderings were made alone, and that he had found plenty of gold. Receiving in exchange for his dust a supply of horses, arms, ammunition, blankets, tobacco, provisions and other supplies, he quietly left the fort on his return to the mountains. Major Culbertson never saw or heard of him afterward, and was ignorant even of his name. The following year, 1857, he sent the gold dust through the hands of Mr. Choteau to the mint, and in due time received as the yield thereof $1,525, the dust having proved to be remarkably pure gold. Thus, as early as 1857, three years before Gold Tom hewed out his rude sluice boxes on Gold Creek, Montana gold had found its way to the mint, and contributed a small fortune of shining pieces to the circulating medium of the country. This much I obtained from the lips of Major Culbertson, just enough to pique curiosity; and the mysterious miner who had been the first to work the rich gulches of Montana, made the earliest contribution to the world of its mineral treasure, and whose subsequent fate and very name were unknown, often returned to my thoughts to vex me in my apparent powerlessness to lift any part of the veil of mystery that shrouded him. But one day I mentioned the circumstance to Mr. Mercure, an old and respected resident of Fort Benton, who came to the territory in the interest of the American Fur Company in 1855. To my great satisfaction he remembered the old mountaineer, the event of his golden visit to the fort having created quite an enduring impression. When Montana's great mining rush began, Mr. Mercure quitted the service of the fur company and sought the mines. There he met the mountaineer again, and immediately recognized him. His name was Silverthorne, and his habits were still of the solitary character that had distinquished him in former days. For several years he remained in the territory, occasionally appearing at the settlements, with gold in abundance; but after supplying his necessities by trade, he would again disappear on his lonely rambles. He could not be induced to divulge the secret of his diggings, but always declared that his mine was not a rich one, yielding him only four or five dollars a day Mr. Mercure believes, however, from the quantity of gold always in the possession of Silverthorne, that he greatly understated the value of his discovery. * * * He is evidently entitled to the distinction of having been first, by several years, of the thousands of enterprising men who have labored in the gold gulches of Montana and made so rich a contribution to the volume of the world's treasure.

The Centennial Historical Sketch, delivered at Philadelphia by W. A. Clark, of Butte, October 11, 1876, also varies in some respects from the historical reminiscences of Granville Stuart, by transferring the scene of early mining to the Salmon river district. "In July, 1861," says Mr. Clark, "the first gold was discovered on Salmon river by John J. Healy (now of Fort Benton) and George Grigsby. This discovery in paying quantities attracted thither from Colorado and other territories a large immigration. Some of these found their way into the Gold creek country in the summer of 1862, and others going up the Missouri en route for the Salmon river and Florence diggings stopped there to prospect in the adjacent gulches. During this summer a small party discovered some mines on Big Hole river of limited extent. A party of Coloradoans, among them Dr. Leavitt, of Glendale, had attempted the route to the Florence mines by way of Lemhi valley, and were forced to abandon it by reason of precipitous mountains, and were by favorable reports led to Deer Lodge valley as a desirable wintering place. This point they reached in July, 1862. While there two horsemen came in from Lemhi and reported the existence of favorable indications for gold on Grasshopper creek, near where Bannack now stands. They were provided with supplies and urged to return and prospect the gulch and report. This they proceeded to do, and returning with the news met the impatient party moving on toward the place. Augmented by other parties joining them, they proceeded to the discovery which had been made by John White on the 28th day of July, 1862, and in honor of the discoverer named White's Bar. Soon afterward other bars were found which were exceedingly rich. The gulch itself was then opened and mining began in good earnest. In the autumn a train was dispatched to Salt Lake city for provisions, the town of Bannack was laid out, and by the 1st of January, 1863, a population of 500 souls had gathered there, and among them some of the wildest and most reckless adventurers, whose names and misdeeds figure conspicuously in the early history of the Territory. Thus began the first important mining operations in this Territory. The fame of these diggings soon spread with almost lightning rapidity through the Territories and Pacific States, and occasioned a large immigration the ensuing spring and summer. Grasshopper gulch and bars have since yielded continuously, and added to the world's wealth several millions of gold. In May, 1863, mines of considerable extent were discovered on Horse Prairie creek, thirty miles southwest from Bannack. On the 1st of February of that year Wm. Fairweather and others left Bannack to prospect the Big Horn mountains. They were driven back by the Crow Indians on the Gallatin river. Returning homeward, the party camped at noon on Alder creek, eighty miles east from Bannack, and while the mid-day meal was preparing Fairweather washed a few panfuls of gravel near the camp, and to his great surprise obtained thirty cents in the first and as much as two dollars in subsequent pans. One of the party was sent to Bannack to carry the news to friends and return with supplies. Such intelligence could with difficulty be confided to a few, and became generally circulated. A great many rushed to the scene of the discovery, and on the 6th day of June Fairweather district was organized, with Doctor Steele as President and James Fergus as Recorder, and mining began in this famous gulch, which, it is estimated, has yielded since its discovery sixty millions of gold, and half of this amount in the first three years of its working. It was industriously worked for a distance of fifteen miles. Virginia City was built in this gulch. It was for several years the commercial and political capital of the Territory, and in its palmiest days of 1864–5 had a population of ten thousand people, and although the seat of government has since been transferred to Helena, it yet commands a large trade from Southern Montana, and is an active and prosperous city. At this place, in August, 1875, near the wild spot where twelve years before the hidden treasure was first revealed by him, William Fairweather was laid down to his rest. Like the unfortunate discoverer of the Comstock lode, whose bones also repose in Montana, this erratic soul stranded on the shoals of dissipation, although each in his day had turned a key, the one silver and the other golden, which unlocked millions to others. The next important discoveries of gold were made by John Cowan, in the fall of 1864, at Last Chance gulch, where Helena now stands,* and 125 miles north of Virginia, and by other parties at Silver Bow and German gulch, west of the Rocky mountains, at the head of Deer Lodge valley. Last Chance gulch and its tributaries sprang at once into notoriety on account of their richness. Helena grew rapidly in population and became the chief city in commercial importance, a position which it has since preëminently maintained. To this place the seat of government was removed in 1874. A government assay office and many handsome public and private buildings have been erected there. The distance from this point to the head of navigation, at Fort Benton, on the Missouri river, is only 140 miles, over an easy road, and by this route a great part of the merchandise is transported to the Territory. The winter and spring succeeding the discoveries last named were noted for the finding of other auriferous gulches, notably the following: Confederate, eastwardly from Helena and beyond the Missouri river; Ophir gulch, west of the range and thirty miles from Helena, and likewise numerous small gulches contiguous to those named, some of which were marvelously rich. In the fall of 1866 a four-mule team hauled to Fort Benton for transportation down the river two and one-half tons of gold, worth one and one half millions of dollars, nearly all of which was taken out at Montana bar and vicinity near Confedarate gulch.

"The spring of 1865 opened propitiously. Mines of great richness had been found extending throughout a region 150 miles in length and about 100 miles in width, and immigration came pouring in from all directions. The year following was likewise important in discovery and actual operations. Elk creek, Bear, Lincoln and Highland gulches in Deer Lodge county, New York gulch and Montana bar in Meagher county, began their contributions to the mint. In 1869 the auriferous belt was further extended by the discovery of Cedar creek, a rich mining region in the Cœur d'Alene mountains in Missoula county, 175 miles westward from Helena, and at Nine Mile, in the same county, diggings of considerable promise were found in 1874. In all there are about five hundred gold-bearing gulches in Montana, varying from half a mile to twenty miles in length, besides numerous bars, and in nearly all of them mining operations are actively carried on during six or seven months of the year. The gold varies in size from microscopic powder to nuggets weighing forty and fifty ounces, and in quality from 600 to 990 in fineness. One nugget was found in a tributary of Snowshoe gulch in 1865 which weighed 178 ounces troy, and was worth $3,200.

"In July, 1865, another large gold nugget was found in the claim of Maxwell, Rollins & Co., in Nelson gulch, worth $2,073. Deitrick & Brother found one on their claim in Rocker gulch, 1867, worth $1,800. Three others were found on Scratch Gravel—one by a boy, in 1875, worth $475, and two by the owner of the placer, Captain Tandy, in 1876 and 1875, one worth $375 and another worth $550. Another in Nelson gulch by the owner of the mine, Mr. Rogers, in 1878, worth $550. From the late discovery of nuggets and valuable new placers, and old mines further prospected, it is not trenching upon the grounds of probability to say that more money still lies in the placers of Montana than has yet seen the light of day."

It is estimated that the value of the product of Montana placers since the discovery of Alder Gulch amounts to $150,000,000. That those rich gulches of 1862–3 can be duplicated within the Territory is not doubted. Placers as productive as any ever discovered remain to reward the future laborers among the mountains. The old placers yielded in 1884 about $800,000 in gold, keeping, as it were, alive the memories of Alder and Last Chance, and holding the placer miner back from the hills of quartz.

Quartz mining, the great industry of the future, was introduced in 1862; but owing to the difficulties experienced in obtaining the heavy machinery required for this class of mining, the quartz mountains have been left for the present and the future to develope. The advance of two lines of railroad and the awakening of enterprise to a knowledge of the exhaustless mineral resources of Montana began to exercise a beneficent influence even in 1878. This revival, or rather inauguration, of extensive works continued down to 1883, when the beginning of true developement may be said to have been made. The opening up of Southern Montana by the Utah and Northern railroad and of Central Montana by the Northern Pacific railroad, conduced in a great measure to this result. Major Walker, in his paper on early quartz mining (1879), says:

The Dacotah lode, bearing gold quartz, was discovered near Bannack and located November 12, 1862. The decomposed quartz from the surface of the vein was packed down from the hill on which it was situated to the creek and the gold panned out. A mill to crush the quartz from this lode was begun by Wm. Arnold in the winter of 1862, and finished by J. F. Allen the following spring. The motive power was water. The stamp stems, four in number, were made of wood and the shoes and dies were made of old wagon tires cut and welded together. This primitive affair was followed in 1863 by the erection of other mills which had been transported from Colorado and the east, and from that time to this the gold quartz near Bannack has given employment to several mills almost uninterruptedly. Gold bearing quartz was sought for and found in nearly all the placer districts. The discovery of gold quartz in Lewis and Clarke counties was almost as early as those of gold placers. September 27, 1864, Jas. W. Whitlatch discovered the famous Union lode which yielded paying gold quartz for a distance of two thousand feet along the lode, and has been worked in places to the depth of five hundred and eight hundred feet on the dip of the lode. Several mills were built to reduce the quartz of this lode, many of them proving very profitable investments, and the yield of this mine since its discovery has amounted to about three millions of dollars. The Atlantic Cable lode, in Deer Lodge county, proved also to be remarkably rich. From this mine, in 1872, was extracted by S. Cameron some specimens of gold quartz about ten thousand dollars in value which are gorgeous to behold, and believed to be the most interesting collection in the world of gold bearing quartz. At Unionville and the Park, four miles from Helena, and at Silver Star, Summit, Alder, Meadow Creek, Iron Rod, Bannack, Radersburg, Pony, Boulder and Highland are other gold quartz mines worked with paying profits for years. The Stemple District, situated twenty miles from Helena, being the latest development of gold quartz, contains the famous Penobscot and other extensions of the Snow Drift, which are probably the most valuable gold quartz mines in the world. Besides in this district there are other valuable gold mines of developed richness, and being worked, viz.: Belmont, Blue Bird, Whippoorwill, Black Hawk, Viola, Hickey, Grey Eagle, Emma Miller, Mount Pleasant, Green, Northern Light, Piegan, Humbug and Long Tom. The famous Penobscot brick was cast at Helena, April 14, 1878, of $54,262.62, the net products of the mine for thirty days in February and March. "The development of the Penobscot in February, 1878, by its then sole owner Nathan S. Vestel, and its product of thousands of dollars daily, as exhibited by the ponderous retorts of pure gold in the windows of the banking house of L. H. Hershfield & Bro., Helena, furnished at that time an endless theme of discussion and speculation, and created in the mining world a sensation which has no parallel since the bonanza strike in the Consolidated Virginia and California mines—the twin silver wonders of Washoe." The owner, Mr. Vestel, like most of the successful miners, had had his days of hard luck, prosperity and poverty at times. In the fall of 1876 he bought out the original locators of the Penobscot, the Messrs. Murphy, of Silver, Wm. Rader and Bert Nash, who had sunk shafts on Discovery and No. 1 east. Ore worked from the dumps paid a profit and answered his expectations. He discontinued operations during the winter, but commenced again in the spring, continuing on till August, when a division of interests was agreed upon, Captain Sears taking the Emma mine and Arastra as his part and Vestel the Penobscot. The season of 1879 found him earnestly engaged with a small force of men on his mine, taking out ore from Discovery and shaft No. 2, and crushing in an arastra which he had previously secured. Ore to the amount of 160 tons taken from the Snow Drift (east extension) gave him a start. To work his arastra he needed continuous power, and with the help of a staunch friend, Mr. John Whitehead, who indorsed for him in bank, he bought a ten horse power engine, put it in motion, and went forward with his undertaking. Favored by his workmen, who refused to press him for wages, he started in at the close of the old year to sink a third shaft on the Penobscot, uncovering at grass roots a wide vein of good ore, between well-defined granite walls, the "show" beckoning him down. Every foot sunk pointed to something better, and it was not long before the men were picking and hoisting from a fifteen foot body of choice quartz. Mr. Courtwright, owning a five-stamp quartz mill lying idle near Helena, had been induced to move it to Silver under a contract to crush 500 or more tons of ore. This mill and the arastra were quick to show results, the first clean-ups producing a gold bar of twenty thousand dollars. Before this Mr. Vestel was $7,000 in debt, and this amount he had just previously doubted his ability to pay. On February 14, 1878, his birthday, he appeared in Helena with his bullion, satisfied in full every claim, and found himself with a surplus of $13,000. In the summer following he sold the Penobscot to Wm. B. Frue, of Detroit, Michigan, for $350,000, and it now forms the chief magnet in the "Penobscot and Snow Drift Consolidated Mining Company," which has been organized with Eastern capital and is now turning out thousands of dollars daily from their forty horse-power stamp mill at Belmont.

The mines of the Little Belt mountains have only recently attracted a little of the attention they deserve. This immense region of mineral riches has remained for years awaiting the era of development, and now that this era has been entered upon, it is only reasonable to expect that modern enterprise will draw forth all the resources which the region offers. O. C. Mortson, in his paper on the mineral resources of this portion of the territory, says:

For over fifteen years this section of Montana has been known to be rich in minerals, but at this time, though the existence of gold and silver was suspected, yet it was only the vast copper deposits of Copperopolis that were actually discovered. It is a little singular, too, that these, the first discoveries, are yet undeveloped, and thus the results of the first discovery remain in abeyance. The mines of Copperopolis are, many of them, patented, and that they are immensely rich has been long ago proved without a doubt. It is more than likely that the near approach of the railroad will hasten the development the coming season. A long interval elapsed between this discovery and the next one that obtained any publicity. Still, in the interval, many mountaineers were busy prospecting, and in 1870–1–2 I was told repeatedly of galena ores in the vicinity of Belt Park, when I lived on Smith river; and I am myself (as well as others) acquainted with new fields of discovery not yet generally known. In 1877 the discovery of gold on the Judith caused a stampede, which resulted in the Yogo camp, and though it may now be considered a deserted placer camp, this by no means proves that the gold is not there; if not in placer, it most assuredly is in quartz, as I will show further on. In 1879 the discovery of the galena deposits of the Barker district, by Messrs. Barker, Hughes and Olinger, may be considered the first key note of the development of these mountains. At first through the supposed failure of the Yogo excitement, the public were loth to advance time and money for the development of the mines, but like all grand truths, it dawned upon the public mind that there was "millions in it." In 1881 the first grand stride was the establishment of the works of the Clendenin Mining and Smelting company at Gold Run, which brought money in the camp by the employment given. In Galena creek where, six years ago, the stealthy footsteps of the solitary hunter could be slightly heard, we find a gulch about two miles long containing more houses than there are in Benton; we hear the ring of the blacksmith's hammer, the thunder-voice of the blast, the shrill shriek of the steam engine, and all the varied noises incidental to a busy mining camp. As regards the mines, it is hard to tell where to begin, so many good ones being scattered loose, as I might say, but when a camp contains such mines as the Wright & Edwards, Barker, May and Edna, Boss, Vanderbilt, Meek, Silver Bell, Pittsburg, etc., etc., rest assured it has a future before it. Within four miles there is the Dry Fork district, which this year has improved in development, and a busy city is an undoubted certainty in the near future. Southward and a little west, across the range, we find the Belt Park district. This camp I did not become acquainted with until this fall, but when I state that I visited nineteen splendid prospects in one day, it shows the enormous development this camp has made this summer. Prominent among these discoveries I may mention the Whipporwill, Uncle George, Hughes and DeLorrier lodes, all located on one vein, and all showing enormous bodies of ore. I have not the least hesitation in stating that this is the largest mass of mineral found since the discovery of Copperopolis. This vein is rich in copper, gold and silver, and as for galena, when I was there I saw boulders of it four men could not lift; in fact, they are splendid locations. Four miles further south we arrive at the Montana district. I have given descriptions of this district at various times this summer. At the present time the Samson is being vigorously developed, increasing not only in quantity of ore, but also in quality. The Queen of the Hills is being developed as fast as six men can do it, working night and day and holds her own. The Fitzpatrick lode is being worked and continues to improve. About ten miles northeast, on the Judith slope, we find the Running Wolf district, with its rich dolometic veins. Prominent we find the Sir Walter Scott, Mystery, Running Wolf, etc., which will be heard from the coming summer, the richness of the veins impressing a beholder at first sight. On Sage creek we find a number of locations made by Butte prospectors. In Yogo are a number of lodes now being developed, some owned by old timers of placer days, and others by new faces. This past summer has shown that by the size of the lodes, and their richness, that Yogo gulch has not yet seen her days of prosperity.

Up the Yellowstone lie the rich mineral gulches of Mill Creek, Emigrant Gulch and Six Mile, situated twenty-two, twenty-eight and thirty-four miles distant from Livingston. Cooke City, the mining metropolis of Clarke's Fork of the Yellowstone is 110 miles distant, near the head of Soda Butte creek. Almost the entire length of the Park road on the south side of the Yellowstone is rich in mineral claims assaying in gold and silver from $10 to $400 ounces per ton. Assays taken on Mill Creek and Emigrant Gulch from developing leads in those localities, ran as high in one instance as $487 per ton, the assay having been made by Dr. Chas. P. Saxton, of Emigrant Gulch, formerly assayer for the Northern Pacific railroad. The Boulder mines, rich in gold and silver, lie forty miles south east from Livingston. All the mines and mineral belts named lie within a short distance of Livingston.

Early in the summer of 1870 James Gourley, Ed. Hibbard, Horn Miller and Bart Henderson, outfitted and started from the Crow agency for a prospecting trip in the mountains. They went up the river to the mouth of Bear gulch and up that to its head. They prospected the divide on each side from here to the head of Soda Butte creek, finding in the latter place some float galena ore, and small gold prospects in the gravel of the creek. They then went down Clarke's Fork a short distance, and finding nothing on this stream went up to and crossed the divide near Pilot Knob and down to the east fork of the Yellowstone; crossing this they went up on Specimen ridge and over to where they could look into the lower end of the Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone; then back to the ridge, which they followed up for quite a distance, then across the east fork again and up a creek to a high mountain from which heads the north fork of Stinking Water, Crandall creek and the east fork of the Yellowstone. The party laid over here to examine the country. In the forenoon of the first day after they arrived a band of Indians dashed into camp and drove off all of their horses. The party now cached their things and went across the mountains to the agency. They chose and went on a trail impassable for horses and arrived tired out and willing to rest. The stream on which they cached their things now bears the name of Cache creek. They told their tale at the agency and expressed their intention of going back. Some others concluded to go with them and Sam Shively, Pat O'Hara, Banks, Parker, Dutch Bill, with all of the original party but Bart Henderson went up the Boulder to the divide, and along that to where the ore had been found. They went to work at once and a vein of argentiferous galena was soon found by Horn Miller. Several lodes were discovered and staked this fall, but the locality being very high (10,000 feet above the sea level), snow soon came and drove the prospectors out. (Topping's Chronicle.)

The Lost Cabin mine in the Big Horn region was among the first finds in eastern Montana. According to information contained in a dispatch from Billings, December 22, 1883, a prospector named Jack Myer rediscovered the bed of the Lost Cabin mine which is immensely rich. It is located near the headwaters of the Big Horn river. This mine was discovered early in territorial times by three old-timers. Two of them were murdered by Indians and the survivor became insane, and could never trace the trail. Since then the discovery had passed into territorial tradition. The lode is reported to cut the river at a point where the surface indications show a width of 320 feet and a hight of sixty feet. Myer claims to have trailed the lode twenty-five miles, and in places found it 600 feet wide. It is free-milling quartz, and every pan shows prospects. Myer, his father, and uncle from Minnesota have gone to the claim to develop it.

The discoveries in Choteau county, made in the fall of 1884, and recorded in the spring of 1885, are among the new "finds," and the first in that part of the Territory.

The number of gold mills in operation in the Territory in August, 1864, was fourteen, of which ten were steam mills; the number of stamps employed was 195, with several arastras all valued at $500,000. The number of ditches was seven, fifty-four miles in length, constructed at a cost of $126,000.

Twenty years after this estimate was made mills and ditches are found in almost every gulch in the Territory. The mining centers in 1884 are named in the following list:

The act relating to the discovery of gold and silver quartz leads, lodes, or lodges, and of the manner of their location, was approved December 26, 1864. A few days later the bill providing for the prevention of counterfeiting was approved December 31, 1864. This act contains but two sections. The act approved January 12, 1872, to provide for the forfeiture to the Territory of placer mines held by aliens was so opposed to ordinary legislative measures known in the United States, that it was repealed by the legislature of 1873–4, and the act of repeal approved in January. Other acts for the government of miners have been passed since 1864, by the legislature; but the fundamental laws regulating mining property have had their origin in congress; and come from that body. Among these laws the principal is that section of the General Land Act dealing with mineral claims, which permits the entry of tracts of land in the mineral belt under certain conditions. Another act provides for the annual representation of all mineral locations. Where no work is done within a year from the time of location, the claim is subject to relocation. The annual expenditure of $100 on each mineral claim is a necessity. But the law is violated very frequently and in the following manner: A lead is discovered and a record of its location made. No work is done upon it, but when the time of legal representation expires the owner "jumps" his own lode and relocates under another name. He can have it recorded for $2.50 or $3.00, and is out just that much per year on his prospect hole.

The yield of the precious metals, from data obtained of the amount shipped and taken out of the Territory up to and including the year 1869, and from estimates from reliable sources from that date to the end of the year 1878, and including the product of gold quartz since 1864, and the silver since 1874, has been as follows:

" 1863	8,000,000
" 1864	16,000,000
" 1865	18,000,000
" 1866	17,500,000
" 1867	16,300,000
" 1868	15,000,000
" 1869	11,200,000
" 1870	9,000,000
" 1871	8,000,000
" 1872	7,000,000
" 1873	5,200,000
" 1874	4,000,000
" 1875	4,100,000
" 1876	4,500,000
" 1877	3,750,000
" 1878	5,867,000
" 1879	4,500,000
" 1880	4,702,636
" 1881	4,960,000

Shipments not enumerated, bring the value of total product for that time up to $200,000,000. The increasing importance of quartz mining in Montana can best be judged from the yield during the past ten years, which was in 1875 $2,200,000; in 1876, $3,000,000; in 1877, $3,200,000; in 1878, $4,000,000; in 1879, $4,500,000; in 1880, $5,250,000; in 1881, $6,500,000; in 1882, $8,000,000; in 1883, $12,000,000—and the product of 1884 is believed to have been about $20,000,000. The placers of Montana yielded between $800,000 and $1,000,000 during the year 1884.

After this first movement of bullion, offices were opened at Virginia City, Deer Lodge and Helena, and subsequently the assayer was found in every mining district.

The value of gold and silver bullion deposited at the United States Assay Office at Helena, from January 1, 1877, to June 30, 1883, are given as follows:

YEAR.	GOLD.	SILVER.
1877	$379,481 18	$241,197 12
1878	298,681 77	404,567 98
1879	512,809 15	175,732 93
1880	495,155 19	97,924 60
1881	570,536 68	98,714 04
1882	678,935 33	91,013 16
Six months ending June 30, 1883	246,811 30	17,047 57
Total	$3,182,400 55	$1,126,193 40
Estimate for balance of year	467,000 00	74,000 00
	3,749,400 55	1,200,193 40

Assay Office.—So early as 1867 the question of the rights of Montana to a branch mint was discussed. This discussion was continued through 1868, when the matter was brought before the Legislature and a joint memorial to Congress adopted asking for an appropriation for the establishment of a branch mint within this territory. This memorial was approved December 31, 1868, and forms the first important subject in the history of the Assay Office. For this reason, and on account of the plain statement of fact contained therein, it is quoted as follows:

"We, your memorialists, the council and house of representatives of the territory of Montana, in legislative assembly convened, would most respectfully but earnestly represent to your honorable body, that during the last five years this country has produced and thrown into the channels of commerce, immense quantities of the precious metals, gradually increasing from year to year, until, in the year 1867, according to the most reliable statistics, gold dust and bullion to the amount of twenty-four million dollars, in coin, have been produced, and it is confidently expected that the yield of the present year, 1868, will greatly exceed that of 1867, and that the cost of transportation of gold dust and bullion in bars, together with the difference in the cost of assaying, between private individuals and the United States, amounts to eight per cent of the product of our mines, thereby entailing an annual expense on our citizens of upwards of one million and a half of dollars, which would be obviated by the establishment of a branch mint at some convenient point in our territory. Your memorialists would also most respectfully represent to your honorable body, that, owing to the application of capital and machinery, now being resorted to by our citizens, for the working of our placer mines, the annual yield of gold from this source will not decrease during the next ten years."

This memorial was followed by others, statistics were poured in, the whole territory was alive to the importance of the question, and, as if in reward for the industry of the applicants, as well as in recognition of the claims of the gold and silver mining industry, the Forty-second Congress passed the act of May 12, 1874, providing for the establishment of an assay office at Helena.

The designs for the building were partly prepared by A. B. Mullet, architect for the Treasury Department, and completed by W. A. Potter, his successor in the office. The supervision of construction was in charge of Major J. E. Blaine, until his resignation to accept another position, when M. A. Meyendorff was appointed superintendent. J. P. Fuller, collector of internal revenue, was appointed disbursing officer or paymaster. The foundations were excavated under the supervision of Hugh Kirkendall, and the stone work was placed in charge of Daniel Steele.

The corner stone of the assay office was placed in position October 1, 1875. In it was deposited a letter with the signature of the governor and officers of the territory: The act of congress May 12, 1874, established the office; photograph of the proposed building taken from prospective drawing; proceeding of the Grand Masonic Lodge of Montana; laws of Helena R.A. Chapter, of King Solomon's Lodge No. 9, of Helena Lodge No. 3, of Morning Star Lodge; copies of the Herald, Independent, New Northwest, Avant Courier, Missoulian, Montanian, Madisonian, Record and News, newspapers then published in Montana; coins and currency of the United States. The officers of the Grand Lodge in whose charge was the event of the day, were E. S. Stackpole, G.M.; H. R. Comly, D.G.M.; John Stedman, S.G.W.; C. A. DeWitt, J.G.W.. John Shober, G.T.; Cornelius Hedges, G.S.; E. L. Toy, G.C.; W. F. Sanders, G. Orator, and David Steel, G.P.A. The procession was marshalled by James W. Hathaway, Grand Marshal and C. M. Jefferies, D.G. Marshal. The oration was delivered by Colonel W. F. Sanders, and in one of those brilliant talks of his, he did not neglect to bring to the minds of his hearers the efforts of delegates Cavanaugh, Claggett and Maginnis and the press to obtain for the territory this important office, or to notice the part which statistics, compiled by W. F. Wheeler and other citizens, had in attracting the attention of congress.

A year after the corner stone was placed in position the office was ready for business, and was opened within a short time. The building as it now stands has cost the sum of $36,556.98, leaving a balance of $1,490.80 to be used in the proper conveyance of water, beautifying the grounds, etc.—total amount of appropriation being $38,047.78. The further sum of $14,000 has been expended in building a vault, providing furniture and securing apparatus for the assay and melting departments. The silver balance introduced in 1879 cost $3,000. Since 1879 the grounds have been laid off, many improvements effected, and one of the most complete offices of this character given to Montana. The recent amendment of regulations, governing assay offices, was made known in the following circular letter of Director Horatio C. Burchard, under date December 9, 1882:

"Sir,—Inclosed you will find a copy of an amendment of the regulations of 1881 in relation to the transactions of business at the mints and assay offices, which goes into effect on the first of January next. On and after that date no charge will be imposed by you upon deposits of gold bullion for the cost of transportation to the mint for coinage. You will collect of such depositors on each deposit, in addition to your own charge for melting, assaying and stamping, the full charges which would be imposed on the deposit at the New York assay office, which, in addition to the charge per ounce for parting and refining, includes a charge of one dollar on each deposit of 1,000 ounces or less, as regarded by the regulation."

The office is presided over by Russell B. Harrison. The staff comprises M. A. Meyendroff, melter; L. A. Walker, chief clerk; W. D. Wheeler, deposit clerk, and H. B. Wilkins, Jr., clerk. The assistant assayers are F. A. Greenleaf, W. E. Sharp and G. R. Metten. Geo. W. White, and John W. Allen are assistant melters. The positions of janitor and night watchman are filled by Patrick Quinn and John P. Donaldson respectively.

Previous to the opening of the United States assay office at Helena, this department of mining was in the hands of private assayers. In the earlier stages of mining the product of placer and quartz mines was shipped to Portland and sometimes to Salt Lake to have an assay made. This fact is established by the following copy of a memorandum of the first assay of Montana gold:

Memorandum of Gold Bullion deposited at the assay office of Tracy & King, Portland, Oregon.—At Portland, 11th day of July, 1862, by Failings & Hatch.

No. of Deposit.	Before Melting.	After Melting.
244.	5.99 oz.	5.81 oz.
Fineness.	Value.	Commission.
881.	105.81.	2.40.

TRACY & KING.

This bullion was purchased by Worden & Co., who shipped it to Failings & Hatch for assay, and was the first Montana gold placed directly before an assayer.

The copper interests of Butte were first developed in 1875, and are mostly represented by the following leads, all rich in copper. Foremost of these is the Gagnon, owned by Colonel J. C. C. Thornton, John Rosenfeld, Joel W. Ransom and others. The original, owned by W. A. Clark, and the La Plata, owned by Jones, Talbot, Downs & Leary. The ores from these leads are purchased at the mines by parties who buy them for shipment east for reduction. But these and other ores containing forty per cent copper have been successfully reduced by the Hecla Consolidated Mining Company, at Glendale, producing argentiferous copper matte suitable for profitable shipment even at the present high rates of freight. The mines at Copperopolis in Meagher county produce ores with a large percentage of copper, which are shipped east by way of the Missouri river. In 1883 the great Anaconda and St. Lawrence were worked. These mines are among the finest in the whole world. (See Anaconda.)

Galena lodes carrying silver were found at Argenta, in 1864, which caused the first silver excitement in the territory. The silver mines of Phillipsburgh were discovered in 1865, and mills at great expense have been built there to work the ores of the Speckled Trout, Hope and Northwestern companies' mines. Valuable silver lodes outcrop west and south of Helena, on Ten-Mile, Prickly Pear and Boulder, and for the reduction of the ores of which smelters, furnaces and mills were erected at Helena, Clancy, Jefferson and Wicks, and at Vipond. The great reduction works of the Montana Company, at Wicks, erected at a cost far above one hundred thousand dollars, is yielding a rich return from the silver ores of the Boulder. When all the districts are supplied with mills, smelters and works for reducing the various kinds of ores, the annual silver product of Montana will be second only to that of Nevada.

There are indications of heavy nickel deposits reported in the southwestern and western districts of the territory, but no attempt to develop nickel mines has yet been made.

The part taken by the territorial government in 1874–6, for setting forth the mineral and other products of Montana at the Centennial Exposition, as well as that taken by the United States government, in 1884, are referred to in the following official announcements:

The House concurrent resolution in relation to the Centennial Exhibition, was approved February 13, 1874, substantially as follows:—That the sum of five thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the territorial treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense of packing and transporting such articles as, in the judgment of the persons hereafter named, are appropriate and worthy to be exhibited at the International Exhibition, to be held in the city of Philadelphia, in 1876, and to defray the expenses of arranging such departments as may be assigned to the territory of Montana, at said exhibition by the managers thereof, and that the Territorial Auditor be, and is hereby, authorized to draw his warrants on the territorial treasurer in favor of William H. Claggett, Patrick A. Largey, and Emma Bowen, or any one of them upon the order of two of them, at such time or times as they may request, and in such sum or sums as they may desire, so that in the aggregate the foregoing sum is not exceeded, and the parties aforesaid accupying relations of trust in various capacities to said exposition and the connection of this territory therewith, this resolution shall be interpreted and held to insure to the successors of the parties aforesaid, in said trust, or any of them for the uses and purposes aforesaid.

The President of the United States, under date of September 10, 1883, issued a proclamation, under joint resolution of Congress, inviting representation and participation of all foreign nations in the World's Exposition. To represent the interests of the territory of Montana, John S. Harris, of Helena, was appointed Commissioner, and William A. Clark, of Butte, alternate. The following gentlemen were appointed county commissioners: Lewis and Clarke county, Thomas C. Power and G. C. Swallow, Helena; Jefferson, John Longmaid, Wickes, Nathan Merriman, Jefferson City; Gallatin, George O. Eaton, Cooke, S. W. Langhorn, Bozeman; Meagher, Louis Rotwitt, White Sulphur Springs, A. M. Esler. Maiden; Choteau, T. E. Collins and Jere Sullivan, Benton; Yellowstone, P. W. McAdow and Colonel L. Whitney, Billings; Custer, Samuel Gordon and Charles H. Gould, Miles City; Dawson, David O. Mead and George R. Tingle, Glendive; Silver Bow, R. B. Wallace and H. C. Kessler, Butte; Deer Lodge, F. D. Brown, Phillipsburgh, J. C. Savery, Cable; Missoula, W. E. Bass, Stevensville, F. H. Woody, Missoula; Beaverhead, B. F. White, Dillon, H. Kippenburg, Glendale; Madison, C. L. Dahler and Henry Elling, Virginia City. John B. Reed, of Butte, was appointed to collect industrial statistics and report thereon.

Reminiscences.—From the beginning of the mining industry in Montana to the present time the custom of conferring names, characteristic of the individval, has been observed. In the history of the Vigilantes these peculiar names are found, such as, Red, Dutch John, etc., etc. During the stay of Indian Agent Wells in the Jocko valley he compiled a partial list of such names, from which list the following examples are taken:

Ace of Spades,	Cayuse George,	Joe Smith,	Snapping Andy.
Wild Goose Bill,	Big Drink Jim,	Six-Toed Pete,	Cayote George,
Bamboo Chief,	Dirty Ike,	Yeast Powder Dick,	Hell Roaring Jack,
Sour Dough Tom,	Coffee Pot Tom,	Cross Road Jack,	Poker Bill.
Moccasin Pete,	Jewsharp Jack,	Limber Jim,	Thieving Jack,
Slippery Jim,	Missouri Jim,	Soap,	Catamount Bill,
Jimmy the Wrestler,	Tobacco George,	Hog Harry,	Slap Jack Johnny,
Doughnut Cal,	Slim Jim,	Dutch Joe,	Cocktail Joe,
Hard Hat,	Roachy.	Mush Head Bill,	Dancing Bill,
Ten of Diamonds,	Buffalo Bill,	Portuguese Joe,	Blackfoot Bill,
Pitch Pine Frank,	Coon Skin Jack,	Nebraska Bill,	Black Jack,
Kootenai Dick,	Calusa Bill,	Whisky Bill,	Yankee Bob,
Lying Pike,	Banjo Charley,	Sandy,	Eldorado Johnny,
Moon Eyed Tom,	Soda Bill,	Hurdy Gurdy Tom,	Washoe Bill,
The Bilk,	Shot Gun,	Canary Bird,	Camphene Harry,
Empire Jack,	Hog Back,	Fat Jack,	Old Badger,
Luck Bill from Yamhill,	Indian Joe,	Rat of the Houdan Ranch,	Frenchy,
Pat the Giant Killer,	Ole Harry,	Boxing Tim,	Fra Diavolo, etc.

Many of the owners of these names have "passed in their checks," and "gone over the range."

Primitive Mining Machinery,—Now let us inquire into the primitive methods of mining; for they were primitive, even when the mines of Gold creek were first opened. Argonaut gives us an insight into the methods employed. Those who have seen mining for gold carried on only by the powerful "Little Giant" on placers, and the costly stamp mills of the present day can hardly conceive the disadvantages under which the early-day miner of the Pacific coast labored. When Marshall picked up the shining metal in digging the tail race for General Sutten's saw-mill at Coloma, California, in 1848, the astonished pioneers knew as little about extracting the precious particles from the immense bars of sand and gravel about them as they did of Chinese classics. There were millions in the beds, bars and banks of every stream, the ravines, gulches and canons abounded in treasure. A mere accident had discovered its existence; but it was not accident that taught the eager gold-seekers the best means of obtaining it. The common pan was first brought into requisition, and fortunes were made in mining with this very simple utensil. It was no uncommon thing, as late as 1851–52, to see a greaser with his pan and knife prying among the rocks on the river bank for chispas. As soon as lumber could be obtained the rocker was made. As early as the fall of 1849 nearly every mining company possessed one of these invaluable machines. The less fortunate were content with a short log (hollowed out by an axe or burned out by fire), under which the rockers were rudely fastened, and made to do fair service in separating the gold from the auriferous gravel. But the man with the rocker made of boards, with screen and riffles complete, was an aristocrat in mountain mining circles, and if he owned two rockers he was soon to be elected Alcalde of the Bar, an officer from whose decision there was no appeal. The rockers soon passed their day, for early in the spring of 1850 the pretentious Georgia Bumper made its appearance. This was simply a huge rocker, which required the power of one man to keep it in motion. It derived its name from the fact that its oscillating motion was purposely suddenly checked by blocks of wood against which the ends of the rockers bumped, thus causing a jar, which prevented the sand from baking between the riffles. As quicksilver, which, by the way, was worth $6 per pound, was generally used with these machines, the result was that about as much gold was "bumped" out with the quicksilver as was retained in the riffles. But they were considered in their day an immense affair, and it was hard to make the average miner believe that the owner of two or three "bumpers" did not possess all the requisite qualifications of a first-class congressman.

In the winter of 1850 and 1851 an inventive miner of Nevada City made what was then considered a grand strike in the direction of the perfect in mining appliances. After weary hours of mental, as well as physical, labor he built and put in successful operation the "Long Tom." This was really an improvement over the rocker and bumper, and the latter were never again used where the Long Tom could be obtained and worked. It was a simple contrivance, merely an inclined box with side boards six to eight inches high, and low cross-bars two or three inches deep extending from one side of the box to the other. Over all a perforated plate of sheet-iron was placed, which received the gravel and water from a long inclined sluice or box into which the water was conducted and the dirt and gravel thrown. A man stood upon, or on one side of, the perforated iron and shoveled off such rock and gravel as could not pass through the screen. The gold, sand and smaller particles of gravel passed down upon the riffles, where the metal sank and the lighter material was washed off by the action of the water. It was supposed when the "Long Tom" made its appearance that the great desideratum for the miner had been reached, and that it was useless to pursue further investigations looking to the improvement of mining appliances, but one by one other boxes were added, with cross-bars or "Hungarian" riffles placed within them, and, as no gold reached the "Tom," it was finally laid aside, and the string of sluice boxes on "horses" succeeded the former clumsy appliances. This change was effected in the years 1852 and 1853, and miners appeared to feel satisfied with their means for working the rich placers. Up to this time it was thought that all gold-bearing gravel or dirt must be washed in rockers, bumpers, or tightly-corked sluice boxes. But in '54 it was found that gold could be saved in a ground sluice, and where the fall was sufficient to admit of this mode of mining it was adopted. Much more dirt could be disposed of, and no lifting power was required to subject it to the washing process. A great deal had been gained. Square rods of "placers" could be washed where heretofore only square feet were disposed of. The little rocker and sluices were still used to some extent in some localities, but the "bumper" and "Long Tom" were left to crumble and decay upon the huge piles of tailings, or permitted to be covered with "slickens." In the meantime ditches had been constructed to convey water to the principal surface mining districts in the country. With this distribution of water the shallow places soon yielded up their treasure, and the deeper diggings were attacked. To work these successfully required a still further advance in the science of mining. This advance was made with the substitution of the hose and pipe for ground sluicing. With the inauguration of hydraulic mining commenced the washing away of large banks and mountains of auriferous gravel. To facilitate its work tunnels were run into immense deposits of gold-bearing gravel, and blasts composed of from one hundred and fifty to three hundred kegs of powder discharged thereon to shatter and break up the tenacious bodies of ground. It will thus be seen that great improvements have been made in placer mining during the last third of a century. The pan, the rocker, the bumper, the Long Tom, the sluice and the hydraulic have succeeded each other in the order named.

While all the former modes of surface mining were considered complete in their day, each was compelled to give way to a superior mode. There is probably no mining appliance which is associated with so many pleasant reminiscences of the aged pioneer of the Pacific slope as the Little Rocker.

The Prospector.—The prospector came with the crowd, and was soon among the mountains searching for the golden treasure which his hopes founded. As a rule the prospectors are the poorest of men. With scanty food and clothing they go into the deep hills and endure hardships which ordinary mortals cannot comprehend; sometimes they bring discoveries so vast that in their wake cities are built and thousands and tens of thousands of people receive benefits. Prospecting is an accomplishment which very few men understand, and which comes from a gift as distinct as the gift to paint a picture. In their habits they may be compared to the poet, who toils and suffers without being thoroughly awake to his position. Always looking forward to a rich find, sometimes striking one, they generally allow the golden harvest to be garnered by other hands; while themselves go on from year to year giving new work for enterprise to do, and indeed keeping every mining camp within the territory in perpetual fear of some new discovery, or of some sweeping stampede.

CHAPTER VII.

ORGANIC AND POLITICAL.

LONG years before the French missionaries discovered the Upper Lake region, Ferdinand De Soto discovered the Mississippi at the mouth of the Washita. Before his death in May, 1542, the year of this discovery, he claimed the valley of the Mississippi, and the valleys of all its tributaries for the Spanish king. This title was unquestioned only for a short time. Although the Spanish viceroys essayed to place settlements along this river and by the Pacific coast, above California, and did succeed in effecting temporary settlements, the discovery of the Lake region and of the Mississippi by the French, afforded some protest for claiming the country for France. In 1665, Father Allouez called a meeting of the tribes on the shores of Lake Superior. All the lake and Mississippi tribes were there, and to them the priest promised the protection of France. In 1671, Father Marquette and Perrot made similar promises, while on April 9, 1682, La Salle dedicated the Mississippi from its mouth to its source to France and named it La Reviere Colbert. The immense territory covered by the Spanish title was claimed by Charles I. as a portion of his kingdom in 1540, under the name of Florida. In 1542, De Soto discovered the mouth of the Mississippi, and the knowledge of the kingdom of Florida was extended. The explorer La Salle came forty years later to claim the country for the French king, and named it the province of Louisiana. England, by the Asiento Contract, acquired the right of sending negro slaves to Spanish America. In 1703, France had issued permits for settlement, notwithstanding the fact that the Spanish claim was strengthened by the Bull of 1693, promulgated by Pope Alexander VI.; but this measure was sanctioned by the cession of land along the Gulf, by Spain to France in acknowledgment of Louis XIV. services in securing Philip on the throne. The papal document provided that Spain should possess all the New World west of a line, drawn north and south, one hundred leagues west of the Azores, while Portugal should claim the country east of such imaginary line. The discoveries made by Sebastian Cabot, while in the employment of the British king, gave rise to new claims by Great Britain, and thus was forged that chain of international complications which led to the premature proprietary of the region by the United States. The mutations of the territory since the presentation of that part of it, lying between Mexico and Florida to Louis XIV, are well told in the following sketch from the files of the Montana Historical Society: In

W. Eglen Smith

BUTTE.

1712, Antoine, de Crozat received a grant from Louis XIV. of the privilege of trading in the country. In his proclamation, after reciting the advantages to be derived from developing the commerce of the countries known by the name of the province of Louisiana, he says: "We have resolved to grant the commerce of the county of Louisiana to the Sieur Antoine Crozat; our counseller, Secretary of the household, crown and revenue and do appoint the said Sieur Crozat, solely to carry on a trade in all the lands, possessed by us, and bounded by New Mexico, and by the lands of the English Carolina, all the establishments, ports, havens, rivers, and principally the port and haven of the Isle Dauphine, heretofore called Massacre; the river of St. Louis, heretofore called Mississippi, from the edge of the sea, as far as the Illinois, together with the river of St. Philip, heretofore called the Missourys, and of St. Jerome, heretofore called Ouabache, with all the countries, territories, lakes, within land, and the rivers which fall directly or indirectly into that part of the river St. Louis." He was "given the right to dig all sorts of mines, veins and minerals throughout the whole extent of the county of Louisiana paying as in lieu a fifth part of the gold and silver which the said Sieur Crozat shall transport to France." He was also permitted to search for "precious stones and pearls" and was to pay a fifth part to Louis. The grant was to be forfeited in case Crozat ceased work for a period of three years. Whether he succeeded as well as his more modern followers or not is not known; but it is presumed he did not as he surrendered the grant to the crown and abandoned his colony in 1717. In the same year the grant was made to The Company of the West, afterward the Mississippi Commercial Company, on which was based the well known John Law's Mississippi scheme. This was an utter failure, and in ten or fifteen years subsequent the grant was surrendered." About this time Spain ceded to France the Mississippi country in consideration of services rendered by Louis XIV. in securing the throne for Philip; in 1762 France ceded to Great Britain that portion of Louisiana east of the Mississippi, while by the secret treaty, November, 3, 1762, all the French possessions west of the Mississippi were ceded to Spain. The treaty of Madrid, March 21, 1801, provided for the re-cession of Louisiana to France and remained in possession of France (the treaty of April 30, 1803, was ratified by Congress, October 31, 1803), until Governor Clairborne and General Wilkinson took possession of Louisiana December 20, 1803, and the region from Mexico north to the forty-ninth deg. north latitude, and from the Mississippi west to the ocean passed under the control of the United States.

By authority of an act of Congress, approved March 26, 1804, the newly acquired territory was, on the 1st day of October following, divided: that part lying south of the 33d parallel of north latitude was called the Territory of Orleans, and all north of that parallel the District of Louisiana, which was placed under the authority of the officers of Indiana Territory, until July 4, 1805, when it was organized, with territorial government of its own, and so remained until 1812, when the Territory of Orleans became the State of Louisiana, and the name of the Territory of Louisiana was changed to Missouri. On the 4th of July, 1814, that part of Missouri Territory comprising the present State of Arkansas, and the country to the westward, was organized into the Arkansas Territory. On the 2d of March, 1821, the State of Missouri, being a part of the Territory of that name, was admitted to the Union. June 28, 1834, the territory west of the Mississippi river and north of Missouri was made a part of the Territory of Michigan; but two years later, on the 4th of July, 1836, Wisconsin Territory was erected, embracing within its limits the present States of Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota. The Congressional act of June 30, 1834, decreed that all the country west of the Mississippi, not included within the recognized boundaries of Louisiana, Missouri or Arkansas, should be considered Indian Territory, under the jurisdiction of the United States District Court of Missouri.

For three decades after the admission of Missouri as a State the new Northwest was literally without a government. In 1804–6, the expedition of Lewis and Clarke explored it, as told in the history of exploration. From 1813 to 1846 it was a subject which claimed attention from American and British diplomatists annually, and even until recently the question of the northern boundary promised troubles. In 1846 a treaty was signed by the contending powers which fixed 49 deg. north latitude as the northern boundary of the claim of the United States. Meanwhile, since 1848, there had been considerable increase in the American population, settlers chiefly coming from the border slave states; until, at the time of the cession, the whites numbered about ten thousand. But during all the years in which supremacy remained unsettled, the country was held in joint occupancy by both nations, under conventions which were from time to time renewed. Nevertheless no form of civil government existed. In 1845 the inhabitants had already found themselves compelled to adopt a provisional government, and this continued in force until 1848. In this year Oregon Territory was organized by Congress, and in 1849 General Joseph Lane was appointed Governor. By the seventh census of the United States, in 1850, it appeared that the territory embraced 308,052 square miles and had 13,294 inhabitants. Washington Territory was organized in March, 1853. The Nebraska bill received the Presidential indorsement May 30, 1854. The tract embraced 358,558 square miles of territory, extending from the 40th parallel of north latitude to the Canadian possessions on the north; and from the Missouri river on the east to the summit of the Rocky mountains on the west. The erection of the Territory of Colorado, February 28, 1868, decreased the area by 16,035 square miles; and the creation of the Territory of Dakota, March 2, 1867, further diminished the area by 228,907 square miles. At one time, a triangular tract of 15,378 square miles was attached from Washington and Utah Territories, lying on the southwest slope of the Rocky mountains, north of the 41st parallel and east of the 110th meridian; but this was afterward included in the 45,999 square miles which went to form the Territory of Idaho, March 3, 1863. Thus a large portion of Montana belonged to Nebraska Territory up to 1863, when Idaho was organized, and still a larger portion up to the date of the organization of Montana. Governor Francis Burt was the first Governor of Nebraska.

Of the first named Territory, Idaho, Isaac I. Stevens was commissioned Governor. He came the same year in command of the first expedition for the exploration of the Northern Pacific railroad route. Of his party, C. P. Higgins, F. H. Burr and Thomas Adams became citizens of Missoula county. The legislature of the New Territory erected the county of Clarke, extending from Fort Vancouver to the main divide, and included Missoula county. Clarke county was subdivided and Skamania county was established on its eastern side. Walla Walla county next took in Western Montana, then Spokane county, and on December 14, 1860, Missoula county was erected out of the eastern towns of Spokane, with the seat of justice at Hell's Gate road, where Worden & Co.'s trading post stood. As then organized it embraced the present counties of Missoula and Deer Lodge, west of the summit of the main range.

Idaho Territory was organized March 3, 1863, and to this new Territory the present counties of Missoula, Deer Lodge and northern portion of Beaverhead belonged. The first council of Idaho erected Missoula county as it is known to-day, and established the seat of justice at Wordensville. The remaining western counties were also reorganized, with Bannack and Virginia City the leading political and commercial centers, while east of the main range was still unorganized territory.

Montana Territory was organized under act of Congress, approved May 26, 1864, and amended March 2, 1867. In 1873 a portion of the old territory of Dakota was added to Montana, and thus the act of establishment and organization was completed. The organic act, amendment, and notice of addition of country to Montana are fully treated in the following abstract of an act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana:

"That all that part of the territory of the United States included within the limits, to-wit: Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the twenty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington, with the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; thence due west on said forty-fifth degree of latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the thirty-fourth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence due south along the said thirty-fourth degree of longitude to its intersection with the forty-fourth degree and thirty minutes of north latitude; thence due west along said forty-fourth degree and thirty minutes of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the crest of the Rocky mountains, thence following the crest of the Rocky mountains northward till its intersection with the Bitter Root mountains; thence northward along the crest of said Bitter Root mountains to its intersection with the thirty-ninth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence along said thirty-ninth degree of longitude northward to the boundary line of the British possessions; thence eastward along said boundary line to the twenty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington; thence southward along said twenty-seventh degree of longitude to the place of beginning be, and the same is, hereby created into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Montana: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to inhibit the government of the United States from dividing said Territory or changing its boundaries in such manner and at such time as congress shall deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion of said Territory to any other State or Territory of the United States: Provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property now pertaining to the Indians in said Territory so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to include any territory which, by treaty with any Indian tribes, is not, without the consent of said tribe, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries, and constitute no part of the Territory of Montana, until said tribe shall signify their assent to the President of the United States to be included within said Territory, or to effect the authority of the government of the United States to make any regulations respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, by treaty, law, or otherwise, which it would have been competent for the government to make if this act had never passed.

"That the executive power and authority in and over said Territory of Montana shall be vested in a governor, who shall hold his office for four years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States. The governor shall reside within said Territory, and shall be commander-in-chief of the militia and superintendent of Indian affairs thereof. He may grant pardons and respites for offenses against the laws of said Territory, and reprieve for offenses against the laws of the United States, until the decision of the President of the United States can be made known thereon; he shall commission all officers who shall be appointed to office under the laws of said Territory, and shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed," etc., etc.

An amendatory act was passed March 2, 1867.

The Congressional act of February 17, 1873, readjusting the western boundary of Dakota Territory, created a few changes in the areas of Madison and Beaverhead counties. The country ceded was the strip east and west of a continuation of the boundary line between Madison and Beaverhead, south from the recognized southern limits of the territory to the new south line of the territory, and from the line of Idaho to Wyoming. On each county was bestowed the portion of such added territory as lay due south of and extended along its old southern limits by the Territorial Legislative act of February 7, 1874.

The establishment of the older counties of Montana was performed under the organic act of 1864. By the act of the Territorial Legislature approved February 2, 1865, their boundaries were defined and organization authorized. The territory not included within the boundaries named in this act was created a county under the title Big Horn county, and was attached to Gallatin for legislative and judicial purposes. The organization of Meagher, Custer, Silver Bow, Dawson, Yellowstone and Fergus is the result of latter day legislation. The establishment and organization of each of the fourteen counties, forming the Territory, belong to local history, and will be dealt with in the history of these counties.

Political History.—In the chapters devoted to early history and the origanic history of Montana, the story of its political mutations is told more fully. For years succeeding the acquisition of the new northwest, and long after the State of Missouri was organized, this immense territory, extending from the Mississippi to the Pacific, was literally governed by the fur traders, and wholly unacquainted with the laws of the United States. After the organization of Oregon a faint attempt was made to introduce laws into that portion of the Territory known as Missoula and Dear Lodge counties, but owing to the rule of the Jesuit Fathers there, the new law was a dead letter; it had no wrongs to right or disputes to settle. Even after the same district formed the eastern county of Washington Territory, the election of county officers only marked the progress of politics. During all those years Oregon and Washington and Montana were scarcely heard of in the old states; but still the attention of politicians reverted to the west.

Travels of the Capital.—The organization of the territory was accomplished at a time when mining enterprises were spreading out from Bannack and immigration was seeking employment east and west of the main range of mountains. Bannack was not the only commercial center in 1864. Virginia City was a younger rival. This rivalry sprung up to a contest between the citizens of these respective villages, for the honors and emoluments which the seat of government was considered to carry with it. There was no appeal to the vote of the people, as, under section 12 of the Organic Act the governor had full authority to locate the first capital. This power he exercised in favor of Bannack, and there the first legislature of Montana passed those private and public laws which mark the beginning of Montana's political existence.

The removal of government offices from the first capital of the territory to Virginia City was carried out under the following act, approved February 7, 1865:

The seat of government of the territory of Montana shall be and the same is hereby located at the city of Virginia, in the county of Madison. The actual site of said capitol buildings shall be within the corporate limits of the city of Virginia, and the ground for the same shall be selected by three commissioners, to-wit: George Christman of Bannack City; R. B. Parrott, of Virginia City, and W. F. Sanders, of Virginia City, who shall have power to perfect a title for the same at a cost of not more than two hundred dollars; and the grounds so selected by a majority of said commissioners shall be the site of the seat of government for this territory. The commissioners shall within ninety days after the adjournment of the present legislature meet at the city of Virginia and proceed to select the ground, as prescribed in the previous section, and shall make a statement of the same, under oath, which with other papers relating thereto shall be placed on file in the office of the secretary of the territory. The commissioners shall be allowed the sum of ten dollars each per day while engaged in locating said capitol grounds, and thirty cents per mile in traveling to and from the city of Virginia on said business, and that one week be allowed for said purpose, which said money shall be paid out of the treasury of the territory from moneys not otherwise appropriated. All the civil officers of this territory whose residences are required by law to be at the seat of government hereby established, and all the officers of this territory who are required to keep their offices at the seat of government, are required to move their offices to the said seat of government at the earliest practicable time.

The act of the legislature approved December 14, 1866, gave material recognition to the claims of the present capital of the territory. It provided that the question of permanently locating the seat of government in and for Montana territory, shall be submitted to a vote of the qualified voters of the territory at the annual election to be holden on the first Monday of September, A.D., 1867. If a majority of all the votes cast shall designate the city of Helena as the seat of government, it shall be, by proclamation of the governor, so decided; or if a majority so voting shall designate the city of Virginia, in Madison county, Montana territory, the governor, by proclamation, shall so declare it, and the place receiving the highest number of votes shall be the seat of government. The election confirmed Virginia City in its possession of the capitol.

The act to locate the seat of government in and for the territory of Montana, as passed January 24, 1865, was amended in the act approved January 2, 1869, as follows:

That the seat of government in and for the territory of Montana, be, and the same is hereby located at the town of Helena, Lewis and Clarke county, Montana territory. That the question of locating the seat of government in and for Montana Territory, shall be submitted to a vote of the qualified voters of the territory, at the annual election to be holden on the first Monday of August, A.D. 1869. If a majority of all the votes cast shall designate the town of Helena as the seat of government, it shall be by proclamation of the governor so declared, or if a majority so voting shall designate the city of Virginia, Madison county, Montana, as the seat of government, the governor shall issue his proclamation accordingly.

The result of this election, or rather the canvass of the votes, created much excitement throughout the territory, owing to the claims put forward by the people east of the main range that the vote was in favor of locating the capital at Helena.

In September, 1869, the houses of Helena were placarded with large posters bearing the following notice:

Lost, Strayed or Stolen! The Seat of Government. A liberal reward will be paid for its return to Helena. No questions asked.

LAST CHANCE.

Five years later the Capital Question was revived, and the act of February 11, 1874, locating the seat of Government, placed the matter before the people for their decision. The election of August, 1874, followed, the history of which is given in the following letter:

VIRGINIA CITY, MONTANA,

To his Excellency, Governor Benjamin F. Potts, Governor of Montana.

SIR,—Having been designated by law to canvass the votes cast at the last August election in this territory, on the election of Delegate to Congress and on the approval or disapproval of the Capital Law Act, together with the secretary of the territory, which canvass was to be made in your presence, we, the secretary and myself, met in your office on September 2, opened and counted the votes given in the supposed returns received from the several county clerks, as laid before us by the secretary, which were as follows:

County.	Approval of Law.	Disapproval of Law.	County.	Approval of Law.	Disapproval of Law.
Choteau	101	—	Missoula	967	216
Meagher	29	561	Deer Lodge	532	1,123
Lewis & Clarke	1,936	28	Beaverhead	13	235

Apparent majority for d'sapproval.....152 votes.

The Gallatin county return was rejected because the county clerk had not made it in conformity with the requirements of law. In other respects the return was genuine, and the vote cast for "Capital Law Approved" was 96, and for "Capital Law Disapproved" 551. It was probably the duty of the secretary at that time to send to Gallatin county by messenger, the same as the law requires in case no return had been received from that county, and procure a return of the votes as canvassed by the county canvassers, in the form required by law. No motion was made to that effect, however. When the return from Meagher county was opened and read, I objected because I was instantly satisfied that the number of votes in the returns had been exactly reversed, and knew, from outside information, that "Capital Law Approved" had received 561 votes, and "Capital Law Disapproved" had received 29 votes. I immediately moved for an adjournment of our canvass until a messenger could be sent (I offered to go myself) to Meagher county and verify the return before us by the record, and procure a true return, and said that on this question I voted Yes. The secretary answered that we could not adjourn the canvass, because this was the thirtieth day after the election. Judge Spratt stepped forward, and said, as attorney for Virginia city, that we would be functus officio after that day. Thus seeing that I could not get an adjournment at this time, and it appearing that the return was, on its face, in the signatures attached, and the seals affixed, apparently genuine, I made a separate certificate of the vote given in the above table, as appeared by the above returns before us, but in my certificate I embodied my protest against the return from Meagher county, because I then believed the county clerk had made an error in his return, and I thought that I had saved my right to get and canvass the true return from Meagher county, and did not then, nor do I now, believe our Board was or is functus officio until the true or actual vote of Meagher county is canvassed by us.

I left for home on the 2d instant, and returned here on Monday, 7th instant, in company with T. E. Collins, the county clerk of Meagher county. On the morning of the 8th instant, with Secretary Callaway, I met in your office. Mr. Collins presented to the secretary a duly certified return of the vote cast at said August election on the capital law question, which showed that the vote cast for "Capital Law Approved" was 561, and for "Capital Law Disapproved" 29, which was exactly the reverse of the figures in the erroneous or fraudulent return opened and counted by us on the 2d instant. At the same time Mr. Collins presented his own affidavit that the return counted by us on the 2d instant was a forgery in its whole body—writing, signatures and seals. Also his own affidavit, together with the affidavits of the several county commissioners of Meagher county, and the Probate Judge, who had made the canvass of the votes of that county, that the purported return counted by us on the 2d instant was fraudulent, in having reversed the figures on the capital law question, and that the true vote as shown by the official record of the canvass and certified by them, was, for "Capital Law Approved" 561 votes, for "Capital Law Disapproved" 29 votes, and that any other return signed by them was a forgery or fraud.

Counsel were present and argued the question as to our right to meet as a Board of Canvassers and canvass the return then presented or not. At the conclusion of the argument for and against, I announced that I was ready, then and there, to correct our count, made on the 2d instant, by counting the vote now presented to us, and on the proof that the first was a forged and fraudulent return, and that the last was the only genuine return presented to us from Meagher county. And I also stated to the secretary that I was perfectly willing to count the vote of Gallatin county, if he would send for and get in due form as required by law. He answered, that he wanted time to consider the arguments made, and to read the authorities cited before us, and that he should want several days for the purpose. As I was compelled to go to Deer Lodge on official business, he agreed to give me his decision on the 17th, or such other day as I would telegraph I would be in Virginia City. I telegraphed from Helena on the 16th that I would be in Virginia on the 18th, to canvass the vote, on which afternoon I arrived there, and to my surprise saw the announcement in the newspapers that Secretary Callaway had decided that he could not canvass the returns. I immediately addressed him a note asking for a written decision as to whether he would or would not canvass the vote of Meagher county on the returns of Mr. Collins presented to us on the 8th instant. Mr. Callaway responded the following morning.

At the time of the arguments made before us on the 8th inst., Mr. Callaway stated and claimed that we were not sitting as a board of canvassers, although we sat all day in the presence of the Governor to hear the arguments of counsel, and for the purpose of deciding whether we would re-assemble and re-canvass the votes or not. Secretary Callaway having decided not to recount the true, proven returns from Meagher county, I deem it my duty to the people of that county and to the people of Montana to present to you the following as the vote cast by the voters of the several counties of Montana Territory on the question of the approval or disapproval of the "Capital Law" so called, to-wit:

	APPROVED.	DISAPPROVED.		APPROVED.	DISAPPROVED.
Choteau	191	—	Missoula	367	216
Meagher	561	29	Deer Lodge	532	1,123
Lewis & Clarke	1,936	28	Beaverhead	13	235
Jefferson	512	208	Madison	70	1,436

Majority for "Capital Law Approved" 912 votes.

I declare the above to be a true canvass of the votes cast on the 3d day of August, 1874, for and against the approval of the Capital Law as appears by the true and lawful returns made to the Secretary of the Territory of Montana, and respectfully ask on behalf of the people that you issue your proclamation accordingly.

I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. F. WHEELER,

United States Marshal and ex-official member of the Territorial Board of Canvassers.

The applications for writs of mandamus against the Territorial officers, to compel them to remove from Virginia City to Helena, the offices and records of the government of Montana, were heard before Chief Justice Decius S. Wade, and Justices Hiram Knowles and Francis G. Servis, in January, 1875. The proceedings were carried on under the titles Chumasero et al. vs. Potts et al.; Lawrence vs. Hickman; Sanders vs. Starr, and Shober vs. Callaway. Messrs. W. F. Sanders, Chumasero, Chadwick, Johnston and Toole, represented the Relators; while Messrs. S. Ward, J. G. Spratt, H. F. Williams and C. W. Turner represented the Territorial officers: Secretary Callaway and Treasurer Hickman, and H. N. Blake represented Governor Potts and Auditor Starr. The question was fully debated, and resulted in the granting of a mandamus. Chief Justice Wade and Justice Knowles concurring, Justice Servis dissenting. The appeal to the United States Supreme Court by the respondents was dismissed in Feburary, 1876, for want of jurisdiction. The question of the right to re-canvass the vote was brought before the Supreme Court in session at Virginia City, January, 1875, with Judges Wade, Servis and Knowles, presiding. The court declared unanimously in favor of a re-canvass, which was made by Messrs. Callaway and Wheeler, in presence of Governor Potts, who issued his proclamation declaring Helena to be the capital of the Territory. Shortly after the issue of the proclamation, notices were given by the Departments of the change of official quarters to Helena.

Officials.—Sydney Edgerton was appointed first Governor. Indeed, he was absolute ruler of the Territory for some months, and under his directions and authority the first steps were taken to enforce the laws. The Legislature subsequently recognized many of his acts, while discountenancing others. The statement is made on good authority, that owing to a report being circulated regarding the intention of the Governor to canvass the vote of a precinct in the eastern part of the Territory, of which precinct the people in the settlements never heard until the period arrived for the first elections, a committee from the Vigilance society waited upon him, assured him of their purpose to aid him in sustaining the laws of the United States; also informed him of the reports which were circulated regarding this new eastern precinct, and concluded by asserting the right of the vigilantes to resume the actual government of the Territory, should the election returns from the eastern township be signed by him. The first election under the laws of Montana, October 1864, for delegate to Congress, resulted as follows: McLean, 3,808; Upson, 2,422, giving a majority of 1,386 to the democratic candidate. In 1867 Cavanaugh received 6,418 and Sanders 5,178 for delegate to Congress, giving a democratic majority of 8,240 votes.

First Legislature.—The first session of the Legislature of Montana Territory was held at the city of Bannack, December 12, 1864, when the following members of the Council presented their certificates and were sworn in by Lorenzo P. Williston, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the Territory: Frank M. Thompson and Ebenezer D. Lavitt, Beaverhead county; Charles S. Bagg, Robert Lawrence and Anson S. Potter, Madison county; Nathaniel Merriman, Jefferson county; Frank L. Worden, Choteau, Deer Lodge and Missoula counties.

The officers of the Territory were Sidney Edgerton, Governor, Virginia City; General Thomas Francis Meagher, Secretary of the Territory; Hezekiah L. Hosmer, Chief Justice; Lorenzo P. Williston, Associate Justice; Lyman E. Munson, Associate Justice; Edward B. Neally, United States District Attorney; Geo. M. Penney, United States Marshal.

The officers of the Council as organized on December 15, 1864, were Robert Lawrence, President; George Haynes, Secretary; Frank H. Angevine, Assistant Secretary; Robert Hereford, Engrossing Clerk; John C. Ryan, Enrolling Clerk; Harrison G. Otis, Sergeant-at-arms; Harris Gillinan, Doorkeeper; S. Chamberlain, Fireman, and W. P. Edgerton, Page.

Messrs. Thomson, Bagg and Merriman were appointed a committee by the president, on motion of F. M. Thompson to draft rules for the government of the Council.

The Act designating the style of the enacting clause of legislative acts was passed, and approved December 20, 1864.

The joint resolution, approved February 9, 1865, relating to the laws passed at Lewiston, by the first legislature of Idaho, provided

> That all acts or parts of acts, laws or parts of laws, or resolutions of a general nature, which did apply to this portion of said Territory of Idaho before the organization of Montana Territory, under act of organization passed by Congress the twenty sixth day of May, A. D. 1864, dividing said Territory of Idaho, setting off said Montana Territory from said Idaho, defining the duties of the executive, legislative and judicial departments of said temporary government of Montana Territory, are hereby declared by this legislative assembly repealed.

First Divorce.—Councillor Merriman, from the special committee appointed to inquire into a case of matrimonial infelicity, reported December 28, 1864, as follows: "The special committee, to whom was referred Council Bill, No 32,—An act to dissolve the bonds of matrimony existing between Leonard A. Gridley and Marinda E. Gridley, beg leave to introduce an affidavit, and recommend the passage of the bill."

This bill was passed the same day, Councillor Potter alone dissenting, and the first act of divorce was an established fact. This divorce suggested the marriage law as approved

February 6, 1865. The joint resolutions respecting the War for the Union were eloquent in their expression of loyalty to the United States.

The debate in the Legislature relating to the payment of extra salaries to the officers of the Territory, and particularly to a balance due to the Governor, drew forth from General Meagher the following letter, dated at Virginia City, March 19, 1866, addressed to the Speaker:

Mr. Parrott,—Understanding that there is some discussion going on in the house having reference to a payment to me of a balance due the executive office out of the extra pay voted the Governor and other Federal officers by the Legislature of last year, I beg you will be so good as to convey to the house my earnest wish that such discussion should cease. It is anything but pleasant to me to have the public time taken up with a discussion, in which, to some extent, I am personally involved. That in the second place I beg to assure the house, through you, that I do not wish to have a single dollar out of the Territorial fund.

I fully approve, therefore, of the bill which strikes off the Territorial additional for pay of Federal officers, and beg, in conclusion, to suggest that if there is anything legally due the executive office it shall be transferred to the Miners' Hospital at Helena.

This communication may be said to have settled the question of extra pay to United States officers by the people, and proved to the Legislature, if proof were wanting, the true character of the soldier, whose personal affairs were carried into the discussion.

The law for the relief of the poor was approved December 15, 1866.

A petition signed by twenty-six citizens, presented to General Meagher, in January, 1866, asking for a Territorial Convention, was answered by the Acting Governor's proclamation, ordering elections to be held in the counties of Madison, Edgerton and Deer Lodge for ten Conventional Delegates from each county, February 7, 1866, and in the counties of Beaverhead, Gallatin, Jefferson, Missoula and Choteau for five Conventional Delegates to take part in the Territorial Convention; which he ordered to be held at Helena, on March 1, 1866. On January 22, 1866, Governor Meagher gave official notification that the time of holding the Convention was changed from March 1 to February 26, 1866. This Convention considered the question of redistricting the Territory for representation, reducing the expenditures, the amendment of old laws and the introduction of new bills.

In December, 1866, the bill redistricting the Territory passed, and was approved December 13. Another act redistricting the Territory was passed by Congress in 1867, and proclaimed by General Meagher, which was in force until June 25, 1867, when the new Governor issued his proclamation as follows:

HELENA, M. T., June 25, 1867.

Whereas, General Thomas Francis Meagher, Acting-Governor of the Territory of Montana, did on the 15th inst., issue his proclamation redistricting said Territory, according to an act of Congress approved March 2, 1867, and subsequently made certain modifications "concerning the districting and apportioning the representation thereof"; Now, therefore, I, Green Clay Smith, Governor of the Territory of Montana, by virtue of the authority vested in me by law, do hereby district and apportion the representation in the several districts in said Territory as follows: The counties of Madison and Beaver Head shall constitute the first Council District; the counties of Deer Lodge and Missoula, the Second; the counties of Edgerton and Jefferson, the Third; and the counties of Gallatin, Big Horn and Choteau the Fourth District.

Representative Districts were: Madison county, first; Deer Lodge county, second; Beaver Head and Missoula counties, third; Jefferson county, fourth; Gallatin and Big Horn, fifth; Edgerton county, sixth, and Choteau county, seventh. The third, fourth and seventh districts shall be entitled to one member each, the sixth district to four members and the first, second and fifth to two members each.

Thomas Francis Meagher, The second proclamation of Governor Smith, was issued July 3, 1867. The subject was one of sad interest to every intelligent citizen, and the words of the Governor were the echoes of the voices of the people. The proclamation is thus given:

HELENA, M. T., July 3, 1867.—"WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God to take from us by accident our esteemed friend, Secretary (late acting Governor) Thomas Francis Meagher, who was drowned at Fort Benton on the night of the 1st inst., by falling from the steamer G A. Thompson,

Now, therefore, I, Green Clay Smith, Governor of the Territory of Montana, do direct that the headquarters of the military, which were established under his directions and authority in the various districts of the Territory, be draped in mourning for thirty days.

I further request that the offices of the Federal officers of the Territory be likewise draped in mourning for the same length of time.

It is but due to the memory of our deceased friend and fellow officer, that we should hold him in fond remembrance.

He was a man of high social qualities, great urbanity, a high order of intellect, a brave soldier, a true gentleman and an honor to his Territory and Government.

This sad bereavement will be felt by everyone who had the pleasure of his acquaintance throughout the Territory and the nation.

The proclamation of July 5 offered a reward of $1,000 for the recovery and safe delivery of the deceased soldier's body at Fort Benton, St. Louis, or any of the military posts on the Missouri river.

After this official effort to do honor to the late acting Governor, the political life of the Territory returned to its usual state. What with scalp-taking savages at the doors of the executive office, calls for retrenchment and greater expenditures, cries for amendments to the Organic Act on Territorial Statutes, there was little time afforded the legislature or executive for ordinary affairs.

To do honor to General Meagher, who was in reality the first Governor of the Territory, the following review of his life is thus given: Thomas Francis Meagher was born in the city of Waterford, Ireland, August 3, 1823. In 1834 he entered the celebrated college of Clongowes Wood, where he received that education which fitted him in after years to take a leading place in the history of orators and oratory. In 1843 he completed a course of study at the college of Stoneyhurst, Lancashire, England, and returning to his home, soon engaged in the Repeal Movement then being agitated. Then he became associated with Thomas Davis, John Mitchell, Smith O'Brien, Devin Reilly, John Martin, Terence Bellew, McManus, Richard O'Gorman, John Dillon, Doheny, O'Donohue and others less brilliant, but equally patriotic men. Mitchell, speaking of his first meeting with Meagher, in 1843, says: "Next day he came to me at the Nation office; we walked out together toward my house in Upper Leeson street, and out almost into the country near Donnybrook. What talk! What eloquence of talk was his! How fresh and clear and strong! What wealth of imagination and princely generosity of feeling! To me it was the revelation of a new and great nature, and I revelled in it, plunged into it as into a crystal lake." From 1845 to 1848 this young spirit of freedom worked with the Young Ireland Party. In the summer of the last named year he was captured by the British troops while in the act of organizing the peasantry for the defense of their homes, and was tried on a charge of High Treason at Clonmel before a commission appointed to find O'Brien, McManus and the others guilty, and there received his sentence of death. His speech on that occasion came next in magnificence of style to the more fiery one known as the Sword Speech. Owing to the influence brought to bear on the Government to save Smith O'Brien from the hangman, which influence was successful, the sentence was commuted to one of transportation for life to Van Dieman's Land. After a life of nearly four years in that dreary solitude, he surrendered his parole and escaped, arriving at New York in May, 1852, where the Corporation received him on behalf of the citizens. In September, 1855, his law studies under Judge Emmett won for him admission to the New York Bar. Shortly after this he explored Central America, descriptions of which country, from his pen, were published in Harper's Magazine. In 1853 his speeches on The Legislative Independence of Ireland were issued from the Redfield press, New York. April 9, 1856, he issued the first number of the Irish News, he, with the two Lalors and John Savage, being editors. The paper was continued until July, 1860. In 1847, when a banquet was given to the officers of the American Relief ship, Victor, Captain Clark, at Dublin, Meagher proposed the health of the ladies of America, concluding his speech thus: "Should the time come when Ireland will have to make the choice, depend upon it, sir, she will prefer to be grateful to the Samaritan rather than be loyal to the Levite." In after years, when the same Captain Clark met Meagher, after the latter had fought his brigade through the civil war, he said, "General, you have nobly kept the promise you then made." Meagher's record in the civil war is one never equaled for courage and loyalty to the cause of the Union. His testimonials are the enduring love of his name, and the remarkable address from the officers and enlisted men of the Irish Brigade tendered to him in July, 1865, on the occasion of his leaving for Montana.

In July, 1865, Meagher left New York for Montana, and reported his arrival at Virginia City in September, same year. There he found the duties of Governor as well as Secretary devolving upon him, owing to the absence of Governor Sydney Edgerton. He failed not to make known to the people his political convictions, and in doing this addressed a letter to the Democratic Convention held at Helena, February 21, 1866, from which letter the following extracts are made:—"As a Democrat I took the field; as a Democrat went through the war; the war over, I am precisely the same as I was when it broke out. * * * There are few people who can forget, though there may be many who will deny, the delight with which the Democratic support, given to the Republican administration from the outset to the close of the Civil War, was acknowledged by the partisans of the administration." In speaking before the same convention, he answered those who had cast inuendoes against his political integrity:—"On the battle-field, which they had heroically held for four tempestuous years, the soldiers of the south had lowered their colors and sheathed their swords. The spirit in which they had surrendered, as well as the spirit in which they fought, entitled them to respect, honorable consideration, the frank confidence of their adversaries, and the generosity of the colossal power to which they had been forced to capitulate. These are no new sentiments of mine. A few days after Fredericksburg, in December, 1862, I was entertained by New York City, and there, before the greatest Democracy in the world, proposed the toast,—"The heroism of both parties—united they could whip the world." What I said and did during the war, the same am I now prepared to repeat should another rebellion be set on foot and the republic be declared in danger. But the war over, I, for one, will not plant thorns in the graves where the olives have taken root. Here, at all events, here among the great mountains of the New World, no echoes should be awakened save those that proclaimed truthful and glorious peace, the everlasting brotherhood of those who had been foes upon the battle-field, the triumphant reign of industry, and another pillar and crown of gold to the nation that had been restored. In the Divine sacrament of forgiveness, love and patriotism, let them dedicate with an irrevocable pledge, that beautiful and superb domain of theirs to the growth of a stalwart Democracy, the consolidation of liberty with law, the vindication of the Republic against the malevolence of factions, nationality against sectionalism, an enlightened civilization, religion without puritanism, and loyalty without humiliation."

The first official part acted by General Meagher in Montana, was to convoke the Legislature for the purpose of voting supplies. The legitimacy of this act was questioned, but he carried what he begun through, and defended his action subsequently.

Laws of 1867.—The California Practice Act, passed by the Legislature of 1867–8, as the rule of practice for the Territory of Montana, was amended subsequently, on the recommendation of Acting-Governor James Tufts. To him is credited the suggestions to render more practicable the laws providing for the payment of jurors and witnesses, the corporation laws, the amendment of the civil and criminal practice laws, amendment of the school laws, the incorporation of a university, appropriation for historical society, memorializing the general government to establish a geological survey of the territory, memorializing the government to grant aid to the Northern Pacific and the Union Pacific railroads, to create the office of Commissioner of Immigration with station at New York City, for the amendment of the treaty with the Mountain Crows of 1868, so as to vacate their reservation west of longitude 32½ degrees from Washington, to grant a four years' term to members of council and a two years' term to representatives, so as to meet the case of biennial sessions, authorized by the Congress of 1867–8, to memorialize for the amendment of the Organic Act, so as to give the courts of the territory power to recognize the laws of miners' districts; to take action toward the completion of the penitentiary, and to ask Congress to increase the appropriation therefor to $100,000.

Repeal of the Charters.—In the early times of the territory a number of charters were granted by the legislature, under the authority of which many obstacles were placed across trails and bridges, and it was a common thing to charge fabulous prices for toll, for the privilege of passing. So heavy were the burdens imposed upon the people by special charters of this class, it became necessary in 1870 to abolish the system, and the following wholesale repeal act was passed:

That the act to incorporate the Prickly Pear and Virginia City wagon road company, January 24, 1865, be and the same is hereby repealed. That the act to incorporate the little Prickly Pear wagon road company, approved January 19, 1865, be and the same is hereby repealed. That the following other acts, entitled as follows, be and the same are hereby repealed and declared void and of no effect: An act to incorporate the Missouri river and Rocky Mountain wagon road and telegraph company, approved December 27, 1864; an act to authorize Zedekiah A. Stone and his associates, to construct and keep a toll bridge across Beaver Head river, approved January 4, 1865; an act granting to C. R. Bissell and J. E. Bissell the right to build and construct a wagon road, by the most direct route, from Silver Bow to Jefferson river, being located in Deer Lodge and Jefferson counties, beginning at the Silver Bow mines, in Deer Lodge county, and running up the south fork of the Silver Bow or Deer Lodge creek to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, thence by the most direct route to the Jefferson river, approved January 9, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Hell Gage and Deer Lodge wagon road company, approved January 9, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Bitter Root and Kootenay wagon road and ferry company, approved January 12, 1865; also an act to incorporate the Bozeman City and Fort Laramie wagon road and telegraph company, approved January 20, 1865; also an act to incorporate the Bozeman City and Milk river wagon road company, approved January 20, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Madison river ditch company, approved January 24, 1865; also, an act granting to Frank H. Woody, C. E. Irvine, their associates and successors, the right to establish and maintain a ferry or bridge across the Hell Gate river, approved January 24, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Virginia City and Summit City wagon road company, approved January 27, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Nevada City and Red Rock wagon road company, approved January 28, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Montana bridge and ferry company, approved A.D. 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Willow creek town company, approved January 28, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Rams Horn toll road company, approved February 1, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Prickly Pear, Deer Lodge and Silver Bow wagon road company, approved February 2, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Fort Benton and Kootenay wagon road company, approved February 2, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Bear's Tooth wagon road company, approved February 2, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Helena wagon road company, approved February 6, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Grasshopper Canon road company, approved February 7, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Ophir and Flat Head river wagon road company, approved February 8, 1865; also, an act to establish a wagon road from the waters of the Grasshopper creek to Hell Gate, approved February 8, 1865; also, an act to incorporate and establish the Montana and Idaho wagon road company, approved February 8, 1865; also, an act to incorporate the Twin Bridge company, approved February 8, 1865; also, an act entitled an act to re enact an act to authorize C. D. Lontsenheizer, A. J. Burr and C. C. Stubbs; their heirs and assigns, to maintain and keep a ferry on the Missouri river at the mouth of Trout creek, in Meagher county, approved November 25, 1867; also, an act to re-enact an act to authorize Thomas A. Holmes and Luther M. Brown, and their associates, heirs and assigns, to establish a ferry across the Missouri river, between the counties of Edgerton and Meagher, approved December 6, 1867; also, an act to re-enact an act to authorize Constant Guyot, his heirs and assigns, to construct and maintain a toll road from the little Blackfoot river to the Ten Mile and Helena road, approved December 3, 1867; also, an act to re-enact an act authorizing Henry Whaley, Joseph V. Stafford and William E. Pinney, and their associates, to establish and maintain a toll road from Cave City, in Cave Gulch, to the mouth of said gulch, in Meagher county, Montana territory, approved December 12, 1867; also, an act to re-enact an act entitled an act to incorporate the Black Tail Deer and Helena wagon road company, passed and approved at the second session of the legislature of Montana, approved December 12, 1867; also, an act to re-enact an act entitled an act to incorporate the El Dorado and Diamond City wagon road company, passed April 12, 1866, approved December 20, 1867; also, an act to incorporate the Great Beaver Head wagon road company. The foregoing act having been presented to the governor of the territory for his approval, and not having been returned by him to the house of the legislative assembly within the prescribed time, became a law without his approval.

Law of 1869.—The constitutional changes of 1869 created much dissatisfaction and led to serious litigation. The following letter, presented to the legislature by ex-auditor W. H. Rogers, December 1, 1871, conveys an idea of the working of the law referred to:

I would state that four years ago I was upon joint ballot of both houses chosen as auditor of the territory, and commissioned by the governor for two years. At that session the law was changed, which provided that at the general election of 1869, the auditor and treasurer should be elected by the people; under that provision of law I was two years subsequently elected for another term of two years; Governor Ashley, then governor of the territory, ignored the right of the people to elect, which resulted in an attempt to remove me from office, by the appointment of another. I could only relinquish my rights to the office or defend a process of law commenced for my ejectment from office. In testing the validity of the law, passed by your honorable body, I have taken the case through all the courts of the territory, and it now rests in the Supreme Court of the United States. It has cost me no small amount of money and trouble, and it is now with you to say whether or not you will re-imburse me in at least the amount I have expended.

Laws of 1873-6.—The session of the Legislature called April 14, 1873, by Governor B. F. Potts, considered the Congressional Act of January 24, 1873, which transferred the care and custody of the United States penitentiary at Deer Lodge, to Montana, retaining the legal title to the buildings and grounds. He proposed a large number of economical measures, and indirectly cautioned the Legislature against authorizing the issue of railroad aid bonds to the proposed railroads. The question of the payment of $220.00 to the Sheriff of Madison county, in November, 1872, for conveying a convict from Virginia City to Deer Lodge, was suggested by the Governor as one worthy of legislative attention. Excessive fees charged by, and salaries granted to, county officers, were also placed before the members, the re-codification of the codified laws of the Territory urged, and many other measures absolutely necessary to the public good proposed.

The Legislative session commencing January 5, 1874, was not remarkable for great measures, although the recommendations of Governor Potts, were they observed, would at least insure economy in the public expenditures and earnestness in the public service. The doings of the incorrigible Sioux, under Sitting Bull, met with some consideration. The act to provide for the education of deaf, dumb and blind children, and that for the custody, support and treatment of the insane, were passed and approved. The joint resolution, approved February 13, 1874, appropriated $5,000 to meet expenditures in sending the exhibit of Montana's resources to the Centennial Exposition.

RESIDENCE OF M. W. PENWELL, EAST GALLATIN, GALLATIN CO, MONT.

In 1875 the Territory assumed to support the insane and to collect statistics, while reducing the tax levy 25 per cent. This legislation increased the expenditures $17,000, while reducing the revenue $10,000.

The legislation of 1876 was directed in a marked manner toward improving the financial condition of the Territory. In 1877 much attention was given to the military strength of the Territory, but the effort to legislate a militia force into existence was not a success, even as the assurances of the Secretary of War that the United States troops were able to meet any emergency which might arise from Indian incursions or rebellions, proved unfounded.

The joint resolution, approved February 5, 1874, set forth, for the guidance of the general government, that:

The citizens of Montana, residing in the counties of Deer Lodge and Missoula, live in constant jeopardy from the bands of roving Indians infesting and traversing that country. That the Flathead Indians, of the Bitter Root Valley, have for a long time claimed that regian, and while the same has to a great extent been occupied by white settlers, engaged in the various pursuits of agriculture and the mechanical trades, the said Indians persist in their determination to inhabit and control the said country, notwithstanding the said country has been surveyed by surveyors of the United States and to a great extent duly pre-empted by white settlers. The said Indians declare that they will not leave the land unless forcibly removed. That by reason of the topography of the country numerous tribes of Indians, in their travels to and from the buffalo grounds, must necessarily pass through the cañon of the Hell-Gate Valley in said counties, among which may be enumerated the Nez Perces, Cayuses, Cœur d'Alênes, Klikitats, Yakimas, Walla-Wallas, Spokanes, Colvilles, Pen d'Oreilles, Kootenays, Kettle Indians, and also stragglers from the Modoc tribe, many of whom are regardless of the rights of white settlers, frequently plundering their property, driving off their horses, killing and stealing their cattle; wherefore frequent collisions of the said tribes with the settlers are the consequence, and the country is in danger of an Indian war at any time. That the clandestine sale of spirituous liquors to the said Indians by lawless white persons and half-breeds, arousing all their bad passions, is an additional source of alarm to the settlers, who are defenseless except such as their own unorganized means and strength can furnish; wherefore your memorialists would pray that a military post, consisting of at least five hundred cavalry soldiers, be established at or near the Hell-Gate Ronde, at the confluence of the Bitter Root and the Hell-Gate Rivers, and to take such other measures as may insure the safety of the citizens of these counties.

From the beginning of the Territorial government down to the present time the Legislature has adopted many resolutions of this character, each dealing with the great wrongs to which industry is subjected by the Indian policy of the General Government.

Apportionment, 1882.—The apportionment of members of the Legislature in 1882, was performed by the Apportionment Board, named in the Congressional Act approved August 3, 1882. The following list gives the County and the number of Representatives allowed: Beaverhead, 2; Choteau, 2; Custer, 2; Dawson, 1; Deer Lodge, 2; Gallatin, 2; Jefferson, 2; Lewis and Clarke, 3; Madison, 2; Meagher, 2; Missoula, 1; Silver Bow, 3.

Elections, 1882-4.—Dawson and Choteau Counties were constituted a Council District, entitled to one member. Each of the other counties formed a Council District, authorized to elect one member, except Lewis and Clarke county, which was declared entitled to two Councillors. The official vote of the Territory, polled in November, 1882, and in November, 1884, is as follows:*

* The Legislature of 1885-86 stands Republicans 20; Democrats, 15; Independent, 1.

Since the close of the Nez Perces war aggressive politics have been confined to Indian reservations. Apart from this vexed question, the legislators have confined themselves to simple economic and organic measures. This policy has resulted in abolishing the public debt of the territory, in organizing two new counties, and in the partial amelioration of the taxpayers. When Governor Potts entered on the duties of governor fifteen years ago Montana Territory had a debt of $150,000, and the counties were equally heavily burdened. Within the period over which his administration extended this debt was paid off, and $15,000 left to the credit of the territory; while the county indebtedness was reduced, or where left standing had fair exhibits. Governor Crosby entered the executive office in 1883, and adopted a policy at once effective and full of promise. He was appointed Assistant Postmaster-General, and was succeeded by Governor Carpenter.

In January, 1884, the great Constitutional Convention was held at Helena. Every point bearing on the welfare of the territory was discussed, and several resolutions of an economic character adopted. In the following list the names of the delegates who were elected to represent the counties and judicial districts of the territory are given. In the pages devoted to biography and reminiscences the personal histories of these gentlemen find a place:

COUNTY.	DELEGATES.
Beaverhead	Joseph A. Brown and Robert Smith.
Choteau	T. E. Collins and W. H. Hunt.
Custer	C. W. Savage, Wm. Van Gasken and S. R. Douglass.
Dawson	J. F. Malony.
Deer Lodge	J. C. Robinson, E. B. Waterbury and Joaquin Abascal.
Gallatin	S. W. Langhorne, R. P. Vivion, G. O. Eaton, F. D. Pease and E. F. Ferris.
Jefferson	E. McSorley and N. Merriman.
Lewis and Clarke	Matt Carroll, J. K. Toole, C. Hedges, Geo. Steell.
Missoula	W. J. McCormick, W. J. Stephens, J. B. Catlin, R. A. Eddy.
Meagher	J. F. McClintock, James Fergus and W. F. Haas.
Silver Bow	Thomas L. Napton, W. Y. Pemberton, W. A. Clark, Marcus Daly, J. C. C. Thornton, Francis Medhurst.
Yellowstone	F. M. Proctor and F. M. Greene.
1st Judicial Dis't	Walter Cooper and A. F. Burleigh.
2d Judicial Dis't	W. W. Dixon and James H. Mills.
3d Judicial Dis't	W. B. Hundley and T. C. Power.

W. J. McCormick was chosen temporary chairman, and James B. Wells temporary secretary. W. A. Clark was elected president, P. L. Van Cleve clerk. At the thirteenth session of the Montana legislature an act was passed providing for holding a constitutional convention at Helena in January, 1884, and calling a special election for November, 1883, to determine who should be members of that convention. The convention met at Helena last January, as provided for in the act referred to, and framed a constitution subject to acceptance by the voters of the territory at the fall election of 1884. As will be seen by the following table (official returns of the vote upon the constitution) it was adopted by a heavy majority:

	For.	Against.
Custer	1,103	52
Choteau	785	423
Dawson	34	379
Deer Lodge	1,887	425
Gallatin	1,260	879
Jefferson	446	217
Lewis and Clarke	1,887	386
Madison	911	397
Meagher	646	969
Missoula	1,222	137
Silver Bow	4,650	90
Yellowstone	448	42
Totals	15,506	4,366

The total vote of the territory for delegate to congress was 26,969, while the total vote on the constitution was 7,197 less. The laws passed during the fourteenth session of the legislature are a credit to the civilization of the West, and a lesson to the old states.

The members of the fourteenth legislative assembly, and officers of both houses, together with the Territorial officials, are named as follows:

National Conventions.—On May 2, 1884, the Republican Territorial Convention elected Wilbur F. Sanders and Lee Mantle, delegates to the National Convention of 1884, with M. J. Leaming of Choteau and Hiram Knowles of Silver Bow, Alternate Delegates. The nominations of candidates for this honor were as follows: Geo. Irvin, of Silver Bow, nominated Lee Mantle of Butte; Alex. C. Botkin, of Lewis and Clarke, nominated M. A. Meyendorff of Helena; Henry N. Blake, of Madison, nominated Hiram Knowles of Butte, and Caldwell Edwards of Gallatin county; J. V. Bogert, of Gallatin, nominated Geo. O. Eaton of Gallatin; Charles H. Gould, of Custer, nominated M. J. Leaming of Fort Benton; L. Rotwitt, of Meagher, nominated Wilbur F. Sanders of Helena. I. D. McCutcheon, of Lewis and Clarke, moved that the election of delegates be by ballot on the call of counties; Eaton, of Gallatin, moved to substitute by voting viva voce on the call of counties. A debate ensued in which Messrs. Irvin, O'Bannon, Eaton and others spoke in favor of a viva voce vote, and by Messrs. Sanders, Botkin, Carter, McCutcheon and others, who favored the secret ballot. The amendment was lost and the original motion adopted. It was moved that the vote be for two candidates together upon each ballot, which was adopted. On motion of Geo. W. Irvin, of Silver Bow, it was resolved that the candidates be requested to express their preferences for a nominee for President of the United States. Lee Mantle announced his preference for Geo. F. Edmunds, of Vermont. M. A. Meyendorff announced his first choice to be James G. Blaine, of Maine; second, Geo. F. Edmunds. Caldwell Edwards announced his preference for Geo. F. Edmunds. H. N. Blake announced the choice of Hiram Knowles to be in favor of Geo. F. Edmunds. M. J. Leaming announced his preference for Chester A. Arthur, of New York. W. F. Sanders announced his preference for James G. Blaine. The delegates to the Democratic National Convention of 1884, were Samuel T. Hauser of Helena, and Samuel Ward of Butte. W. J. McCormick, one of the alternate delegates was appointed member of the National Committee and S. T. Hauser, member of the notification committee. This was the first occasion on which Montana was represented in a National Democratic Convention. So new was the question of admitting the representatives of the Territories, that the mover of the resolution to appoint committees, July 10, 1884, forgot all about the Territories, so that their names were added by consent of the whole convention.

In the foregoing sketch of the organic and political history of Montana, little which bears directly on any of the political divisions of the Territory finds a place. With the exception of General Meagher's personal history, all biographical matter and reminiscences are given very fully in the chapters devoted to that important part of this work, and in these chapters the minutiae of the political history of Montana may be found. The proposition to create the State of Montana, although resting on a very solid foundation, is not an accomplished fact. The appointment of Samuel T. Hauser as Governor of Montana, to succeed Governor Carpenter, was made in July, 1885.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE SECRET TRIBUNAL OF MONTANA.

THE revival of the Committee of Safety was as necessary in the early days of Montana's settlement, as are the legal tribunals of to-day, far less expensive, more just, more efficacious, and better adapted to draw forth all the manliness of good citizens, as well as to detect and punish the viciousness of bad ones. This fact becomes more apparent when the characters of all those who were punished by the Vigilantes of Montana come to be considered. They were men of the world. Their knowledge of Western life was perfect,—complete, so much so as to lead them above all thoughts of honest labor, and draw them by degrees toward that life of shame which ended in their execution. The fault with our own times consists in men knowing so much. The murderer, the seducer, the forger, the robber of the honest workingman, the libeller, are all abroad, and when seldom brought to justice, are treated more like heroes than deep-dyed criminals, and often allowed to return to the practice of their evil doings. How often have men looked back to the days of the Vigilantes and wished for their resumption of the justice-giving power? Scarcely a day passes in the Old States without a failure of the law to accord justice. Even in this Territory, where the great lessons taught by the Old Committee are still remembered, justice sometimes fails to reach the criminal, while the specious promises of officials hold in check the salutary call of the Secret Tribunal. When the Vigilantes were first called into existence, all laws, both human and Divine, were held in derision by a large number of the inhabitants of Eastern Idaho, as the settled portions of Montana were then called. Another large number who labored honestly in placer or quartz diggings for a stated time, and then rushed to the nearest village to indulge in wild pleasures, were creatures of extremes. So long as the criminals could satisfy this wild crowd that their actions were justified by the Mountain Code, the dangerous characters had all the protection which brute force could afford. (Vide page 1247.)

Dramatis Personæ.—To give a roster of the Vigilantes of Montana is out of the question. While every man is conscious of the good work which the members of the committee accomplished, many of the workmen do not wish their names to be mentioned, and thus the compiler is forced to leave the reader in possession of just so much information on this point as will enable him to select from the rosters of the early settlers the names of the true men who offered their lives to the cause of driving the evil-minded to respect the Mountain Code or die. However, there are names which have already been credited with participation in the action of the Vigilantes, and therefore they must be given in this greater record. The roll of honor is made up of the names of men who were spokesmen or executioners: Ed. Hibbert, Hank Crawford, J. M. Castner, Dr. Biddle, O. J. Rockwell. Captain Higgins, D. O'Leary, Dempsey, Rheem, Geo. Coply, Judge Hoyt, Smith Ball, N. P. Langford, R. C. Knox, A. Godfrey, Harry Flegger, Buz. Craven, Frank Ray, Louis Le Grau, Matt Carroll, S. T. Hauser, M. S. Moody, John McCormick, Billy Sloan, J. M. Bozeman, J. S. Rockfellow, Henry Branson, M. V. Jones, D. Sheriff Dillingham, Frank Woody, John Murphy, Tom Connor, J. X. Beidler, Matteson, Wilkinson, Percival, Dan. McFadden, Sweeney, Dodge, Dr. Steele, E. R. Cutter, Dr. Rutar, Jim Brown, Captain Moore, Neil Howie, Leroy Southmayde, A. M. Holter, William Clark, Elk Morse, Tom Baume, J. C. Guy, Burtchey, Hedges, Ellis, Col. W. F. Sanders, Charles S. Bagg, Col. Wood, Lawyer Ritchie, W. H. Patton, W. Y. Pemberton, A. B. Davis, Judge Byam, Robert Hereford, John Creighton, McK. Dennee, Hill Beechy, Tom Reilly, Lank Forbes, John Fetherstone, Jack Temple, Thomas J. Dimsdale, Jemmy Allen, Charley Eaton, Dan. Harding, Barney O'Keefe (Baron), Barney Hughes, J. M. Fox, John McGrath, James Stuart, Charles J. Curtiss, Stephen Reynolds, Judge Burchette, Major Hutchinson, Ed. House, Dr. Palmer, S. M. Hall, G. French, Captain Williams, A. F. Edwards, Edward Porter, C. C. Farmer, Andrew O'Connell, S. Kayser, John Nichols, Judge N. J. Bond, Jack Edwards, Judge Lawrence, A. S. Parker, A. J. McCausland, David Dinan, L. F. Carpenter, W. L. Myers, Charles Parks, Judge Munson, J. J. Healy, Chief Justice Hosmer and Nelson Story.

In the foregoing list the names of men who, in the early days of the Territory, acted openly against the robbers, and whose names must occur in the history of the Bar of that period, are only given.

The executions and punishments under authority of the Committee of Safety are named and the date of their taking off given:

George Hilderman, a foolish rogue, was banished December 21, 1863.
John Franck, or Long John, was pardoned owing to his evidence.
—— Hinson was hanged in legal form August 16, 1868.
Hunt was hanged at West Gallatin for horse stealing.
Jarnagin, captured with Arnett and Spillman, ordered out in 1863.
An old Frenchman was ordered to leave, in July, 1863.
Uhlen, a member of Jeff. Standifer's party, banished for the murder of Bridger.
Judge H. P. A. Smith, counsel for road agents, banished in 1864.
J. Thurmond, counsel for road agents, banished in 1864.
H. G. Sessions, circulator of bogus gold dust, banished in 1864.
H. D. Moyer, an accomplice of Sessions, banished in 1864.
—— Kustar, a reckless shooter, banished in 1864.
Charley Reeves, killed a brother road agent, Charley Forbes.
Will Moore, a disciple of Plummer, banished in 1864.
William Mitchell, a disciple of Plummer, banished in 1864
Charley Forbes, the murderer of Dillingham, killed by Reeves, banished in 1864.
Jack Cleveland, killed by Plummer.
Brucker, pursued by Neil Howie to Idaho, and captured by Fetherstone, January 2, 1863.
George Carhart, killed in a row between Dick Sapp and George Banefield.

Banefield	received a wound in Skinner's saloon which caused his death.
Doc. Howard, Will Lowrie, Jem. Romaine,	Murderers of the Magruder party, tracked to California, arrested, tried under the laws of Idaho, and hanged at Lewiston.
Billy Page,	Turned States evidence and was pardoned.
Gad Moore, Harvey Meade, Billy Terwilliger, Rattlesnake Dick, Talbert, or Cherokee Bob, —— Cooke, Old Tex, alias Jim Crow, Jeff. Perkins, alias Jim Crow, Sam Bunton, Madame Hall, Irwin, of Big Hole,	Dangerous characters who left the country when the necks of their brother criminals were broken.

A few other names could be added to this long list of white devils; but the owners of such names having reformed and entered on careers of industry, the propriety of adding their names is left optional with the reader of this volume.

The executions by the people during the year 1883 numbered sixteen. Dick the Barber, at Thompson River, January 21, 1883; Billy the Kid, at Butte, February 4; Ohio Dan, Blondy, Ed. Enright, and seven others, at Weeksville, February 4; John Jessrang, murderer of C. Davidson, Beaverhead, March 13; Coombs and Smith, for assassination, March 19; and Rigney, at Miles City, July 25.

The executions under regular legal form were, Henry Forham, for murder, hanged at Helena, May 2, and Ah Yung, hanged at Missoula for the murder of another Chinaman, August 22, 1883. The murderers of Thomas Rodgers and Daniel McCarthy were also brought to justice. The recent wholesale hanging of horse thieves in eastern Montana is referred to at the close of the chapter.

A Notice to Bad Men, 1865.—In the fall of 1865, at a time when the territory was fully organized, the fact was too evident that the laws were unable to cope with the criminals who flocked into the mining centers. In this emergency the citizens declared their intentions to aid the cause of order in the following significant manifesto:

To all whom it may concern: Whereas divers foul crimes and outrages against the persons and property of citizens of Montana have been lately committed, and whereas the power of the civil authorities, though exerted to its full extent, is frequently insufficient to prevent the commission and to punish the perpetrators thereof: now this is to warn and notify all whom it may concern that the Vigilance Committee, composed of the citizens of the territory, have determined to take this matter into their own hands and to inflict summary punishment upon any and all malefactors in any case where the civil authorities are unable to enforce the proper penalty of the law. The practice of drawing deadly weapons except in case of last resort for the defense of life being dangerous to society and in many instances leading to affrays and bloodshed, notice is hereby given that the same is prohibited, and offenders against this regulation will be summarily dealt with. * * * This notice will not be repealed, but will remain in full force and effect from this date. VIGILANCE COMMITTEE.

Expulsion.—In July, 1862, an old Frenchman stole horses and toher property from settlers in the neighborhood of Gold creek. He was pursued by James Stuart and another settler, and was captured near the site of Fergus' ranch in Prickly Pear creek. His captors returned him to the camp, where he was tried before the court of miners. His guilt was clearly established; but owing to his age and profound repentance, the regulation penalty was reduced to a twelve hours' notice to leave the country. It was evident the old amateur horse thief could not observe the sentence in his destitute condition; so the court subscribed $15, gave him some provisions, and the old man left the district forever.

Execution of Spillman, etc.—About the middle of August, 1862, three men arrived at American fork from the Lower country. They had five or six good horses; but very little else in the shape of an outfit. Two of them were desperate characters. Their names were William Arnett, C. W. Spillman and B. F. Jernigan. About a week afterward, two men named Fox and Bull, armed with double-barreled shot guns and revolvers, slipped quietly into town in the dusk of the evening, and meeting James Stuart, inquired if the three men described above were there, and upon being informed that they were, stated that they (Fox and Bull) were in pursuit of them for stealing the horses on which they had come, from the vicinity of Elk City, and requested the co-operation of the citizens in arresting them. James assured them that they should have all the assistance necessary, and they at once began to look for their men. They found Spillman in Worden & Co.'s store, and bringing their shot guns to bear on him they ordered him to surrender, which he did without a word. They left him under guard, and went after the other two, who had just opened a monte game in a saloon. They stepped inside the door and ordered them to throw up their hands. Arnett, who was dealing, instantly grabbed for his pistol, which he always kept lying in his lap ready for business; but before he could raise it, Bull shot him through the breast with a heavy charge of buckshot, killing him instantly. Jernagin ran into a corner of the room, exclaiming, "Don't shoot, don't shoot; I give up." He and Spillman were then tied and placed under guard till morning, when proceedings were commenced by burying Arnett, who had died with the monte cards clenched so tightly in his left hand that they could not be taken from him, and they were buried with him. The two prisoners were then tried separately by a jury of twenty-four men. Jernagin was acquitted, and given six hours to leave the country, and it is needless to say left on time. Spillman was hanged August 26, 1862, and buried beside Arnett.

The First Coach Robbery, 1863.—The history of the first act of the coach robbers of Montana, as given here, appeared in the Helena Independent, suggested by the robbery of the Helena and Boulder City stage June 27, 1883. A reporter of that paper interviewed William A. Rumsay, now a resident of Helena, but at one time of Alder Gulch, and obtained from him some interesting reminiscences of the first stage robbery on the line between Virginia City and Bannack. The heaviest loser among the robbed passengers was Dan McFadden (familiarly known as "Bummer Dan,") who, like all prominent early-day characters, had seen many ups and downs. He was one of the most familiar characters of Alder Gulch in the golden days of '63. He had accumulated and lost several small fortunes with the indifference which characterized the majority of the early prospectors, who regarded small "raises" as only "prospects" leading to the main deposit which they must eventually strike. Dan was happy when the claims were rich and the whisky plenty. Somehow he was always in the vanguard of a stampede, and had followed the old excitements hither and thither through the mountains to Bannack, and then drifted along in the wake of Bill Fairweather and party to Alder. In Virginia City Dan's fortunes had settled down to their lowest ebb. And at last, even the easy-going, good natured pioneer awoke to the necessity of making another attempt to replenish the purse that had been filled and emptied so often. One morning the dwellers in the Gulch were electrified by the news that "Bummer Dan" had struck it rich again. Sure enough he had, for "Bummer Dan's Bar," almost opposite Virginia City, proved to be one of the richest in Alder. Dan steadied down, worked hard, sluiced out a golden harvest from bed-rock, sold out his claim, and started for Salt Lake and the States to enjoy a quiet life. This was in October, 1863. The driver of the coach on which Bummer Dan took passage was Mr. Rumsey, mentioned above, who consented to drive one trip to Bannack to relieve Mr. Caldwell (one of the owners of the line) who had been driving steadily for several trips (drivers being scarce), and was played out. Three passengers were in the coach when it pulled out from Virginia, and at Bob Dempsey's ranch, "Bummer Dan" got on board. He had several sacks of gold dust (his whole "pile") strapped to his body, underneath his clothes. The coach went along at a rattling pace over the wide-swept table land to Rattlesnake creek. Arriving at Rattlesnake ranch (which became so notorious in the following months) they discovered that the stock had strayed, and they were compelled to remain over night. About 9 o'clock next morning one of the herders brought in the same team they had driven the day before, and Rumsey had to mount the box and head the tired horses for the divide and Bannack. The horses trotted heavily along until they reached the foot hills, when they settled down to a walk from which no whipping could urge them. As they came opposite a little dry gulch two blanketted horsemen with shotguns upon their shoulders galloped out. The moment Rumsey saw them, he called to his passengers. "Boys, they are coming; get out your revolvers!" but the warning was too late, and it was answered by the road agent's demand: "Throw up your hands." With a shotgun leveled upon him Rumsey pulled up the horses and was ordered down from the box. He refused to leave his team. The road agent again ordered him down and told Bill Bunton to mount the box and hold the team. Bill kept crying out that he had no arms, and continually begged the road agents not to shoot him. Rumsey was ordered to disarm the passengers and search them. He took the arms from the passengers and piled them up. "Bummer Dan" had a navy strapped on each side. After taking the arms Rumsey went to the passengers and received their purses. Dan handed him two small purses. Rumsey piled them up and started for the coach. "Did you get all?" asked an agent. "Yes," replied Rumsey, who had left purses in several of the passenger's pockets. One of the passengers was asked if he had any more money. With his hands still above his head he answered "Yes." Rumsey was ordered to search him again. After throwing down another purse, Rumsey started for the coach, saying he had got all the money. "Get that big sack from 'Bummer Dan,' unbuckle the straps; he is the man we want to pan out." Dan's face lengthened, and he began to unbuckle the straps. He had hoped to escape with the bulk of his gold dust. Rumsey went to help him, but seeing that Dan had another sack still hidden, he stepped back, and turning to the road agents, told them that Dan could get along faster alone. Dan finally got the sacks loose and handed them to Rumsey, who tossed them upon the pile. The passengers were ordered aboard, with the threat that if they breathed a word about the robbery, they would be killed. Dan saved one sack of dust and lost about $7,000, and remarked that he had less fun with the money he had just parted with, than any raise that has slipped through his fingers since he had been in the mountains. George Ives and Frank Parish were the road agents and were afterwards hung. When the coach arrived at Bannack, Henry Plummer, the chief of the band, remarked to Dan, in a jocular manner: "Never mind, Dan, when I get my division, I will give you your money back." Dan looked at him, and, although he was aware of who the men were, and Plummer's connection with them, it would be death to tell what he knew. Afterward, in Virginia City, George Ives went to Andy O'Connell, now of Helena, and told him that he understood "Bummer Dan" had said to him that he (Ives) was one of the agents. O'Connell, aware of the fatal result to Dan if Ives thought he knew who robbed him, said he had a long talk with Dan, and that he was utterly ignorant as to who the men were who robbed him. Dan never recovered from his loss, and soon after left Virginia. When last heard from he was in Colorado, but had never "struck it rich" again. This robbery may be said to be the introduction of George Ives and Frank Parish to the confidence of Sheriff Plummer, and indeed to the punishment which was subsequently meted out to them.

Robbery and Murder of the Magruder Party.—Lloyd Magruder settled at Virginia City in the summer of 1863, when he opened a general store on Wallace street. Before the close of fall he realized $14,000 from the sale of his merchandise, and, in company with Charles Allen, Horace and Robert Chalmers, and Pat Phillips, of Marysville, he set out on his return to his home at Lewiston, Idaho. So soon as his plans became known, Henry Plummer, Steve Marshland, Jem Romaine, Billy Page, Doctor Howard, Cyrus Skinner, Bill Lowrie and perhaps two more robbers, determined to possess his wealth. With this object, Page, Lowrie, Howard and Romaine were ordered by Plummer to offer their services to Magruder, who gave each a good mule to ride and provisions. The party reached the mountain beyond the Clearwater, when Magruder and Lowrie walked some distance from the camp to look after the stock. Here Lowrie murdered Magruder, while Romaine murdered Phillips, whom he wished to befriend. Allen and the Chalmers brothers were murdered while asleep by Page and Howard. The murderers pushed forward to Lewiston, where Hill Beechey, owner of the Luna House, observed their wealth of gold, others identified Magruder's mule and trappings, while Goodrich, who owned the corral, recognized Page. Beechey pursued them to California, where Page turned State's evidence, brought them to Lewiston, where they were hanged.

Realization of Danger.—The following story, by Col. W. F. Sanders, is characteristic of the wild times of 1863–4:

"On the morning of the 14th of November, 1863," says the Colonel, "I arrived at Bannack City, which was then my home, from Virginia City, where I had been as one of a committee of three to interest the citizens of that place in a movement looking to the creation of a new territory out of that part of Idaho which was east of the Rocky and Bitter Root mountains. Upon my journey from Virginia City to Bannack, I was accompanied by Samuel T. Hauser, theretofore a miner in Bivens' gulch, near Virginia City, who was on his way to St. Louis, and Henry Plummer, then in many respects the most conspicuous citizen of eastern Idaho. Upon arriving at Bannack, I learned from Samuel McLain, then a citizen of that town, that it was an open secret that mines of silver were known to exist in that vicinity, and that the announcement of that fact would be made public as soon as they should be recorded. Theretofore mining in eastern Idaho was exclusively confined to placer mines. A few gold quartz lodes had been discovered near Bannack, but the existence of silver bearing quartz was not generally known or conceded. At this period the silver mines of Colorado and Nevada were being developed and revealing fabulous richness, and it was the universal belief, of persons who had given the subject attention, that silver mines were much more valuable than those exclusively bearing gold. Colonel McLain had requested, if an opportunity occurred, for me to secure him a claim upon the silver lodes to be recorded, that I would do so, and reciprocally had promised me, if an opportunity occurred for him to secure a claim for me, that he would do it; and as to the discoveries then supposed to have been made, and about to be made public, we agreed to own whatever either procured in common. During the day a number of horses belonging to the bold riders of the mountains, who then lived in or frequented Bannack, were driven from the Horse Prairie ranch or pasture grounds to Bannack, and during the afternoon a cavalcade of ten or a dozen horsemen had mounted and perambulated the streets of Bannack, frequenting the various saloons of the town. The horses were uniformly the best the country afforded, and their horsemanship was perfect. They remained in Bannack for two or three hours, apparently for convivial purposes, and late in the afternoon began to depart from the town in the direction of Virginia City, by twos. After some of them had left, Colonel McLain came to me and stated that, in his judgment, this party was going to stake and record the silver lodes which he had mentioned as having been discovered. I expressed to him my dissent from that opinion, and told him I would ascertain. Seeing Mr. Plummer mounted on his horse and a short distance on the opposite side of the street from me, I went to him and asked him where he was going. He told me that he and his party were going that evening to the ranch of Parish, Bunton & Co., on Rattlesnake creek, about fifteen miles east from Bannack, where they would remain all night, and that upon the succeeding day they were going to Blacktail Deer creek, upon the opposite side of Beaverhead river, to take possession of a herd of horses which Frank Parish had taken to keep during the winter; that Parish was sick and would not probably survive; that his wife was a Bannack squaw, and that the instant he died she, with some of her tribe, would take possession of these horses and drive them away, and inasmuch as they were owned by citizens of that vicinity, he felt bound to protect their property and preserve it against these Indian thieves. The story was a plausible one. I knew that Parish was sick from a fever, and not expected to live, having left his place that morning. I also knew that his wife was an Indian woman, and presumed he had the horses mentioned. Impressed, however, with the superior information of Colonel McLain, I denied to Plummer that he had truly related to me his purpose, stating to him my conviction that he, with his party, were going to stake and record the silver quartz lodes which rumor said had been discovered, and stated to him my inclination to accompany him. He replied: "All right; get your horse and come along;" at the same time, however, assuring me that, as far as his knowledge extended, there was no one going with him who knew of the discovery of any silver mines, and stated his conviction that no such purpose was in the minds of any of his companions, and assured me he knew nothing of the matter himself. Upon my intimation of a continued belief that this was his purpose, or that of some of the party, and that it was still my design to accompany it for that object, after a moment's hesitation he repeated his invitation to me to go with him, and at the same stated to me that if I did not, and it should occur that such an event as I had signified should transpire while they were absent, he would see that one of the claims was staked in my name as certainly as if I were there. I said to him that his companions might object to the staking or recording of claims for any person not present on the ground, which he assured me would not be the case, and saying if such an event did occur he would deed to me the claim that should be recorded for him, that he could get quartz claims when he pleased, and upon his assuring me that I should fare as well in this respect as he or any of his companions, I returned and reported my conversation to Colonel McLain. At this time it is probable that half of the party had already left town, and the balance were scattered through the hamlet, occasionally galloping wildly from one saloon to another through the main street. I do not remember all of these horsemen. There were Plummer, the Sheriff, two of his deputies, John Gallagher, George Ives and probably six others, one of whom, I am certain, continued to reside in the territory of Montana until a very recent period, who pursued an honorable avocation, and who was highly esteemed as a man of integrity by all who knew him, to the time of his death. An hour or two after my interview with Plummer, Colonel McLain returned to my office accompanied by Sidney Edgerton, then Chief Justice of the territory of Idaho, F. M. Thompson, a merchant then trading in Bannack, and Leonard A. Gridley, who had crossed the plains with me, and expressed the conviction that it was desirable that I should go to the ranch on the Rattlesnake, and accompany this party the succeeding day. I volunteered to do so at their request, and I went for my blankets and revolver while they proceeded to find for me a horse in town. Upon the morning of this day, shortly after my arrival from Virginia City, a large cavalcade of teams, driven by a number of Mormons, had left the town of Bannack for Salt Lake City. These teams were principally mules, although there were some horses. When we had alighted from the coach I had accompanied Mr. Hauser to the store of George Crissman, then the principal place in the town, where the citizens gathered to discuss the mining interests of the country and relate the tragedies and hair-breadth escapes which daily occured. Mr. Hauser delivered to Mr. Crissman, for safe keeping, several purses of gold dust, and proceeded to make arrangements with Nathaniel P. Langford to start upon his journey to Salt Lake City. Upon my arrival from my residence with my blankets, I found saddled and bridled for my use a diminutive mule, the only animal at that time in Bannack which could be obtained for such a purpose as I had in view, and I mounted and started up the hill on the road which the horsemen had traveled. Just before doing so, Mr. Gallagher, known as Jack Gallagher, rode to the door of my office, dismounted, came in and proceeded to blacken his boots, exchanging the customary salutations. At this time the sun was probably an hour high. Near where the cemetery at Bannack now is, about a hundred rods from the main street, my mule, true to the spirit which characterizes his kind, became balky, and refused to budge an inch for half an hour, to the great amusement of several gentlemen, who witnessed his gyrations from the main street of the village, which lay beneath me. Patience, however, conquered at last, and I pursued my journey, arriving at the top of the hill, five miles from Bannack, before daylight had entirely faded from the sky. I had frequently observed the tracks of horses which had preceded me in the highway, and when I reached the top of the hill, failing to discover any of them, I dismounted for that purpose. Readily persuaded that these wild horsemen were familiar with shorter trails to the Rattlesnake ranch than the main road, I concluded they had taken such a trail, for it was certain that the last travel over the highway was a team on its way to Bannack. The animal which I rode, by its apparent weariness, justified the resolution he had formed near the town, not to accompany me on my journey, and I soon discovered he was wholly unfit for the task imposed upon him. About dark a snow storm commenced, the wind blew with considerable fury, and the accumulations of snow upon the feet of the mule rendered his steps uncertain and very laborious. I therefore dismounted, and for the last eight miles drove him to Rattlesnake ranch. Entering the office and bar room, a cheerful fire was blazing upon the hearth; a medical gentleman from Virginia City, stupefied by intoxication, lay upon the floor in one corner of the room; a mattress, filled with hay, was spread down in front of the fire for a bed, and behind the bar stood Erastus Yeager, universally known at that time by the soubriquet of "Red." He greeted me cordially, but expressed some surprise at my sudden return to the place. I inquired of him where Mr. Plummer and his party were. He disclaimed all knowledge on the subject, informed me they had not been there, to which I expressed some surprise, and said that Mr. Plummer had left Bannack for that place during the afternoon, with eight or ten in his party. I requested him to take care of my mule, which he did by putting him in the corral belonging to the stage line of A. J. Oliver & Co., feeding him some hay, and bringing the bridle, saddle and blankets into the house.

"Wearied with the labors of the last day or two I soon commenced to spread my blankets on the floor preparatory to a night's rest, but Yeager asked me to put them on the mattress on the floor, saying I could sleep with him—a tempting invitation which was readily accepted, and I was soon asleep About midnight I was awakened by boisterous and rude raps upon the outer door, and 'Red' arose, lit a candle, took a shotgun from behind the bar, and proceeded to unbar the door, when in stepped Gallagher, saying that in the storm he had lost his way, had finally found Rattlesnake creek, and had been riding up and down it for two hours at least, unable to find Rattlesnake ranch, then the only house upon that creek, and which was situated upon the crossing of the stream, about three or four miles below Argenta. He said his horse was worn out, himself nearly starved, and as a relief against all these ills he said he wanted something to drink. He also asked for something to eat. His first request was instantly complied with, but he was told there was nothing in the house to eat, as Mr. Parish was very sick and would probably not live until morning, and they had no time to prepare for travelers. He replied that he would take another drink, and that he must have something to eat, if it was nothing but cold bread or cold meats; and after he was supplied with his drink Yeager retired to the rear of the house to see what could be done to allay his hunger, and soon returned with a pan of cold boiled beef, to which Gallagher did a justice as complimentary to his hunger as his attention to the bottle was to the intensity of his thirst. During the time he was discussing the viands set before him he proposed to trade horses, he having a very valuable animal well known to the proprietors of Rattlesnake ranch. Yeager told him that they had no horse there to trade; that the horses that belonged to the ranch were with the herd. Gallagher protested that he must have a fresh horse, until Bunton, who was lying by my side, called Yeager to the side of the bed and whispered to him that he might trade the horse of A. J. Oliver & Co., which was in the corral, if he could get $50 to boot. Yeager returned to his post behind the bar and continued to assert that there was no horse in the corral which they were willing to trade away; but finally, being thereto interrogated, confessed there was a horse in the corral, which he said was a very valuable one, not suited to Gallagher's uses, but which they did not wish to dispose of. But Gallagher was importunate and expressed a desire to have the horse, saying it was fresh, while his was worn out, and that he must proceed on his journey that evening. To this time I, though thoroughly awakened, had said nothing but, knowing that Gallagher had been with Plummer's party in Bannack during the afternoon, I presumed I could learn something of its whereabouts, and so, still lying upon the bed on the floor, I asked him if he knew where Plummer was. Instantly he jumped to the bedside with his revolver cocked, put it within a foot of my head, and with the vilest profanity said he would shoot the top of my head off, and continued in the most angry and boisterous manner his threats and denunciations. I do not suppose this situation lasted more than five seconds, but the sensations which I experienced at that time are as vividly impressed upon my mind as if it was an event not an hour passed. 'Red' was behind the counter; Bunton was lying by my side. I had seen 'Red' return his shotgun to the wall behind the bar, and I instantly moved my head from under the muzzle of the revolver towards Gallagher's feet, jumped from the bed, sprang behind the counter, and seized the shotgun which Yeager had used, cocked it, and pointed it across the counter with the muzzle directed toward Gallagher. Standing nearly in a line between the bed and bar, where I stood, was a rude pine table, the principal use of which was for playing cards, and this table being in reach of Gallagher, by the time I had got the shotgun in position, he laid his revolver upon it, pulled his soldier's blue overcoat apart and told me to shoot. I replied that I had no desire to shoot, but, if there was any shooting to be done, I did desire the first shot. He again invited me to shoot, and at this stage of the controversy both Yeager and Bunton interposed—Yeager with the assurance to Gallagher that he had been to blame, and ought to be ashamed of himself, and Bunton with the consolatory statement that he would not have such a noise in the house, as Parish was sick and likely to die at any moment. Gallagher finally gave signs of relenting, saying to Yeager that perhaps he was blamable, and sang that universal truce of the times which consisted of an invitation for me to drink with him. After a delay, which satisfied me of the sincerity of his intentions, I accepted his invitation, and still protest that the circumstances of the duress which surrounded me ought not to operate to impair my standing as a Son of Temperance. Gallagher was profuse in apologies, and, as soon as I could withdraw from the conversation, I returned to the fireplace. Gallagher and Yeager went to the corral, traded horses, returned for the purpose of weighing $60 of gold dust, the agreed difference of the value of the two horses, and Gallagher departed on his urgent but untold errand. Yeager, barring the door and congratulating Bunton upon the trade which they had made of another person's horse for one of their own, then lay down on the side opposite to me from Bunton, and we were shortly again wrapped in slumber. About two o'clock in the morning there was another tempestuous noise at the door, and Yeager, procuring the shotgun, unbarred the door, when Gallagher came in with his saddle, bridle and blankets, saying he had become lost in the hills, could not tell where the road was or which way to go, and finally, having found the Rattlesnake ranch, had abandoned his journey and proposed to stay the remainder of the night; and, having spread his blankets at our feet, laid down and slept. Not far from five o'clock there was another alarm at the door of the house, and with the same precautions manifested by Yeager, the door was again opened, and from the darkness without I heard a familiar voice inquiring if I was there, to which Yeager replied that I was, and invited the gentleman in. This invitation was declined, with a request that I would come out; and so, after dressing, I stepped into the darkness out of doors and found George Brown and Mr. Gridley standing there; and, after congratulating me upon my safety, they asked me to accompany them back to Bannack. At once returning and getting my overcoat and blankets, I saddled my mule and we started before daylight, and without a breakfast, from the ranch. The story which they related will bring us back to the party of which I was in search. Upon my arrival in Bannack the day before, I had sent Henry S. Tilden, a young man who had accompanied me from Ohio to Bannack, to Horse Prairie to get some cattle which had been left there in the fall and drive them to town. About 9 or 10 o'clock in the evening he had made his appearance at my house on Yankee Flat, and related to my wife his experience of the day and evening. Having found but a portion of the cattle during the day, he had driven them into an enclosure on Horse Prairie creek, leaving them there with the expectation of returning the following day, finding the balance and returning with them all to Bannack, and had started in the evening for that place. About half way between Horse Prairie and Bannack he saw in the distance, in front of him, several horsemen, and, upon approaching them in the road, they commanded him to halt, dismount and throw up his hands. Some of them dismounted and presented their revolvers at him, while one of themp roceeded to search his pockets for money, with a result somewhat discouraging, whereupon they proceeded to say to him that they did not wish his money; that they did not desire him to say what had been his experience that night, and, if he did, notwithstanding this request and notice, he need not hope to escape death at their hands. With such precautions, enforced by some repetition and much profanity, they permitted him to remount his horse and proceed on his way. He was a boy of fifteen or sixteen summers, thoroughly frightened by this episode, unlike all his former experience, and he gladly availed himself of the hospitality which permitted him to depart alone into the darkness. Thenceforth his journey into the town was rapid. Riding across Yankee Flat at a gallop, his horse stumbled and threw him upon the ground, and for a time he was insensible, but upon recovering consciousness he proceeded on foot to the residence of Mr. Edgerton and told the family what had occurred to him and who several of the party were that had stopped him in the highway in the manner described. He then came to my house, repeated the story, and my wife accompanied him to the residence of Mr. Edgerton, where several of the neighbors were called and consulted, each of whom expressed some apprehension as to my own safety. The result was that Brown and Gridley were mounted upon two horses which had been at work during the day out of Bannack, and were sent to Rattlesnake ranch to ascertain my whereabouts. It thus appeared that the horsemen, under the command of Plummer, had proceeded in an opposite direction to near the top of the hill toward Rattlesnake ranch, had doubled upon their track, crossed the Grasshopper creek about four miles above Bannack, and had proceeded to Horse Prairie with the intention, as it afterwards appeared, of rob'bing Messrs. Hauser and Langford, who had left Bannack during the evening, having in the morning, without the knowledge of Plummer and his companions, made an arrangement with the Mormon train to join it that evening on Horse Prairie and proceed with it the next day. Upon my return to Bannack I was disinclined to believe that young Tilden's identification of Plummer as the principal actor in the attempted robbery was correct, but the young man was of undoubted integrity, and he was certain that if the identification of individual faces was a possible thing he there saw and knew Henry Plummer. The facts were concealed from the general public until the afternoon of the 10th of January, 1864, after it had been determined to hang Plummer, Ray and Stinson, when, for the further satisfaction of those who might possibly indulge in captious doubt, we sent for young Tilden and had him relate the story. Of the four actors in the scene at the Rattlesnake ranch that night, within sixty days I was the sole survivor, the other three having fallen victims of the vigilance committee."

Escape of Hauser and Langford.—Samuel T. Hauser, N. P. Langford, George Dart and six freighters left Bannack late on the evening of November 14, 1863, en route to the States (the same day that Henry Tilden met Plummer & Co.). They anticipated an attack from road agents, but when camp was reached they forgot all dangers and prepared for sleep. Langford gave his blanket to a delicate tenderfoot, and then lay down to sleep, but owing to the cold, he resolved to keep near the camp fire. This did not suit him, so with his shot gun he started out for a moonlight walk by the creek. He had just reached the river when he heard the sound of horses feet, and immediately three horsemen galloped past. Watching every movement and showing himself to the night prowlers, he saw a fourth horseman. This party realized his presence and fled toward Bannack. Henry Plummer, Buck Stinson, Ned Ray and George Ives, formed this quartette, who came to rob and murder, and fled only when the watchfulness of one man baulked their enterprise.

Stage Coach Robbery, November, 1863.—The robbery of Oliver's Salt Lake coach, late in November, 1863, was carried out by George Ives, Whisky Bill (Graves) and Bob Zachary, south of Stone's ranch. Leroy Southmayde, Captain Moore and a stage driver known as "Billy," then dismissed from Oliver's service, were the only passengers, while the outfit was driven by the veteran stager, Thos. C. Caldwell. The agents made a circuit round Stone's ranch, and attacked the coach after it had left that point in the forenoon. Southmayde was relieved of $400, a weight of gold dust, and Moore $100 in treasury notes and his purse. Tom Caldwell and Billy escaped. Three days latter, when returning to Bannack, Southmayde, Tom Caldwell and a young traveler of sixteen years got the drop on Buck Stinson, Ned Ray, Aleck Carter, Bill Graves and Bob Zachary. Subsequently Ray and Stinson were asked to ride on the coach while the others dashed off for Pete Daly's ranch. Even with this arrangement had it not been for Buck Stinson's observance of his promise, a very fair chance of robbing the coach was presented, as the agents rode forward and waited only his signal to renew the attack.

Execution of George Ives, December 22, 1863.—This lieutenant of Plummer, who, in addition to his numerous crimes almost added the murder of Anton M. Holter to the number, as well as that of the Nevadian at the Cold Spring ranche, and of Nicholas Tbalt, was hanged December 22, 1863. It was the murder of Tbalt that drew forth the powers of the people, and rendered possible their action toward the agents. In the following description of the capture and execution of Ives, the words of Dimsdale are used:

The same afternoon three or four of the citizens raised twenty-five men, and left Nevada at ten P.M. The party subscribed an obligation before starting, binding them to mutual support, etc., and then traveled on, with silence and speed, toward the valley of the Stinkingwater. Calling at a ranch on their way, they obtained an accession to their numbers, in the person of the man who eventually brought Ives to bay, after he had escaped from the guard who had him in charge. Several men were averse to taking him with them, not believing him to be a fit man for such an errand; but they were greatly mistaken, for he was both honest and reliable, as they afterward found. Avoiding the traveled road, the troop rode round by the bluff, so as to keep clear of Dempsey's ranch. About six miles further on they called at a cabin and got a guide to pilot them to the rendezvous. At about half past three in the morning, they crossed Wisconsin creek, at a point some seven miles below Dempsey's, and found that it was frozen, but the ice was not strong enough to carry the weight of man and horse, and they went through one after another, at different points, some of the riders having to get down in order to help their horse, emerging half drowned on the other side, and continuing their journey cased in a suit of frozen clothes, which, as one of them observed, "Stuck to them like death to a dead nigger." Even the irrepressible Tom Baume was obliged to take a sharp nip at his "quid," and to summon all his fortitude to his aid to face the cold of his ice-bound "rig." The leader called a halt about a mile further on, saying, "Everyone light from his horse, hold him by the bridle, and make no noise till daybreak." Thus they stood motionless for an hour and a half. At the first peep of day the word was given, "Boys, mount your horses, and not a word pass until we are in sight of the wakiup." They had not traveled far when a dog barked. Instantly they put spurs to their horses, and breaking to the right and left, formed the "surround,"every man reining up with his shotgun bearing on the wakiup. The leader jumped from his horse, and seeing eight or ten men sleeping on the ground in front of the structure, all wrapped up in blankets, sang out, "The first man that raises will get a quart of buckshot in him before he can say Jack Robinson." It was too dark to see who they were, so he went on to the wakiup, leaving his horse in charge of one of the party, half of whom had dismounted and the others held the horses. "Is Long John here?" he asked. "Yes," said that longitudinal individual. "Come out here; I want you." "Well," said he, "I guess I know what you want me for." "Probably you do; but hurry up; we have got no time to lose." "Well," said John, "wait till I get my moccasins on, won't you?" "Be quick about it then," observed his captor. Immediately after he came out of the wakiup, and they waited about half an hour before they could see distinctly. The captain took four of his men and Long John and walked to the place where the murder had been committed, leaving the remainder of the troop in charge of the other men. They went up to the spot, and there Long John was charged with the murder. Palmer showed the position in which the body was found. He said, "I did not do it, boys." He was told that his blood would be held answerable for that of Nicholas Tbalt; for that, if he had not killed him, he knew well who had done it, and had refused to help to put his body into a wagon. "Long John," said one of the men, handling his pistol as he spoke, "you had better prepare for another world." The leader stepped between and said, "This won't do; if there is anything to be done, let us all be together." Long John was taken aside by three of the men and sat down. They looked up, and there in the faint light, about a quarter of a mile off, stood Black Bess, the mule bought by J. X. Beidler in Washington Gulch. Pointing to the animal, they said, "John, whose mule is that?" "That's the mule that Nick rode down here," he answered. "You know whose mule that is, John. Things look dark. You had better be thinking of something else now." The mule was sent for and brought before him, and he was asked where the other two mules were. He said he did not know. He was told that he had better look out for another world, for that he was played out in this. He said, "I did not commit that crime. If you give me a chance I'll clear myself." "John," said the leader, "you never can do it; for you knew of a man lying dead nine days near your house and never reported his murder; and you deserve hanging for that. Why didn't you come to Virginia and tell the people?" He replied that he was afraid and dare not do it. "Afraid of what?" asked the captain. "Afraid of the men around here. I dare not tell who they are. There's one of them around here." "Where?" "There's one of them here at the wakiup that killed Nick." "Who is he?" "George Ives." "Is he down at the wakiup?" "Yes." "You men stay here and keep watch over John, and I'll go down." Saying this he walked to the camp.

On arriving at the wakiup he paused, and picking out the man answering to the description of George Ives, he asked him, "Is your name George Ives?" "Yes," said that worthy. "I want you," was the laconic reply. "What do you want me for?" was the natural query. "To go to Virginia City," was the direct but unpleasant rejoinder. "All right," said George; "I expect I have to go." He was at once given in charge of the guard.

So innocent were some of the troop that they had adopted the "perfect gentleman" hypothesis and laid down their arms in anger at the arrest of th s murderous villian. A little experience prevented any similar exhibition of such weakness in the future. Two of the party went over to Tex, who was engaged in the highly necessary operation of changing his shirt. "I believe we shall want you, too," said one of them. Tex denuded himself of his under garment, and, throwing it towards Tom Baume, exclaimed: "There's my old shirt and plenty of graybacks; you'd better arrest them too." He was politely informed that he himself, but neither the shirt nor its population, was the object of this "unconstitutional restraint," and was asked if the pistols lying on the ground were his, which he admitted, and was thereupon told that they were wanted also, and that he must consider himself "under arrest"—a technical, yet simple, formula adopted by mountaineers to assure the individual addressed that his brains will, without further warning, be blown out if he should attempt to make a "break." Tex dressed himself and awaited further developments. There appeared to be a belief on the part of both Tex and Ives that they should get off, but when they saw the party with Long John they appeared cast down and said no more. The other men who were lying around the wakiup when the scouting party rode up were Aleck Carter, Bob Zachary, Whisky Bill, Johnny Cooper, and two innocent strangers, whose prolonged tenure of life can only be accounted for by the knowledge of the circumstances that they were without money at the time. Of the fact of the connection of the others with the band the boys were ignorant, and were drinking coffee with them, laying down their guns within the reach of the robbers, on their bed-clothes. Had the road agents possessed the nerve to make the experiment, they could have blown them to pieces. One of the party, pointing to Aleck Carter, said to the leader: "There's one good man among them, any way. I knew him on the "other side" (west of the mountains). The captain's view of the state of things was not altered by this flattering notice. He sang out in a tone of voice that signified "something's up," "Every man take his gun and keep it." In after expeditions he had no need to repeat the command. Five men were sent into the waikup and the rest stood around it. The result of their search was the capture of seven dragoon and navy revolvers, nine shotguns and thirteen rifles. These were brought out, and in laying them down one of them went off close to Tom Baume's head. Leroy Southmayde's pistol—taken from him at the time of the robbery of the coach—was one of the weapons. It was recognized at the trial of Ives by the number upon it. About half an inch of the muzzle had been broken off, and it had then been fixed up smoothly. All being now ready the party started for Dempsey's, and George, who was mounted on his spotted bob tailed pony, went along with them. He had determined to escape, and in order to carry out his design he expressed a wish to try the speed of his horse against the others, and challenged several to race with him. This was foolishly permitted, and, but for the accidental frustration of his design to procure a remount of unsurpassed speed, a score of names might have been added to the long list of his murdered victims. At Dempsey's ranch there was a bridge in course of construction, and two of the men riding ahead saw George Hilderman standing in the center, at work. He was asked if his name was George Hilderman and replied "Yes," whereupon he was informed that he was wanted to go up to Virginia City. He inquired whether they had any papers for him, and being told that they had not any he declared that he would not leave the spot; but the leader coming up told him to go "without any foolishness," in a manner that satisfied him of the inutility of resistance, and he prepared to accompany them, but not as a volunteer, by any means. He said he had no horse. Tom Baume offered him a mule. Then he had no saddle. The same kind friend found one, and he had to ride with them. His final effort was couched in the form of a declaration that the beast would not go. A stick was lying on the ground, and he received an instruction, as the conventions word it, either to "whip and ride" or "walk and drive." This, practically speaking, reconciled him to the breach of the provisions of Magna Charta and the bill of rights involved in his arrest, and he jogged along, if not comfortably, yet, at all events, in peace. In the meantime, the arch villian in custody of the main party was playing his role with much skill and with complete success. He declared his entire innocence of the awful crime with which he was charged, and rather insinuated than expressed his wish that he might be taken to Virginia, where his friends were, and that he might be tried by civil authorities (Plummer to impannel the jury), and incidentally remarked that he should not like to be tried at Nevada, for that he once killed a dog there which had scared his horse, and for that reason they had prejudices against him, which might work him serious injury in the event of a trial at that place. There is no doubt that the seeming alacrity with which he apparently yielded to the persuasion of his captors threw them off their guard, and he was permitted to ride unarmed, but otherwise unrestrained, along with the escort. So large a troop of horsemen never yet rode together, mounted on fleet cayuses, on the magnificent natural roads of Montana, without yielding to the temptation presented to try the comparative merits of their horses, and our company of partisan police were no exception to this rule. Scrub races were the order of the day, until in one of them George Ives, who was the winner, attracted the attention of the whole party by continuing the race at the top of his horse's speed; but not until he was ten rods ahead of the foremost rider did the guard(?) realize the fact that the bird had flown from the open cage. Twenty-four pairs of spurs were driven home into the flanks of twenty-four horses, and with a clatter of hoofs never since equaled on that road, they swept on like a headlong rout. For awhile the fugitive gained gradually, but surely, on his pursuers, heading for Daley's ranch, where his own fleet and favorite mare was standing bridled and saddled ready for his use (so quickly did intelligence fly in those days). Fortune, however, declared against the robber. He was too hotly pursued to be able to avail himself of the chance. His pursuers seeing a fresh horse from Virginia and a mule standing there, leaped on their backs and continued the chase. Ives turned his horse's head towards the mountains around Bivens' gulch, and across the plain, in that race for life, straining every nerve, flew the representatives of crime and justice. Three miles more had been passed when the robber found that his horse's strength was failing and every stride diminishing. The steeds of Wilson and Burtchey were in no better condition; but the use of arms might now decide the race, and springing from his horse, he dashed down a friendly ravine, whose rocky and boulder-strewn sides might offer some refuge from his relentless foes. Quick as thought the saddles of his pursuers were empty, and the trial of speed was now to be continued on foot. On arriving at the edge of the ravine, Ives was not visible; but it was evident that he must be concealed within a short distance. Burtchey quickly "surrounded" the spot, and sure enough, there was Ives crouching behind a rock. Drawing a bead on him Burtchey commanded him to come forth, and with a light and careless laugh he obeyed. The wily Bohemian was far too astute, however, to be thus overreached, and before Ives could get near enough to master his gun, a stern order to "stand fast" destroyed his last hope, and he remained motionless until assistance arrived in the person of Wilson. Two hours had elapsed between the time of the escape and the recapture and return of the prisoner. A proposition was made to the captain to raise a pole and hang him there, but this was negatived. After gaily chatting with the boys and treating them, the word was given to "mount," and in the center of a hollow square Ives began to realize his desperate situation. Tidings of the capture flew fast and far. Through every nook and dell of the inhabited parts of the Territory wildly and widely spread the news. Johnny Gibbons, who afterwards made such sly and rapid tracks for Utah, haunted with visions of vigilance committees, joined the party before they reached the canyon at Alder creek, and accompanied them to Nevada. At that time he was a part owner of the Cottonwood ranch (Dempsey's) and kept the band informed of all persons who passed with large sums of money. The detachment reached Nevada, on the evening of the 18th of December, and a discussion arose upon the question whether they should bring Ives to Virginia or detain him for the night at Nevada. The "conservatives" and "radicals" had a long argument, developing an "irrepressible conflict;" but the radicals, on a vote, carried their point—rejecting Johnny Gibbon's suffrage on account of mixed blood. It was thereupon determined to keep Ives at Nevada until morning, and then to determine the place of trial. The prisoners were separated and chained. A strong guard was posted inside and outside of the house, and the night came and went without developing anything remarkable. But all that weary night a "solitary horseman might have been seen" galloping along the road at topmost speed, with frequent relays of horses, on his way to Bannack City. This was Lieutenant George Lane, alias Clubfoot, who was sent with news of the high handed outrage that was being perpetrated in defiance of law, and with no regard whatever to the constituted authorities. He was also instructed to suggest that Plummer should come forthwith to Nevada, demand the culprit for the civil authorities, enforce that demand by what is as fitly called hocus pocus as habeas corpus, and see that he had a fair (?) trial. As soon as it was determined that Ives should remain at Nevada, Gibbons dashed up the street to Virginia, meeting a lawyer or two on the way. At the California Exchange Gibbons found Smith and Richie, and a consultation between client, attorney and prochain ami resulted in Lane's mission to Bannack, as one piece of strategy that faintly promised the hoped for rewards. All of Ives' friends were notified to be at Nevada early the next morning. The forenoon of the 19th saw the still swelling tide of miners, merchants and artisans wending their way to Nevada, and all the morning was spent in private examinations of the prisoners, and private consultations as to the best method of trial. Friends of the accused were found in all classes of society. Many of them were assiduously at work to create a sentiment in his favor, while a large multitude were there suspicious that the right man had been caught, and resolved, if such should prove to be the case, that no loop-hole of escape should be found for him in any technical form of the law.

"HOME RANCH" POINDEXTER AND ORR PROPS, BREEDERS OF FINE HORSES;- PEARL CREEK, BEAVER HEAD CO.

Although on the eve of "Forefather's Day," there was in the atmosphere the mildness and the serenity of October. There was no snow and but little ice along the edges of sluggish streams, but the sun, bright and genial, warmed the clear air, and even thawed out the congealed mud in the middle of the streets. Little boys were at play in the streets, and fifteen hundred men stood in them impatient for action, but waiting without a murmur, in order that everything might be decently done and in order. Smith, Richie, Thurmond and Colonel Wood were Ives' lawyers, with whom was associated Mr. Alex. Davis, then a comparative stranger in Montana. W. F. Sanders, at that time residing at Bannack City, but temporarily sojourning at Virginia, was sent for to conduct the prosecution, and Charles S. Bagg was appointed his colleague, at the request of Judge Wilson, Mr. Bagg being a miner and then little known. In settling upon the mode of trial much difference of opinion was developed, but the miners finally determined that it should be held in presence of the whole body of citizens, and reserved to themselves the ultimate decision of all questions; but lest something should escape their attention, and injustice thereby be done to the public, or to the prisoner, a delegation composed of twelve men from each district (Nevada and Junction) was appointed to hear the proof and to act as an advisory jury. W. H. Patton, of Nevada, and W. Y. Pemberton, of Virginia, were appointed amanuenses. An attempt to get on the jury twelve men from Virginia was defeated, and late in the afternoon the trial began and continued till nightfall. The three prisoners—George Ives, George Hilderman and Long John (John Franck)—were chained with the lightest logging chain that could be found. This was wound round their legs, and the links were secured with padlocks. In introducing testimony for the people, on the morning of the 21st, the miners informed all concerned that the trial must close at three p.m. The announcement was received with great satisfaction. It is unnecessary to describe the trial, or to recapitulate the evidence. Suffice it to say that two alibis, based on the testimony of George Brown and honest Whisky Joe, failed altogether. Among the lawyers there was, doubtless, the usual amount of browbeating and technical insolence, intermingled with displays of eloquence and learning; but not all their rhetoric could dull the perceptions of these hardy mountaineers, or mislead them from the stern and righteous purpose of all this labor, which was to secure immunity to the persons and property of the community, and to guarantee a like protection to those who should cast their lot in Montana in time to come.

The evidence was not confined to the charge of murder; but showed, also, that Ives had been acting in the character of a robber, as well as that of a murderer; and it may well be doubted whether he would have been convicted at all if developments damaging to the reputations and dangerous to the existence of some of his friends had not been made during the trial, on which they absented themselves mysteriously, and have never been seen since. There was an instinctive and unerring conviction that the worst man in the community was on trial: but it was hard work, after all the proof and all this feeling, to convict him. Prepossessing in his appearance; brave, beyond a doubt; affable in his manners; jolly and free among his comrades, and with thousands of dollars at his command; bad and good men alike working upon the feeling of the community, when they could not disturb its judgment—it seemed, at times, that all the labor was to end in disastrous failure. The crowd which gathered around that fire in front of the court is vividly before our eyes. We see the wagon containing the judge, and an advocate pleading with all his earnestness and eloquence for the dauntless robber, on whose unmoved features no shade of despondency can be traced by the fitful glare of the blazing wood, which lights up at the same time the stern and impassive features of the guard, who, in every kind of habiliments, stand in various attitudes in a circle surrounding the scene of justice. The attentive faces and compressed lips of the jurors show their sense of the vast responsibility that rests upon them, and of their firm resolve to do their duty. Ever and anon a brighter flash than ordinary reveals the expectant crowd of miners, thoughtfully and steadily gazing on the scene, and listening intently to the trial. Beyond this close phalanx, fretting and shifting around its outer edge, aways with quick and uncertain motion the wavering line of desperadoes and sympathizers with the criminal; their haggard, wild and alarmed countenances showing too plainly that they tremble at the issue which is, when decided, to drive them in exile from Montana, or to proclaim them as associate criminals, whose fate could neither be delayed nor dubious. A sight like this will ne er be seen again in Montana. It was the crisis of the fate of the Territory. Nor was the position of prosecutor, guard, juror, or judge, one that any but a brave and law-abiding citizen would choose, or even accept, marked for slaughter by desperadoes, these men staked their lives for the welfare of society. A mortal strife between Col. Sanders and one of the opposing counsel was only prevented by the prompt action of wise men, who corralled the combatants on their way to fight. The hero of that hour of trial was avowedly W. F. Sanders. Not a desperado there but would have felt honored by becoming his murderer, and yet, fearless as a lion, he stood there confronting and defying the malice of his armed adversaries. The citizens of Montana, many of them his bitter political opponents, recollect his actions with gratitude and kindly feeling. Charles S. Bagg is also remembered as having been at his post when the storm blew loudest. Judge Byam, who shouldered the responsibility of the whole proceeding, will never be forgotten by those in whose behalf he courted certain, deadly peril, and probable death. The argument of the case having terminated, the issue was, in the first place, left to the decision of the twenty-four who had been selected for that purpose, and they thereupon retired to consult. The jury were absent, deliberating on their verdict, but little less than half an hour, and on their return twenty-three made a report that Ives was proven guilty; but one member—Henry Spivey—declined to give in any finding, for unknown reasons. The crisis of the affair had now arrived. A motion was made, "That the report of the committee be received, and it discharged from further consideration of that case," which Mr. Thurmond opposed, but, upon explanation, deferred pressing his objections until the motion should be made to adopt the report, and to accept the verdict of the committee as the judgment of the people there assembled; and thus the first formal resolution passed without opposition. Before this, some of the crowd were clamorous for an adjournment, and now Ives' friends renewed the attempt; but it met with signal failure. Another motion, "That the assembly adopt as their verdict the report of the committee," was made, and called forth the irrepressible and indefatigable Thurmond and Col. J. M. Wood; but it carried, there being not more than one hundred votes against it. Here it was supposed by many that the proceedings would end for the present, and that the court would adjourn until the morrow, as it was already dark. Col. Sanders, however, mounted the wagon and having recited that Ives had been declared a murderer and a robber by the people there assembled, moved, "that George Ives be forthwith hung by the neck until he is dead"—a bold and business like movement which excited feeble opposition, and carried before the defendant seemed to realize the situation; but a friend or two and some old acquaintances having gained admission to the circle in which Ives was guarded, to bid him farewell, awakened him to a sense of the condition in which he was placed, and culprit and counsel sought to defer the execution. Some of his ardent counsel shed tears, of which lachrymose effusions it is well to say no more than that they were copious. The vision of a long and scaly creature, inhabiting the Nile, rises before us in connection with this aqueous sympathy for an assassin. Quite a number of his old chums were, as Petroleum V. Nasby says: "Weeping profoosely." Then came moving efforts to have the matter postponed until the coming morning. Ives giving assurances, upon his honor, that no attempt at rescue or escape would be made; but already Davis and Hereford were seeking a favorable spot for the execution. No more anxiously did the great Captain at Waterloo sigh for "night or Blucher," than did they for Plummer. But, relying upon him, they delayed all expedients; and when the dreaded end came, as come it must, they felt that the tide in the affairs of villains had not been taken at its flood, and, not without a struggle, they yielded to the inevitable logic of events, and because they could not help it they gave their loved companion to the gallows. Up to the very hour at which he was hanged, they were confident of Plummer's arrival in time to save him. But events were transpiring throughout the Territory which produced intense excitement, and rumor on her thousand wings was ubiquitious in her journeying on absurd errands. Before Lane reached Bannack news of Ives' arrest had reached there, with the further story that the men of Alder Gulch were wild with excitement and ungovernable from passion; that a Vigilance Committee had been formed; a number of the best citizens hanged, and that from three to five hundred men were on their way to Bannack City to hang Plummer, Ray, Stinson, George Chrisman, A. J. McDonald and others. This last "bulletin from the front" was probably the offspring of Plummer's brain. It is also likely that Lane, and perhaps Ray and Stinson, helped in the hatching of the story. Suffice it to say that Plummer told it often, shedding crocodile tears that such horrible designs existed in the minds of any, as the death of his, as yet, unrobbed friends, Chrisman, McDonald and Pitt. His was a most unctious sorrow, intended at that crisis to be seen of men in Bannack, and a number of the good citizens clubbed together to defend each other from the contemplated assault, the precise hour for which Plummer's detectives had learned, and all night long many kept watch and ward to give the attacking party a warm reception. There is no doubt that Plummer believed that such a body of men were on their way to Bannack City after him, Ray, Stinson and company. The coupling of the other names with theirs was his own work, and was an exellent tribute paid, in a backhanded way, to their integrity and high standing in the community. Lane found Plummer anxious to look after his own safety, rather than that of George Ives. The rumors carried day by day from the trial, to the band in different parts of the Territory, were surprising in their exactness, and in the celerity with which they were carried; but they were changed in each community by those most interested, into forms best suited to subserve the purposes of the robbers; and in this way did they beguile into sympathy with them in their misfortunes, many fair, honest men.

Ives' trial for murder, though not the first in the Territory, differed from any that had preceded it. Before this memorable day, citizens, in the presence of a well disciplined and numerous band of desperadoes, had spoken of their atrocities with bated breath, and witnesses upon their trial had testified in whispered humbleness. Prosecuting lawyers, too, had in their arguments often startled the public with such novel propositions as, "now, gentlemen, you have heard the witnesses, and it is for you to say whether the defendant is or is not guilty; if he is guilty, you should say so; but if not you ought to acquit him. I leave this with you, to whom it rightfully belongs." But the counsel for the defense were, at least, guiltless of uttering these last platitudes, for a vigorous defense hurt no one, and won hosts of friends—of a certain kind. But on Ives' trial there was given forth no uncertain sound. Robbery and honesty locked horns for the mastery, each struggling for empire; and each stood by his banner until the contest ended—fully convinced of the importance of victory. Judge Byam remained by the prisoner from the time judgment was given, and gave all the necessary directions for carrying it into effect. Robert Hereford was the executive officer. An unfinished house, having only the side walls up, was chosen as the best place, near at hand, for carrying into effect the sentence of death. The preparations, though entirely sufficient, were both simple and brief. The butt of a forty-foot pole was planted inside the house, at the foot of one of the walls, and the stick leaned over a cross beam. Near the point was tied the fatal cord, with the open noose dangling fearfully at its lower end. A large goods box was the platform. The night had closed in, with a bright, full moon, and around that altar of Vengeance the stern and resolute faces of the guard were visible, under all circumstances of light and shade conceivable. Unmistakable determination was expressed in every line of their bronzed and weather-beaten countenances. George Ives was led to the scaffold in fifty-eight minutes from the time that his doom was fixed. A perfect Babel of voices saluted the movement. Every roof was covered, and cries of "Hang him!" "Don't hang him!" "Banish him!" "I'll shoot." "—— their murdering souls!" "Let's hang Long John!" were heard all around. The revolvers could be seen flashing in the moonlight. The guard stood like a rock. They had heard the muttered threats of a rescue from the crowd, and with grim firmness, the characteristic of the miners when they mean "business," they stood ready to beat them back. Woe to the mob that should surge against that living bulwark. They would have fallen as grass before the scythe. Robert Hereford, the executive officer, was granted $200 by the first Legislature January 9, 1865.

Trial and Banishment of Hilderman.—The trial of Hilderman as an accomplice of the road agents took place in December, 1863. This was a wretch whose imbecility alone prevented him from taking a full part in the robberies and murders of that period. Dr. Glick proved that he was a glutton, cowardly in the extreme and incapable of taking a direct part in a murder. He was defended by Judge Smith, who succeeded in reducing his sentence to banishment from Montana. This slave to vice was given ten days to leave the territory, a rule which he observed contrary to the orders of Plummer, whom he met at Bannack.

Execution of Morgan and Jackson.—The two horse thieves and confessed road agents, named, according to their own account, John Morgan and John Jackson alias Jones, were captured and tried by the Vigilantes. The former was caught in the act of appropriating a horse in one of the Virginia city corrals. He was an old offender, and on his back were the marks of the whipping he received in Colorado for committing an unnatural crime. He was a low, vicious ruffian. His comrade was a much more intelligent man, and acknowledged the justice of his sentence without any hesitation. Morgan gave the names and signs of the gang they belonged to, of which Rattlesnake Dick was the leader. Their lifeless bodies were found hanging from a hay-frame, leaning over the corral fence at the slaughter-house, on the branch, about half a mile from the city. The printed manifesto of the Vigilantes was affixed to Morgan's clothes, with the warning words written across it, "Road Agents, beware!"

Attempt to Rob the Moody Train.—In December, 1863, M. S. Moody, J. S. Rockfellow, J. M. Bozeman, Henry Branson, John McCormick, Billy Sloane and M. V. Jones left en route to Salt Lake with $75,000 in gold. This party arrived at Black Tail Deer canon for breakfast, and camped close to a sharp turn in the trail, when they heard robbers conversing close by. Immediately, Steve Marshland and Dutch John (Wagner) galloped round the bend, took in the situation in a moment, and pretended to push forward in search of stolen horses. The robbers had a full chance to murder the whole party during the night previous; but on the motion of Steve Marshland action was deferred. After this unexpected rencontre the agents pushed their horses forward, and came up with the packers on the divide below Red Rock. Dutch John covered the men with his rifle, while Marshland searched the packs and wagons. Owing to the criminal carelessness and subsequently the cowardice of the party, those scoundrels escaped with slight wounds.

Capture and Execution of Brown and Yager.—The offices of secretary and courier in the road agents' circle were filled by George W. Brown and Erastus Yager respectively. In December, 1863, it was resolved to bring those agents to justice, and on the 23d of that month a party of Vigilantes left by way of the Stinkingwater, Big Hole and Main Range divide to carry out the law. On Deer Lodge creek the party met Erastus Yager (Red), but failed to recognize him. He told the party, however, that Aleck Carter, Bill Graves, Bill Bunton and other desperadoes were lying at Cottonwood drunk. That night the party camped seventeen miles above Cottonwood at John Smith's ranch. On arriving at Cottonwood they learned that the robbers had fled; and a letter, afterwards delivered to Thomas Reilly, pointed out that Secretary Brown had written to the agents to flee, which letter was carried to them by Yager. While returning, the party met friends who told them that Yager was at Rattlesnake ranch. Thither the seekers went, surrounded the ranch and captured Buck Stinson and Ned Ray. Yager was captured in a wakeup a few hundred yards distant. Brown was captured at Dempsey's ranch, where he was barkeeper. They were taken to Virginia for trial, when Yager or Red gave the roster of the agents' society. Red began by informing them that Plummer was chief of the band; Bill Bunton second in command and stool pigeon; Sam Bunton, roadster (sent away for being a drunkard); Cyrus Skinner, roadster, fence and spy. At Virginia city, George Ives, Stephen Marshland, Dutch John (Wagner), Aleck Carter, Whiskey Bill (Graves), were roadsters; George Shears was a roadster and horse-thief; Johnny Cooper and Buck Stinson were also roadsters; Ned Ray was council-room keeper at Bannack city; Mexican Frank and Bob Zachary were also roadsters; Frank Parish was roadster and horse-thief; Boone Helm and Club-Foot George were roadsters; Haze Lyons and Bill Hunter were roadsters and telegraph men; George Lowry, Billy Page, Doc Howard, Jem Romaine, Billy Terwilliger and Gad Moore were roadsters. The password was "Innocent." They wore a neck-tie fastened with a "sailors' knot," and shaved down to mustache and chin whiskers. He admitted that he was one of the gang, but denied—as they invariably did—that he was a murderer. He also stated that Brown—his fellow-captive—acted in the capacity before mentioned. He spoke of Bill Bunton with a fierce animosity quite unlike his usual suave and courteous manner. To him, he said, he owed his present miserable position. He it was that first seduced him to commit crime at Lewiston. He gave the particulars of the robberies of the coaches and of many other crimes, naming the perpetrators. The culprits were hanged forthwith, January 4, 1864, and on Red's back was fixed a label reading thus: Red! Road Agent and Messenger, and on Brown's: Brown! Corresponding Secretary.

Execution of Wagner, January 11, 1864.—The arrest of Dutch John (Wagner), January 2, 1864, was accomplished by Neil Howie, and his execution took place January 11, 1864. He was charged with attacking the Moody train in December, 1863, and of participation in the doings of Plummer's agents. On the advice of Plummer he stole a gray horse from Barrett & Shineberger, of Horse prairie, and was about leaving the territory, when Barrett's party pursued him, recaptured their horse, took the saddle and pistol from the robber, and giving him an old mule and blanket, told him to get out of the country as fast as possible. He left Horse prairie via the Salt Lake trail, accompanied by an armed Bannack Indian. He was met two miles below the site of Dry Creek Canon ranch by Neil Howie, who followed and captured him in the face of every difficulty. The description of the arrest is taken from Dimsdale:

"In an instant he determined to arrest the robber at all risks, single handed. He called out, 'Hallo, Cap! hold on a minute.' Wagner wheeled his horse half round, and Neil, fixing his eyes upon him, walked straight towards him with empty hands. His trusty revolver hung at his belt, however, and those who have seen the machine-like regularity and instantaneous motion with which Howie draws and cocks a revolver, as well as the rapidity and accuracy of his shooting, well know that few men, if any, have odds against him in an encounter with fire-arms. Still, not one man in a thousand would, at a range of thirty yards, walk up to a renowned desperado, sitting quietly with a loaded rifle in his hand, and well knowing the errand of his pursuer. Yet this gallant fellow never faltered. At twenty yards their eyes met, and the gleam of anger, hate, and desperation that shot from those of Dutch John spoke volumes He also slewed round his rifle, with the barrel in his left hand and his right on the small of the stock. Howie looked him straight down, and, as Wagner made the motion with his rifle, his hand mechanically sought his belt. No further demonstration being made, he continued his progress, which he had never checked, till he arrived within a few steps of the Dutchman, and there read perplexity, hesitation, anger, and despair in his fiery glances. Those resolved and unwavering grey eyes seemed to fascinate Wagner. Five paces separated them, and the twitching of Wagner's muscles showed that it was touch and go, sink or swim. Four!—three!—two!—one! Fire flashes from John's eyes. He is awake at last; but it is too late. Neil has passed the butt of his rifle, and in tones quiet but carrying authority with them, he broke the silence with the order, 'Give me your gun and get off your mule.' A start and a shudder ran through Wagner's frame like an electric shock. He complied, however, and expressed his willingness to go with Neil, both then and several times afterward, adding that he need fear nothing from him."

The arrest accomplished, Howie left his prisoner in charge of the train while he sought assistance; but no one would assist. Ultimately John Fetherstone volunteered, and both escorted the heavy villain to Bannack, where a few Vigilantes from Virginia soon arrived. At midnight Wagner had lain down to rest, when he was awakened from sleep by a summons to get up, for some men had come from Virginia to see him. He put on his clothes hastily, and found that four trustworthy individuals had arrived from Virginia city. The letter which they brought contained instructions to arrest, try and execute Plummer, Stinson and Ray. Neil Howie and his friend Fetherstone guarded the criminal in a cabin on Yankee flat.

The evening after the death of Pizanthia, the newly organized committee met and voted on the question of Dutch John's death. The verdict was in favor of death within one hour. He petitioned to have his arms and legs cut off rather than die; but the Vigilantes were inflexible. He was taken to the spot where the bodies of Stinson and Plummer were laid out, and there hanged.

Execution of Stephen Marshland, January 16, 1864.—A party of twenty-one men set out from Nevada City, January 15, 1864, in pursuit of Steve Marshland. He was captured at Clarke's Ranch, near the Big Hole River, by Vigilanter No. 84, who found the desperado in bed. Dimsdale states that:

"No. 84" removed two double-barrelled shot guns, a yager and another rifle, from beside the bed, and asked him where he froze them. He said he was prospecting at the head of Rattlesnake. "Did you raise the 'color?'" said his interrogator. "No," replied Marshland, "I could not get to the bed-rock for water." The party commenced cooking supper, and invited him to eat with them. He took a cup of coffee and was quite merry. After supper he was informed by the leader of the nature of the charge against him, viz., the robbery of Forbes' train. He denied having any wound, and slapped his breast, saying that it was "as sound as a dollar." Being asked if he had any objection to being examined, he said he had not; but the moment his shirt was lifted the fatal mark of guilt was visible, in the shape of a recent bullet wound. The prisoner was told that the evidence was complete, and that he must die. He then confessed, begging them to spare his life. He had matches and tobacco in every pocket of his clothes. A pole was stuck into the ground and leaned over the corral; a box was placed for him to stand on, and, all being ready, he once more begged to save him, saying "have mercy on me for my youth." He died almost instantly. His feet being frozen and partially mortified, the scent attracted the wolves, and the party had to watch both him and the horses. He was buried close by. The patrol then started to overtake the main body, and coming up with them about four miles above Evans' Ranch, they reported the execution of Marshland. They had been absent only one night, leaving the command in the morning and rejoining them the next day. Up to this time the scouting party had met no one, but marched in double file, at the rate of from sixty to seventy miles per day. They kept double watch over the horses when camped, and lit no fires, being fearful of attracting notice and of thus defeating the object of their journey. The men were divided into four messes, with a cook to each, and every party carried its own "grub" and arms. A spy was dispatched to reconnoitre the town and to meet the party at Coltonwood Creek.

Execution of Plummer, Ray and Stinson, January 10, 1864.—Throughout the records of the road agents there are not to be found a trio who merited punishment in a higher degree than the Chief of the band, and his two lieutenants who died with him on January 10, 1864. The execution of Ives brought a sense of relief to citizens, but that of Plummer, Ray and Stinson brought greater relief, for it afforded men leave to speak and act without fear of the desperate characters who literally checked the smiles as well as the opinions of the good citizens of Eastern Idaho. After the execution of Ives, the Chief saw too plainly that the party of order was determined to assert its authority, and entered at once on plans to meet this crisis. Prof. Dimsdale says:

"At dusk, three horses were brought into town, belonging severally and respectively to the three marauders so often mentioned, Plummer, Stinson and Ray. It was truly conjectured that they had determined to leave the country, and it was at once settled that they should be arrested that night. Parties were detailed for the work. Those entrusted with the duty performed it admirably. Plummer was undressing when taken at his house. His pistol (a self-cocking weapon) was broken and useless. Had he been armed, resistance would have been futile; for he was seized the moment the door was opened in answer to the knocking from without. Stinson was arrested at Toland's, where he was spending the evening. He would willingly have done a little firing, but his captors were too quick for him. Ray was lying on a gaming table when seized. The three details marched their men to a given point, en route to the gallows. Here a halt was made. The leader of the Vigilantes and some others, who wished to save all unnecessary hard feeling, were sitting in a cabin, designing not to speak to Plummer, with whom they were so well acquainted. A halt was made, however, and at the door appeared Plummer. The light was extinguished, when the party moved on, but soon halted. The crisis had come. Seeing that the circumstances were such as admitted of neither vacillation nor delay, the citizen leader, summoning his friends, went up to the party and gave the military command, "Company! forward—march!" This was at once obeyed. A rope taken from a noted functionary's bed had been mislaid and could not be found. A nigger boy was sent off for some of that highly necessary, but unpleasant remedy for crime, and the bearer made such good time that some hundreds of feet of hempen neck-tie were on the ground before the arrival of the party at the gallows. On the road Plummer heard the voice and recognized the person of the leader. He came to him and begged for his life; but was told, "it is useless for you to beg for your life; that affair is settled and cannot be altered. You are to be hanged. You cannot feel harder about it than I do; but I could not help it if I would." Ned Ray, clothed with curses as with a garment, actually tried fighting, but found that he was in the wrong company for such demonstrations; and Buck Stinson made the air ring with the blasphemous and filthy expletives which he used in addressing his captors. Plummer exhausted every argument and plea that his imagination could suggest, in order to induce his captors to spare his life. He begged to be chained down in the meanest cabin; offered to leave the country forever; wanted a jury trial; implored time to settle his affairs; asked to see his sister-in-law; and falling on his knees, with tears and sighs, declared to God that he was too wicked to die. He confessed his numerous murders and crimes, and seemed almost frantic at the prospect of death. The first rope being thrown over the cross-beam, and the noose being rove, the order was given to "bring up Ned Ray." This worthy was run up with curses on his lips. Being loosely pinioned, he got his fingers between the rope and his neck, and thus prolonged his misery. Buck Stinson saw his comrade robber swinging in the death agony, and blubbered out, "There goes poor Ed. Ray." Scant mercy had he shown to his numerous victims. By a sudden twist of his head at the moment of his elevation, the knot slipped under his chin, and he was some minutes dying. An order to "bring up Plummer" was then passed and repeated, but no one stirred. The leader went over to this perfect gentleman, as his friends called him, and was met by a request to "give a man time to pray." Well knowing that Plummer relied for a rescue on other than Divine aid, he said briefly and decidedly, "Certainly; but let him say his prayers up here." Finding all efforts to avoid death were useless, Plummer arose and said no more prayers. Standing under the gallows which he had erected for the execution of Horan, this second Haman slipped off his neck-tie and threw it over his shoulder to a young friend who had boarded at his house, and who believed him innocent of crime, saying as he tossed it to him, "Here is something to remember me by." In the extremity of his grief, the young man threw himself weeping and wailing upon the ground. Plummer requested that the men would give him a good drop, which was done, as far as circumstances permitted, by hoisting him up as high as possible in their arms, and letting him fall suddenly. He died quickly and without much struggle. It was necessary to seize Ned Ray's hand, and by a violent effort draw his fingers from between the noose and his neck before he died."

Execution of Joe Pizanthia (Greaser), January 11, 1864. The arrest and execution of this unmerciful agent, at Bannack, January 11, 1864, was a scene quite in keeping with the character of this desperado. George Copley, a member of the Committee, was mortally wounded, and Smith Ball, also a member, wounded in the hip by the criminal's fire. In the order of justice the murder of one and the wounding of another good citizen appeared to be necessary to draw forth full justice in Pizanthia's case. Such was the effect,—hanging was too simple a punishment for such a demon,—that the assault upon the two citizens mentioned had actually driven the spectators to wreak upon him the punishment recorded by Dimsdale: "On Monday morning it was determined to arrest 'the Greaser,' Joe Pizanthia, and to see precisely how his record stood in the Territory. Outside of it it was known that he was a desperado, a murderer and a robber; but that was not the business of the Vigilantes. A party started for his cabin, which was built in a side-hill. The interior looked darker than usual from the bright glare of the surrounding snow. The summons to come forth being disregarded, Smith Ball and George Copley entered, contrary to the advice of their comrades, and instantly received the fire of their concealed foe. Copley was shot through the breast. Smith Ball received a bullet in the hip. They both staggered out, each ejaculating, 'I'm shot.' Copley was led off by two friends, and died of his wound. Smith Ball recovered himself, and was able to empty his six-shooter into the body of the assassin, when the latter was dragged forth. The popular excitement rose nearly to madness. Copley was a much-esteemed citizen, and Smith Ball had many friends. It was the instant resolution of all present that the vengeance on the Greaser should be summary and complete. A party whose military experience was still fresh in their memory made a rush, at the double-quick, for a mountain howitzer which lay dismounted where it had been left by the train to which it was attached. Without waiting to place it on the carriage, it was brought by willing hands to within five rods of the windowless side of the cabin, and some old artillerists, placing it on a box, loaded it with shell, and laid it for the building. By one of those omissions so common during times of excitement, the fuse was left uncut, and, being torn out in its passage through the logs, the missile never exploded, but left a clean breach through the wall, making the chips fly. A second shell was put into the gun, and this time the fuse was cut, but the range was so short that the explosion took place after it had traversed the house. Thinking that Pizanthia might have taken refuge in the chimney, the howitzer was pointed for it and sent a solid shot through it. Meanwhile the military judgment of the leader had been shown by the posting of some riflemen opposite the shot-hole, with instructions to maintain so rapid a fire upon it that the beleagured inmate should not be able to use it as a crenelle through which to fire upon the assailants. No response being given to the cannon and small-arms, the attacking party began to think of storming the dwelling. The leader called for volunteers to follow him. Nevada cast in her lot first, and men from the crowd joined. The half dozen stormers moved steadily, under cover to the edge of the last building, and then dashed at the house across the open space. The door had fallen from the effects of the fusillade; but, peeping in, they could see nothing until a sharp eye noticed the Greaser's boots protruding. Two lifted the door, while Smith Ball drew his revolver and stood ready. The remainder seized the boots. On lifting the door, Pizanthia was found lying flat and badly hurt. His revolver was beside him. He was quickly dragged out, Smith Ball paying him for the wound he had received by emptying his revolver into him. A clothes-line was taken down and fastened round his neck; the leader climbed a pole, and the rest holding up the body, he wound the rope round the top of the stick of timber, making a jam hitch. While aloft, fastening all securely, the crowd blazed away upon the murderer swinging beneath his feet. At his request, 'Say, boys! stop shooting a minute'—the firing ceased, and he came down 'by the run.' Over one hundred shots were discharged at the swaying corpse. A friend—one of the four Bannack originals—touched the leader's arm and said, 'Come and see my bonfire.' Walking down to the cabin, he found that it had been razed to the ground by the maddened people, and was then in a bright glow of flame. A proposition to burn the Mexican was received with a shout of exultation. The body was hauled down and thrown upon the pile, upon which it was burned to ashes so completely that not a trace of a bone could be seen when the fire burned out. In the morning some women of ill-fame actually panned out the ashes, to see whether the desperado had any gold in his purse. We are glad to say that they were not rewarded for their labors by striking any auriferous deposit."

Execution of Helm, Parish, Lyon, Galaher and Lane, January 14, 1864.—Seldom or never were scoundrels more ripe for hanging than those sent to their account on January 14, 1864, at Virginia City. No man's life was safe in their presence, no property was secure from their attacks. Honor and virtue trembled when they approached; and in all things each of them was the bete noir of society. It is difficult to estimate the public virtue which led to the capture of this unholy band of desperate men. The Swiss had not such a terrible opposition to meet from the tyrants of Austria, than that which the good citizens of Eastern Idaho might expect from this well organized society of robbers. Led on, however, by the justice of their cause, and the actual necessity for stringent measures against the malefactors the Committee advanced in the good work and ceased not to labor until the last desperado was hanged or banished. The Vigilantes resolved on hanging six road agents, January 13, 1864, at a time when five of them were engaged at a gaming table in Virginia City. On the morning of the 14th, Frank Parish was arrested and charged with robbing the Virginia and Bannack coach, horse stealing, etc. Geo. Lane, or Club-foot George, was arrested in Dance & Stuart's store. Boone Helm was arrested in front of the Virginia hotel. Haze Lyon was captured in a miner's cabin near Virginia, and Jack Gallaher at the Arbor Restaurant, near the Shades. The evidences of their guilt were too patent to require much time for investigation, so that the Committee decided unanimously on their execution. Pending preparations for their "taking off," they indulged in the vilest blasphemy, too horrible to recite, and while yet the rope was waiting on its victims, requests and remarks escaped from the criminals as horrible as it is possible to conceive. They were hanged from the main beam of a then unfinished building, corner of Wallace and Van Buren streets, where Clayton & Hale subsequently carried on their drug business.

Execution of William Bunton, January 19, 1864.—In January, 1864, the Committee of Safety resolved to give attention to the desperadoes of Deer Lodge and Missoula counties. A party of men left Nevada City January 15, and after rendering justice to Steve Marshland on January 16, at Clarke's ranch, proceeded en route to Bunton's saloon. When within about seventeen miles of Cottonwood, at Smith's ranch, on Deer Lodge creek, a halt was made about 4 P.M. After dark they started, and with perfect quiet and caution rode to within a short distance of the town. They found that the robbers were gone; but, surrounding Bill Bunton's saloon and dwelling house, they proceeded to business. Bill was in his house, but he refused to open the door. The three men detailed for his arrest said they wanted to see him. For a long time he refused. At last he told a man named Yank and a young boy who was stopping with him to open the door. The men made him light a candle before they would enter. This being done, Bunton's captors rushed in and told him that he was their prisoner. He asked them for what, and was told to come along and that he would find out. A Vigilanter of small stature but of great courage fastened upon him. He found, however, that he had caught a Tartar, so another man "piled on" (Montanice), and soon his arms were fast tied behind him. A guard was detailed to escort him down to Pete Martin's house, the rest being sent for to assist in taking Tex out of the saloon. A similar scene occurred here when the robber came out. He was instantly seized, pinioned, and taken down to keep company with his friend Bill Bunton. Pete Martin was frightened out of a year's growth when the Vigilanters surrounded his house. He was playing cards with some friends, and for a long time refused to come out; but finding that, as he said, "he wasn't charged with nothing," he ascertained what was wanted, and then returned to finish his game. As the exigencies of the times had rendered a little hanging necessary in that neighborhood, he felt small concern about the fate of Bunton and Tex, who were of a dangerous religion. The party slept and breakfasted at the house. In the morning a stranger who was conversing with Bunton, to whom he was unknown, informed the Vigilantes that the culprit had said that "he would 'get' one of the ——— yet." On being searched a derringer was found in his vest pocket. As he had been carefully overhauled the night before it was evident that some sympathizer had furnished him with the weapon. He refused to confess anything, even his complicity in the robbery of the coach, where he played "pigeon." Red had testified that he shared the money. He also denied killing Jack Thomas' cattle; but Red had confessed that he himself was the butcher, and that he had been hired by Bunton, who called him a coward when he spoke about the skins lying around the house, as being likely to be identified. There being no possible doubt of his criminality, the vote on his case was taken with the uplifted hand, and resulted in a unanimous verdict of guilty. The captain then told him that he was to be hanged, and that if he had any business to attend to he had better get some one to do it. He gave his gold watch to his partner, Cooke, and his other property to pay his debts. He had won his interest in the saloon some fourteen days before by gambling it from its owner. Tex was taken to another house and was separately tried. After a patient investigation the robber was cleared, the evidence not being sufficient to convict him. Had the Vigilantes held him in custody for a time Tex would have experienced a difficulty in his breathing that would have proved quickly fatal; for testimony in abundance was afterward obtained, proving conclusively that he was a highwayman and common thief. He made all sail for Kootenai, and there boasted that he would shoot any Vigilanter he could set eyes on. About two hundred and fifty feet to the left front of Pete Martin's house, at the gate of Louis Demorest's corral, there were two upright posts and a cross-beam. The prisoner was taken out, and put upon a board supported by two boxes. Being asked if he had anything to say or to request, he said, "No; all I want is a mountain three hundred feet high to jump off. I shall give the time, one, two, three." He gave the signal and leaped off the trap. He died without a struggle, his body was interred, and the poles which formed the scaffold were cut down at the request of the corral keeper's wife. (Dimsdale.)

Execution of Skinner, Cooper and Carter, January 25, 1864.—The party sent north from Nevada January 15, 1864, to punish the robbers at Hell Gate, arrived at the latter place on January 23. Skinner, one of the desperadoes for whom they were searching, kept a saloon at Hell Gate, and this saloon was the headquarters of the northern agents. Dimsdale, in his natural statement of facts, says:

"On their road from Cottonwood to Hell Gate the troop was accompanied by Jemmy Allen, toward whose ranch they were directing their steps. The weather was anything but pleasant for traveling, the quantity of snow making it laborious work for the Vigilantes, and the cold was very hard to endure without shelter. At the crossing of Deer Lodge creek the ice gave way and broke through with the party. It was pitch dark at the time, and much difficulty was experienced in getting out both men and horses. One cavalier was nearly drowned; but a lariat being put round the horse's neck, it was safely dragged out. The rider scrambled to the bank somehow or other—memory furnishes the result only, not the detail—and jumping onto the 'animal,' he rode on a keen run to the ranch, which was some four or five miles ahead. The remainder of the cavalcade traveled on more leisurely, arriving there about 11 P.M., and having recruited a little they wrapped themselves in blankets and slumber without delay. Next morning, in company with Charley Eaton, who was acquainted with the country and with the folks around Hell Gate, they started for that locality, and after riding fifteen or sixteen miles through snow varying in depth from two to three feet they camped for the night. The horses being used to foraging, pawed for their food. The next morning the party crossed the bridge, and rode to the workmen's quarters on the Mullan Wagon Road, where, calling a halt, they stopped all night.

"At daylight the troop were in their saddles and pushing as rapidly as possible for the village. On arriving within six miles of the place the command halted on the bank of a small creek till after dark, to avoid being seen on the road. As soon as night threw her mantle over the scene they continued their journey till within two hundred yards of Hell Gate, and there dismounting, they tied their horses.

"Their scout had gone ahead to reconnoitre, and returning to the rendezvous, he informed the captain of the exact position of affairs. Coming through the town on a tight run, they mistook the houses; but, discovering their error, they soon returned, and surrounding Skinner's saloon, the owner, who was standing at the door, was ordered to throw up his hands. His woman (Nelly) did not appear to be pleased at the command, and observed that they must have learned that from the Bannack stage folks. Skinner was taken and bound immediately. Some of the men went for Aleck Carter, who was in Miller's, the next house. Dan Harding opened the door, and seeing Carter, said, 'Aleck, is that you?' to which the road agent promptly replied, 'Yes.' The men leveled their pieces at him, and the leader, going over to the lounge on which he was lying, rather drunk, took his pistol from him and bound him before he was thoroughly aroused. When he came to himself he said, 'This is tight papers, ain't it, boys?' He then asked for a smoke, which, being given to him, he inquired for the news. On hearing of the hanging of the blood-stained miscreants whose doom has been recorded in these pages he said, 'All right; not an innocent man hung yet.'

"He was marched down under guard to Higgins' store, where he and Skinner were tried, the examination lasting about three hours. Skinner's woman came down, bent on interference in his behalf. The lady was sent home with a guard, who found Johnny Cooper lying wounded in the house. He had been shot in three places by Carter, whom he had accused of stealing his pistol. He was, of course, instantly secured.

"Cooper was one of the lieutenants of the gang. A man named President, who was present at his apprehension, knew him well on the 'other side.' While Aleck Carter was on trial he confessed that the two mules of which Nicholas Tbalt was in charge, when shot by Ives, were at Irwin's ranch, at Big Hole, and that he, Irwin and Ives had brought them there. It will be remembered that, besides robbing the coach, Aleck was accessory both before and after the fact of Tbalt's murder. This was proved. That he was a principal in its perpetration is more than likely. He denied all participation in the murder, but confessed, generally speaking, much in the same style as others had done.

"Skinner also refused to confess any of his crimes. 'Dead men tell no tales,' was his verdict, when planning the murder of Magruder, and he it was who ingratiated himself into the favor of Page, Romaine, and others, and prompted them to the deed, so that Magruder thought his murderers were his friends, and went on his last journey without suspicion. He said he could have saved him if he had liked to."

Execution of Bob Zachary, George Shears and William Graves, January 25 and 26, 1864.—Never was the power of the people shown in truer colors than in the pursuit, capture and execution of the last of the desperadoes. The fact that the territory was to be completely cleaned out of evil doers was never inculcated with such precision and despatch. After the trial of the Skinner gang at Hell Gate, eight members of the committee went in search of the worthies named:

"The same night," says Dimsdale, "a detachment of eight men went in pursuit of Bob Zachary, and coming up to Barney O'Keefe's, that gentleman appeared in the uniform of a Georgia major, minus the spurs and shirt collar, and plus a flannel blouse. He mistook the party for road agents, and appeared to think his time had come. He ejaculated with visible horror, "Don't shoot, gentlemen; I'm Barney O'Keefe." It is useless to say that no harm was done to the "Baron," as he is called. There are worse men living in all countries than Barney, who is a good soul in his own way, and hospitable in his nature. Finding that Bob Zachary was inside, one of the party entered, and, as he sat up in bed, threw himself upon him and pushed him backwards. He had a pistol and a knife. He was taken to Hell Gate shortly after his capture. The fate of his friends was made known to him, and vouched for by a repetition of the signs, grips, passwords, etc. On seeing this he turned pale, but never made any confession of guilt. He was the one of the stage robbers who actually took the money from Southmayde. Like all the rest, he repeated the password of the gang, "I am innocent."

On the road back the guard had wormed out of Barney that a stranger was stopping at Van Dorn's in the Bitter Root Valley. "No. 84," who was leading the party who captured Shears, asked: "Does Van live here?" "Yes," said the man himself. "Is George Shears in your house?" asked 84. "Yes," said Van. "Where is he?" "In the next room." "Any objection to our going in?" The man replied by opening the door of the room, on which George became visible, knife in hand. He gave himself up quietly, and seemed so utterly indifferent to death that he perfectly astonished his captors Taking a walk with 84, he pointed out to him the stolen horses in the corral and confessed his guilt as a man would speak of the weather. He said, "I knew I should have to go up some time, but I thought I could run another season." When informed of his doom, he appeared perfectly satisfied. On being taken into the barn, where a rope was thrown over a beam, he was asked to walk up a ladder to save trouble about procuring a drop. He at once complied, addressing his captors in the following unique phraseology: "Gentlemen, I am not used to this business, never having been hung before. Shall I jump off or slide off?" Being told to jump off, he said, "All right; good-bye," and leaped into the air with as much sang froid as if bathing.

William Graves was hanged January 26, 1864. A company of three, headed by the "old man," started off to Fort Owen, in the Bitter Root Valley, in pursuit of Whisky Bill. This worthy was armed and on the look-out for his captors; but it seems he had become partially snow-blind by long gazing. At all events he did not see the party with sufficient distinctness to ascertain who they were, until the "old man" jumped from his horse and covered him with his revolver. He gave up, though he had repeatedly sworn that he would shoot any Vigilanter who would come his way. His guilt was notorious throughout all the country, and his capture was merely a preliminary to his execution. The men took him away from the fort, in deference to the prejudices of the Indians, who would have felt no desire to live near where a man had been hanged. Graves made no confession. He was what is called in the mountains a "bull-head," and was a sulky, dangerous savage. Being tied up to a limb, the difficulty was to make a "drop;" but the ingenuity of the leader was equal to the emergency. One of the men mounted his horse. Graves was lifted up behind him, and all being ready, "Good-bye, Bill," said the front horseman, driving his huge rowels into the horse's flanks as he spoke. The animal made a plunging bound of twelve feet, and Bill Graves, swept from his seat by the fatal noose and lariat, swung lifeless. His neck was broken by the shock.

The different parties rendezvoused at Hell Gate and a company of eight men were dispatched to the Pen d'Oreille Reserve, to get Johnny Cooper's horses, six or seven in number. They were poor in condition, and were nearly all sold to pay the debts which the road agent had incurred in the country round about the village. The remainder were brought to Nevada. It seems that Aleck Carter and Cooper were about to start for Kootenai on the previous day and that their journey was prevented only by their quarrel about the pistol, which Cooper charged Aleck with stealing, and which resulted in the wounding of Cooper, the delay of their journey, and in fact in their execution. A pack animal laden with their baggage and provisions carried $130 worth of goods. These were taken for the use of the expedition; but on a representation made by Higgins that he had supplied them to Carter to get rid of him, but that he had received nothing for them, they were paid for on the spot by the Vigilantes. Brown, a Frenchman, living in the neighborhood, stated to the Vigilantes that he was glad to see them, for that the robbers used to ride his stock whenever they pleased and that they always retained possession of such steeds as they especially fancied. Cooper had determined to marry his daughter, a pretty half-breed girl, and then, after getting all that he could lay hands on, he intended to turn the old man adrift. He used to go to his intended father-in-law and inform him that he wanted another of those pretty pocket pieces ($20 gold pieces), and he always obtained what he asked; for death would have been the instant penalty of refusal.

At the conclusion of the trials of Carter and Skinner, a vote was taken by stepping to the opposite sides of the room; but the verdict of guilty and a judgment of death to the culprits were unanimously rendered.

Johnny Cooper was tried separately, and interrogated by Mr. President concerning his conduct on the "other side." He denied the whole thing; but this gentleman's testimony, the confession of Red, and the witness of the inhabitants rendered a conviction and sentence of death inevitable. He was hanged at Higgins' corral.

Carter and skinner were taken to Higgins' corral and executed by torchlight, shortly after midnight. Two poles were planted, leaning over the corral fence; to these the ropes were tied, and store boxes served for "drops."

Execution of William Hunter (Bill), February 3, 1864.—Bill Hunter, the last of Plummer's Men, made his escape from Virginia City, January 13, 1864, at a moment when the arrest of his confederates was planned by the committee of safety, and sought refuge in Gallatin county. His whereabouts were discovered, and information sent to Virginia City, that he could be found above the mouth of the Gallatin. Acting on this information, a party of four men left Virginia, crossed the divide between the Ruby and Madison, and forded the Madison river, where they camped. Early on February 2, 1864, the party resumed the journey, reached Milk ranch early in the afternoon. After a short stay here, they pushed on twenty miles, and found shelter in a cabin, where they were supposed to be miners by the inmates. When all was ready to leave on the morning of February 3, one of the party asked who was the unknown sleeper that, at that late hour, had never waked or uncovered his face. The host said that he did not know; but upon being asked, "When did he come here?" he informed them that he had come at the beginning of the great snow storm, and had been there two days. The man was requested to describe his person and appearance. He complied at once, and in so doing he gave a perfect picture of Bill Hunter. With arms prepared for instant service, the Vigilantes approached the bed, and the leader called out, "Bill Hunter!" The occupant of the bed hastily drew the covering from his face, and wildly asked who was there. His eyes were greeted with the sight of six well-armed men, whose determined countenances and stern looks told him only too truly the nature of their errand. Had he been in doubt, however, this matter would soon have been settled, for the six shot-guns leveled at his head were answer enough to palsy the arm of grim despair himself. On being asked if he had any arms, he said, "Yes, I have a revolver;" and accordingly he handed it from beneath the bed-clothes, where he had held it, lying on his breast, ready cocked for use. The old vigilanter who made the inquiries, not being very soft, or easily caught at a disadvantage, took the precaution when approaching him to lay his hand on his breast, so that, had he been willing, he could have done nothing, for his weapon was mastered while his hand was covered. He was of course informed that he was a prisoner, upon hearing which he at once asked to be taken to Virginia City. One of the men gave him to understand that he would be taken there. He further inquired whether there was any conveyance for him, and was told that there was a horse for him to ride. He rose from his bed, ready dressed for the occasion, except his overcoat and hat, and mounted the horse prepared for him; but, upon preparing to take the rein, his motion was politely negatived, and the bridle was handed to a horseman, who held it as a leading bridle. He looked suspiciously round, and appeared much perturbed when he saw a footman following, for he at once guessed that it was his horse that he was riding, and the incident seemed to be regarded by him in the light of an omen foreboding a short journey for him. His conscience told him what was likely to be the end of his arrest. The real reason why an evasive answer had been given to the prisoner when he expressed a wish to be taken to Virginia City, was that his captors were anxious to leave the place without exciting suspicion of any intention to execute Bill Hunter in the neighborhood. The escort proceeded on their way homeward for about two miles, and halted at the foot of a tree which seemed as if it had been fashioned by nature for a gallows. A horizontal limb at a convenient height was there for the rope, and on the trunk was a spur, like a belaying pin, on which to fasten the end. Scraping away about a foot of snow, they camped, lit a fire and prepared their breakfast. An onlooker would never have conjectured for a moment that anything of a serious nature was likely to occur, and even Hunter seemed to have forgotten his fears, laughing and chatting gaily with the rest. After breakfast a consultation was held as to what should be done with the road agent, and after hearing what was offered by the members of the scouting party, individually, the leader put the matter to vote. It was decided by the majority that the prisoner should not go to Virginia, but that he should be executed then and there. He was hanged at a point twenty miles above the mouth of the Gallatin. This expedition was known as the Barney Hughes' Stampede. (Vide Dimsdale and contributions.)

Execution of James A. Slade.—In February, 1864, James A. Slade, a ranchman on the Madison, came into Virginia, got drunk, as usual, and threatened to tear down the town. On the morning of February 10, he was arrested by Sheriff J. M. Fox, brought before the court and the warrant for his arrest read for him. He became enraged, siezed the warrant, tore it in pieces, and in a moment was master of the situation. Later he presented a revolver at the head of Judge Alex. Davis and declared he would hold the Judge a hostess for his own safety. The failure of the laws to protect citizens suggested their duty to the Vigilantes. The miners' committee from Nevada, came on the scene, and in the face of every entreaty and opposition hanged him from the corral gate, which then stood on the site of Pfouts and Russell's stone building.

Execution of an Indian, April, 1864.—In April, 1864, the citizens of Hell's Gate suppressed, in a summary way, what threatened to be a serious Indian outbreak. In the fall of 1863, a young Pen d'Oreille Indian killed a man named Ward, in the Hell's Gate canon, near the place where Baker's station is now located. In the spring of 1864 this same Indian, having been joined by a number of young bucks, bid defiance to and threatened the lives of several of the white settlers, and even fired at one Frenchman. The citizens sent a courier to Deer Lodge and Alder gulch for assistance. John Powell and one or two others came from Deer Lodge, and a few men from Alder gulch, but before the latter arrived, the Indians became alarmed, delivered up the guilty Indian, when the citizens very deliberately hung him upon the same pole upon which the road agents were hanged a few months before, and this ended the trouble.

Execution of James Brady.—Brady, a resident of Nevada City, then commonly called the Lower Town, kept a saloon there which was attended by a very disreputable character called Jem Kelley. In June, 1864, a man named Murphy entered the saloon, created some trouble, and was fired at and wounded by Brady. This was the first crime of any character ascribed to Brady, who was considered up to that time a very reputable citizen. As soon as he fired the shot, he fled to Virginia, and was there captured in the Beaver Head saloon, where John How & Co's store subsequently stood. Next morning he was brought before the committee, then in session in Adelphi hall, Nevada City, and there sentenced to be hanged. W. Y. Pemberton, one of the early lawyers, drew up his will while others finished a letter to his daughter. He displayed the greatest sorrow for his attempt at murder, but otherwise approached his death without fear. The place of execution was one-half mile east of Nevada.

Execution of Jem Kelley.—On the night Murphy was wounded, Jem Kelley was arrested, and during the trial of Brady was found guilty of handing a pistol to Brady and urging him on to shoot Murphy. For this he received fifty lashes, immediately after the execution of Brady, every one of which drew a scream from the cowardly scoundrel. When he recovered from the effects of the flogging he remarked to the bystanders: "Boys, if I hadn't been so fat I would have died sure." After the robbery of the Virginia and Salt Lake coach in July, 1864, a party of Vigilantes left Nevada on August 28, camped at Williams' Ranch, and thence on to the Morrisites' settlement at Meek and Gibson's ferry in Fort Hall Bottom. Here they learned that Kelley had made a stay, refused to pay his bill, and boasted that he was a partner of the men who robbed Hughes, a passenger in the coach. From this point he traveled onward, until he fell into the hands of ten California miners, who held him as a suspicious character. At the miners' camp the Vigilantes found Kelley, tried him, and hanged him at Snake river in presence of Californians and Shoshone Indians, the latter running off terrified when the body of this villain was swung into the air.

Execution of Hard Hat.—This was a heavy villain, whose proper name has never been given to the people. He passed under the names of John Coyle, John Dolan, Hard Hat, etc., etc. He was employed by James Brady, of Nevada, and like Jem Kelley, was one of the worst criminals who survived Plummer's gang. In August, 1864, a sum of $700 was stolen from Brady. Shortly after this Hard Hat disappeared, was followed to Salt Lake by John McGrath, who took him back to Nevada on September 16. During the period of his absence a number of well authenticated stories proving his connection with the new road agents were told; a sum of $300 of Brady's money was recovered, the Vigilantes subscribed the balance, $400; then gave Dolan a fair trial, and thence brought him from the ball-room of the Jackson House to a point one-half mile northeast of Nevada City, where they swung him into eternity.

Execution of R. C. Rawley, 1864.—This character was more of a drunken than a heavy villain in the drama of Montana's settlement. In the winter of 1863–4, startled at the fate of the road agents—he left Bannack, and did not return until September, 1864, when he entered legitimate work on a ranch at New Jerusalem. He forgot the fate of all his old friends, and during his oft repeated visits to Bannack defied the people. The Vigilantes took cognizance of his doings and resolved to rid the Territory of this babbling remnant of the road agents; so in the midst of night they proceeded down the canon, took their prisoner to Hangman's Gulch, and hanged him from the platform which Plummer had erected for the execution of his lieutenant Horan. It is stated by Dimsdale that with the execution of Rawley the criminal circle of Bannack vanished.

Execution of Fogarty in January, 1865.—About January 1, 1865, a man named Watson was found murdered in a house near Fort Owen. A man named Fogarty was arrested and charged with the murder, and after having an examination before Thomas Roup, Justice of the Peace, was held to answer on a charge of murder, and placed in charge of a special officer to convey him to Bannack City, but when the officer arrived at Fort Owen, the citizens took charge of the prisoner, and being satisfied of his guilt, and also that the officer would never reach Bannack with him, they hanged him at the Fort Owen mill.

Execution of John Keene.—The first murder committed at Helena was perpetrated by John Keene, June 7, 1865, at the door of Sam Green's saloon, when Harry Slater was killed. While Keene was making an effort to escape he was arrested by C. D. Curtis, and by him and J. X. Beidler handed over to Sheriff Wood. The sheriff placed his prisoner in his own house for protection until the legal authorities would take up his case; but the people were determined to inquire into the crime at once, and by force took the unfortunate Keene before his judges. A lumber yard near Wood's house was used as the court room, and there Stephen Reynolds was chosen Judge, and Burchett foreman of the jury, with S. M. Hall, Z. French, A. F. Edwards, S. Kayser, Edward Porter, C. C. Farmer, Edward House, Major Hutchinson, and Messrs. Shears and Nichols, jurors. He was found guilty on the second day, and taken to a pine tree in the ravine where J. X. Beidler carried the sentence of death into execution. Rev. Mr. McLaughlin was his spiritual adviser.

The Treasure Coach Robbery, 1865.—The robbery of the Overland Coach in Port Neuf Cañon, Idaho, was one of those deeds the remembrance of which, even to-day, tells the traveler to be calm in presence of the road agents. In this case a number of well-armed men guarded the treasure, and were fully prepared to meet any marauders who might attack them. On the 13th of July, 1865, the treasure coach for the south left Virginia City with seven passengers—A. S. Parker, A. J. McCausland, David Dinan, W. L. Mers, L. F. Carpenter, Charles Parks and James Brown. There was a large amount of treasure on board. The passengers—all hardy mountaineers—were well armed, principally with double-barrel shotguns loaded with buckshot. They expected an attempt to rob the coach, and determined to fight. They took turns watching at the coach windows with guns ready for quick use, determined to get the first shot, if possible, in case of an attack. One man also sat by the driver, Frank Williams, who was afterward found to have been in with the road agents. The second day out from Virginia, while driving through Port Neuf Cañon, the man on the box with the driver sang out: "Boys, here they are!"—he having discovered the barrels of the road agents' shotguns glimmering in the bushes by the roadside. The outside watch followed his words of warning with a hasty shot, almost simultaneous with which the inside passengers turned loose on the robbers, which was answered instantly by a volley from among the bushes. Parker, McCausland, Dinan and Mers were shot dead. Carpenter was hurt in three places, and only avoided death by feigning to be dying when one of the robbers came up for the purpose of shooting him a second time. Parks was also apparently mortally wounded, and was not further molested. Brown, who was not hurt, jumped into the bushes and escaped. The driver (Williams), who had purposely driven the coach into the ambush, was, of course, untouched. His part in the robbery was afterward traced home to him, and, although he had left the territory, he did not escape retribution, he having been hanged by the vigilance committee at Cherry creek, Colorado, some months later. The road agents who took part in this butchery were eight in number. They secured $65,000 in gold, and, so far as known in Montana, were never detected.

Execution of Jake Silvie, 1865.—Jake Silvie, or Jacob Seachriest, a native of Pennsylvania, was a member of Jem Kelley's and Dolan's band, and doubtless was engaged in the stage coach robbery of July, 1864, on the Virginia and Salt Lake road. A party left Nevada City August 28, 1864, to hunt down the robbers. During this pursuit they discovered the body of a man floating on the creek near Port Neuf, which they buried in a willow coffin. After the execution of Kelley and Dolan, information reached the committee that Silvie was under arrest at Diamond City for robbery, and had confessed his connection with the Kelley band. X, in command of four members, started for Diamond, but met the prisoner and his guard, whom they accompanied to Helena, where Silvie was placed in the cabin where Keene was interned, under a strong guard. To facilitate inquiry the prisoner was removed to the outskirts of the camp, where members of the committee questioned him regarding his career, and where he acknowledged his connection with the agents and his share in the murder of the man found in Port Neuf creek by the Nevada party in September, 1864. This resulted in his death sentence, and he was hanged on the old tree in Dry Gulch at dead of night.

Execution of Daniels.—James Daniels, known in California as the murderer of Tuolumne Frenchy, came to Helena to gain additional notoriety and, better still, to meet that end which California justice denied him. While engaged in a game of cards he quarreled with a man named Gartley, and then wounded him mortally. This stabbing affray resulted in the death of Gartley, and was the indirect cause of his widow's death, whose heart was broken on learning of her husband's murder. The vigilantes arrested Daniels, but, on receiving a promise that the authorities would give him a fair trial, he was placed in the sheriff's custody. He was found guilty of manslaughter and sentenced to a three years' term in the penitentiary. After being imprisoned three weeks, a petition, signed by thirty-four citizens, was presented to the governor, and a reprieve was granted. Daniels returned to his old haunts, and threatened to take the lives of the witnesses who proved his guilt. Judge Munson requested the governor to annul the reprieve, but, this request being refused, he ordered Daniels to be arrested. The criminal was now beyond the reach of the county sheriff, but Judge Munson obtained a marshal's order authorizing the arrest of Daniels by a United States deputy marshal. Before the authorities could take action in the matter the committee had settled matters by hanging the murderer.

Banishment of Uhlen, 1867.—In 1867 Jeff Standifer and twelve other men started from Virginia City and went to and up the Yellowstone, and, crossing the divide at the head of that stream, went down Wind river. With him was a hard case named Uhlen; he was very passionate, and vented most of his spleen on a man named Bridger. One day, when on the head of Wind river, Bridger resented this usage, and Uhlen shot him dead. The party gave the murderer a trial, and, after much argument, concluded to take from him his horses and arms and turn him loose. This sentence was executed, and it is supposed that he died in the mountains, for he was never seen or heard of again by any of the company. The party found some prospects of gold below this, but, getting short of provisions, had to leave the mountains.

Execution of Baker, 1871.—In August or September, 1871, a man named Baker stabbed Dr. Mann, who died next day. It was a cool and seemingly unprovoked murder. All medical aid could do was done to save the doctor, without avail, and the citizens of Radersburg dealt summary vengeance on Baker by executing him. A man named Hunt was hanged on the West Gallatin for stealing horses about the same time.

Dual Execution at Bozeman, 1873.—In July, 1873, two men, old man Triplett and John W. St. Clair, were taken from the Gallatin county jail at Bozeman by a mob and hanged in the slaughterhouse. One of the victims, old man Triplett, was indicted by the grand jury and was in the custody of the sheriff to await trial before the following term of the district court. Triplett stabbed and killed one Gempler, who was employed in a restaurant on Main street. The other, Jno. W. St. Clair, a negro or mulatto, shot and killed a Chinaman.

Shooting of Shuster.—A case which may be said to belong to this chapter was the death of Shuster. Shuster was intoxicated and had a quarrel on election day with a Mr. McKenzie, one of the earliest settlers. He left home vowing vengeance and went to the Frazier ranch, and thence across the road to Mr. Crowell's residence. None of the family were at home, but knowing where the key was kept, he opened the house and secured what was known as a needle revolver. Secreting himself behind the fence he awaited the coming of some one. Andrew Frazier and George Haverstock came on horseback and were both shot at by the assassin. Frazier was instantly killed and Haverstock mortally wounded. The sheriff's party pursued the criminal, and, while running to escape, shot him down.

Execution of Coomes and Smith, 1883.—The execution of Milford Coomes, saloonkeeper, and William Henry Smith, a vagrant, took place March 18, 1883. This summary act of justice was performed by the committee of safety in recognition of the merits of Coomes and Smith, who set fire to H. H. McNally's stable at Greenhorn, resulting in the burning of the stable, eight horses, three cows, together with a large supply of hay and grain. Coomes was, at one time, a saloonkeeper at Blackfoot, and in earlier days made himself notorious at Alder gulch. Smith was a confederate of Coomes, and like him capable of any treacherous act. The time had come to end their careers of crime, the committee acted with despatch, and as a result they were found hanging from trees on the old Deer Lodge road, twelve miles west of Helena, March 19, 1883.

Modern Road Agents.—The robbery of the Helena and Boulder city coach on June 27, 1883, formed the introduction of the modern agent to the roads of Montana.

Road Agents of 1883.—The coach for Deer Lodge from Helena was halted on the Dog Creek hills, July 29, 1883, when the treasure box containing $125 and the purses of the passengers were appropriated by the robbers. The list of passengers ticketed through to Deer Lodge were G. M. Pennoyer, H. Sizer, E. G. Bailey, T. Barrett, T. Forsell, J. Collar, E. J. Farrell, Mrs. H. T. Lambert and Mrs. R. Brady. One and all, without regard to sex, suffered alike. Pocketbooks with currency, loose pieces of gold and silver and baser coins, down to the denomination of nickels, were garnered in. The money part of the loot was variously stated at from $100 to $200. The prisoners were captured by deputy sheriffs Steele and Roberts, between Helena and Bozeman, and returned for trial. O. B. O'Bannon, United States Commissioner, and United States District Attorney DeWitt, prosecuted. Complaint was filed against Frederick Wiley, Thomas Sheldon and Marion Gamble by Deputy Sheriff McTague, for robbing the United States mails. The defendants were brought into court by Deputy Marshal Botkin, the complaint read to them and the prisoners duly arraigned. Upon their statement that they were without counsel or the means of obtaining counsel, H. R. Whitehill, Esq., was appointed by the court to conduct the defense, and defendants entered plea of not guilty. By agreement of counsel the examination was continued and subpœnas issued for Thomas McTague, George Davey, William Lamson, Richard Riddle, S. P. Hauschild, Joseph Roberts, William Steele, E. S. Stackpole, Myron M. Lockwood, G. M. Pennoyer, W. J. Ross, D. J. Norton, Jr., and William Bishop on the part of the United States. The property found in the prisoners' possession when captured comprised a sum of money, two horses and one wagon, one set of double harness, a cooking and camping outfit, three finger rings, one watch chain, two Henry rifles, revolvers, ammunition. The promptness of the law in this case saved the new agents from the justice of the People's Court.

Execution of Rigney, etc., etc., 1883.—During the year Miles City was disturbed by a band of desperadoes. Something had to be done to stop their progress, and on Sunday, July 22, the citizens took out Rigney to execution, and warned all his confederates to leave. This salutary action roused the ire of the roughs of that place, and they showed signs of retaliating upon the supposed lynchers. On Sunday night the following notice was found stuck with mucilage upon Chas. Brown's door: NOTICE.—Bullard, Burleigh, Ringer, Dear, Van Gasken, Russell and others—murderers—you're marked." At the end in red ink were the figures: 7-22-82. On Monday night the following was found shortly before midnight posted in the same place: STRANGLERS!—Beware! You are known. 7-23-83—11 p.m. No. 1—XX 7. Both of the above notes were written in red ink and evidently in the same handwriting. The last one was discovered so soon after it was posted up that the ink and mucilage were both still wet. The anti-vigilantes, however, did not practice their threatenings, but rather made preparations to leave Miles City in the enjoyment of her prosperity, undisturbed. The Grant murder, which occurred in August, 1883, caused the revival of the Committee of the North. The Indian who killed Grant, it seems was but slightly wounded by the latter and would have made his escape had not the "Teton Avengers" taken his trail. When his body was found it was full of bullet holes. The Committee of Safety at Helena commenced active measures to rid the city of objectionable and dangerous characters in the summer of 1883. The Herald of July 20 published the following notice:

"One person was ordered out and left Helena this morning. Our organization throughout the Territory will take notice and govern themselves accordingly. Territorial press copy." The following notice was extensively posted August 10, 1883: "3-7-77. The G. A. U. P.'s are requested to meet Saturday at ten a.m., at the usual place. B. K." The fact that horse stealing is not confined to the savages of the Canadian frontier is too apparent. White men indulge in this criminal practice as evidenced in the tragedy of November 1882. Albert Hunt and his partner, Charles Richton, missed five horses toward the close of November, and Hunt went in search. He did not return as promised within the week, and at the end of ten days, Richton set out. At Grass Lake he discovered the dead body of Hunt. In February, 1884, five Piegan Indians left their reservation and crossed the Yellowstone at Clarke's Fork to the Crow reservation and stole fifty-three ponies. Four Crows, accompanied by Joseph Gale, Chauncey Ames, Philip Lidle, Lem Owens, and three other white men, followed the trail and had a fight with the Piegans at Hailstone Basin, forty miles northwest of Billings. Ames and Gale were killed and Owens and Lidle were wounded. Four Piegans were killed. The horses were recaptured. The bodies of Owens and Gale were taken to Park City. Both were well-to-do ranchmen. In February, 1884, two horse thieves were shot on the Yellowstone, their bodies strung up. The thieves plied their trade for a few days, and were leading their prizes eastward when the pursuing citizens came up with them, and placed a quietus on their doings.

Robbery of a United States Paymaster.—While United States Paymaster Whipple was en route to Fort Buford from Glendive May 13, 1884, about forty miles out, he was attacked by road agents. Sergeant Conrad was killed and two privates seriously wounded. The mules attached to the ambulance in which the Paymaster, his clerk and the treasure-box were ran away, and thus they made their escape. Three days later Major Bell, in command of Troop F, 7th Cavalry, found a deserted shock in the woods near the scene, and evidences of recent occupation. The signs discovered gave it the appearance of a regular resort. Ranchmen, while rounding up their cattle, discovered the deserted tent supplied with a new stove, provisions, etc. The tent was pitched on the right bank of the Box Alder. Sergeant Aquila Conrad served through the war, then in 7th Cavalry, under Custer in the Indian Territory, then became first Sergeant of the 5th Infantry, and was in the charge on Crazy-Horse at Wood Mountain, and for bravery on this occasion he received a medal. Alexander McCannon, a horse-dealer, was arrested as being an accomplice of the agents.

Execution of Nickerson and Owens.—In June, 1884, Ed. Owens and Si Nickerson stole eight horses from the Benton & Billings Stage Company, at Rock Springs, one hundred miles northeast of Helena. They were pursued by John Davis, superintendent of the Benton & Billings Stage Company, who, aided by fifteen cow-boys, shot Si Nickerson and wounded and hanged Ed. Owens at Black's ranche. Tim Devlin and Wm. Jones, of the cow-boys' force, were wounded by the thieves.

Wholesale executions.—Early in August, 1884, cowboys in pursuit of stolen horses discovered a log house in an out-of-the way location. It was secretly watched a day or two, during which time several small parties of men came and went, some by day and others by night, having in their possession horses evidently stolen. It becoming evident that it was a horse-thieves' rendezvous, the cowboys congregated, and at night crawled up close to the house and attacked it. Fourteen horse-thieves were about the premises at the time. Nine were killed and five escaped. The cabin was set fire to and burned.

Execution of Dutch Louis.—While Stuart's boys have been operating in the Muscleshell valley and along the international boundary several other bands have had big round-ups in Judith, Teton and Marias countries. Hunting in small parties, these lynchers have been able to rake in a great many of the stragglers from the Stuart campaign, and it is thought that comparatively few have been able to get away. Two or three wounded men have been lynched, but all efforts to make them tell under what circumstances they were shot proved unavailing. These roving bands of lynchers report that they have hanged more than twenty thieves, and the stolen stock that they have recovered is coming in daily. The achievement over which most satisfaction is expressed is the lynching of "Dutch" Louis, a notorious ally of the thieves, who had long been a nuisance in this country, but about whom there has been much mystery. Lander and Galbraith's party came up with him on Crooked creek. He had a fine ranch near there, and no one in the party suspected who he was until after he had been left behind on the trail and some stolen cattle were found in his corral.

At the close of August, 1884, a steamer en route to Benton took five men off a raft. At Rocky Point, forty miles north of Fort Maginnis, the water became too low for the boat to proceed further, and the prisoners were turned over to men on shore with instructions to deliver them to the sheriff. It has since been ascertained that the men ashore were cowboys, and, as nothing more has been heard of the prisoners, the conclusion is that they were hanged. Jerry Owens, a notorious horse-thief, is known to have been one of the missing men. The names of the others are unknown.

Attack on stage coach, 1884.—On October 20, 1884, Judge Wade, Prosecuting Attorney Johnston, and Mr. Toole, Mr. Cullen, Mr. Carter, Mr. Chumasero, and Mr. Bullard, of the Helena bar, got on board the Wickes train for Jefferson on their way to the Jefferson county court at Boulder. Arriving at Jefferson they, in company with nine other passengers, they took passage on the stage coach for Boulder City, twelve miles away, over the Prickly Pear range of mountains. All went well until they had nearly reached the summit of the mountain, when suddenly the coach was stopped by six armed men, and the passengers ordered to dismount and hold up their hands.

Robbery of the Cœur d'Alene coach.—In May, 1885, two masked men with revolvers in their hands held up two stages owned by rival companies that every afternoon leave Rathdrum for Cœur d'Alene City and the mines. The first stage contained a white man, a Chinaman, and Wells, Fargo & Co.'s express box. The white man yielded up $17 and a watch, the Chinaman nothing, and the express box nothing believed to be very valuable. The second stage yielded $128 in cash and a watch and chain.

The modesty of mountain men has interfered materially with giving a full record of names connected with the Vigilantes. It may, however, be stated with certainty that all names identified with the progress of the Territory from 1862 to 1866 were also identified with the administration of the law in the manner related in the foregoing pages. Never was there a more just tribunal than this Court of Miners, of which the true pioneers of Montana were all members.

CHAPTER IX.

THE COURTS AND BAR.

FROM the earliest period in the history of world the advocate has existed and made his presence known where men of other trades were silent and unfelt. The author of Paradise Lost lived at a time when mental revolutions reduced humanity to a state of skepticism and left the conscience of the people uncontrolled by that spiritual government which for centuries ruled the Christian world, and judging from the experiences of that time declared that "most men are allured to the trade of law, grounding their purposes not on the prudent and heavenly contemplation of justice and equity, which was never taught them, but on the promising and pleasing thoughts of litigious terms, fat contentions and flowing fees." The advances made by society in after years fostered certain ambitions, and among the highest of them was to attain the profession of the law. It became a great never-ending study, and thus in Johnson's time the bar embraced

> "Men of that large profession, who can speak
> To every cause, and things indeed contraries,
> Till they are hoarse again, yet all be law:
> That with most quick agility can turn,
> And return, make knots, and undo them,
> Give forked counsel, take provoking gold
> From either side and put it up."

The first settlers of Montana being bound together by so many ties of brotherhood, accepted and observed such laws as govern the family circle, rather than seek arbitrators or judges in the courts of Missouri, so that it may be said of them they maintained good faith and justice without law. The immigration of 1862 changed this primitive order of affairs, and within a few weeks after the first mines were opened at Bannack, rude calls for justice accompanied by the grumblings of the people were heard. The manner in which such calls were answered was rough and ready in the extreme. A justice of the peace having authority from Washington or Dakota territory, assisted by a number of men called jurors, assembled to try the case. The litigants were generally represented by the pioneer lawyers, until the lawyer, urged on by his insatiable rage for speaking, said something which incurred the displeasure of his opponent's clients, when both lawyers and clients and their friends became as well qualified for war as for peace, until the judge cried out, le diable est aux vaches, and with his assistants of the jury ran from the court room. A case of this kind is recorded by Mayor Woody, of Missoula, in his centennial history of that county. He takes the first cause tried before any court within the present limits of this territory, and deals with it in the following manner:

The first lawsuit ever commenced in Missoula county, or in fact in Montana, was commenced and tried at Hell's Gate, in the month of March, 1862, before Henry Brooks, justice of the peace. The proceedings were under the laws of Washington territory. A Frenchman called "Tin Cup Joe"—other name forgotten—accused Baron O'Keeffe with beating one of his horses with a fork handle and then pushing him into a hole thereby causing his death, and claimed damages in the sum of forty dollars, and sued O'Keeffe to recover that amount. The place of trial was in Bolte's saloon. A jury of six was empaneled and sworn to try the cause. W. B. S. Higgins and A. S. Blake, now of Missoula county, and Bart Henderson, of the Yellowstone, were of the jury. As the trial progressed the proceedings became less harmonious until it ultimately culminated in a bit of unpleasantness between the defendant and the writer, who was acting as attorney for the plaintiff. During the unpleasantness the friends of the respective parties lent a hand, and it was far from being a select or private affair. While the unpleasantness was in progress the court and a portion of the jury had fled for dear life, and when harmony was restored they were nowhere to be found. After considerable search the court and jury were captured and the trial proceeded. The case was finally given to the jury, and after a brief absence they came into court and rendered a verdict for plaintiff for forty dollars damages. The costs swelled the judgment to about ninety dollars. This was probably the most hotly contested case ever tried in the territory. The defendant endeavored to take an appeal to the district court, but as that court was held in Colville, three hundred miles distant, he concluded to settle the judgment, which he did. Poor Bishop Brooks, he was, in 1865, killed in Uncle Ben's Gulch, near Blackfoot City; shot through a glass door, by whom or for what cause was never known. This Brooks was given the sobriquet of Bishop Brooks owing to his performing the first ceremony of uniting the first white Americans married in the eastern county of Washington territory.

The trial of Herrin, or Horan, one of Plummer's accomplices in murder and rapine, was carried out under the forms of law by Sheriff Plummer. The too confiding friend became a victim of the chief schemer.

Murder of Dillingham and Trial of the Murderer, June 1, 1863.—The murder of Deputy-Sheriff Dillingham in 1863 was undoubtedly one of the first and greatest crimes attributed to Sheriff Plummer and the band of cut-throats who had organized under his direction and acted under his orders. The trial of Dillingham's murderers was no less a crime than the murder itself, since it convinced the Sheriff that no power in the territory was superior to that which himself and his confederates exercised. To deal with the subject fully, let us take the following account from Prof. Dimsdale:

As a proof of the address and tact of Plummer, and of the terrible state of society, it may be mentioned that he got himself elected Sheriff at Bannack, despite of his known character, and immediately appointed two of his road agents, Buck Stinson and Ned Ray, as Deputies. Nor did he remain contented with that; but he had the effrontery to propose to a brave and good man in Virginia that he should make way for him there, and as certain death would have been the penalty for a refusal, he consented. Thus Plummer was actually Sheriff of both places at once. This politic move threw the unfortunate citizens into his hands completely, and by means of his robber deputies—whose legal functions cloaked many a crime—he ruled with a rod of iron.

The marvelous riches of the great Alder Gulch attracted crowds from all the West, and afterward from the East also; among whom were many diseased with crime to such an extent that for their cure the only available prescription was a stout cord and a good drop.

Plummer had appointed as his deputies, Jack Gallagher, Buck Stinson and Ned Ray. The head deputy was a man of another stripe entirely, named Dillingham, who had accurate knowledge of the names of the members of the road agent band, and was also acquainted with many of their plans, though he himself was innocent. He told a man named Dodge, who was going to Virginia with Wash Stapleton and another, that Buck Stinson, Haze Lyons and Charley Forbes intended to rob them. Dodge, instead of keeping his counsel, foolishly revealed the whole affair to the robbers, who, of course, were much struck at the news. Haze ejaculated "——! is that so?" The three men at once concluded to murder Dillingham. At Rattlesnake, Haze Lyons came to Wash Stapleton, who was on the road between Bannack and Virginia, and asked him if he had heard about the intended robbery, adding that he had followed Dillingham that far, and that he had come to kill him, but he said that he feared that he had heard about it, and had got out of the country. Wash, who says he has felt more comfortable, even when sleeping in church —at once replied, "No; this is the first I've heard of it. I have only $100 in greenbacks, and they may as well take them, if they want them, and let me go." The other swore it was all a —— lie, and they separated. The robbers went on to Virginia. Jack Gallagher came to X, and wanted a pony for his friend Stinson to ride down the Gulch. At first his request was refused, the owner saying that he wanted to ride it down the Gulch himself. Jack insisted, and promising that he would be back in half an hour, X lent it to him. He was away for two hours, and the proprietor was "as hot as a wolf" when he came back. The truth was that they had been consulting and fixing the programme for the murder which was arranged for the next day, they having discovered that Dillingham was in the Gulch. In the morning Buck Stinson, Haze Lyons and Charley Forbes might be seen engaged in a grand "Medicine talk," in the neighborhood of a brush wakiup, where Dr. Steele was holding court and trying the right to a bar claim, the subject of a suit between F. Ray and D. Jones. Dillingham was standing close by the impromptu Hall of Justice, when the three road agents came up. "We want to see you," said Haze; Stinson walked a pace or two ahead of the others. Haze was on one side and Forbes was behind. "Bring him along! Make him come!" said Buck Stinson, half turning and looking over his shoulder. They walked on about ten paces, when they all stopped, and the three faced towards Dillingham. "—— you, take back those lies," said Haze, and instantly the three pulled their pistols and fired, so closely together that eyesight was a surer evidence of the number of shots discharged than hearing. There was a difference, however. Haze fired first, his ball taking effect in the thigh Dillingham put his hand to the spot and groaned. Buck Stinson's bullet went over his head; but Charley Forbes' shot passed through his breast. On receiving the bullet in the chest, Dillingham fell like an empty sack. He was carried into a brush wakiup, and lived but a very short time.

Jack Gallagher, being Deputy-Sheriff, settled the matter very neatly and effectively for his friends. He rushed out as per agreement, and took their pistols, putting them together and reloading Buck Stinson's, so that no one knew (that would tell) whose pistols fired the fatal shots. The men were, of course, arrested. Red tape is an institution not yet introduced among miners. A captain of the guard, elected by the people, and a detail of miners, took charge of the prisoners, who were lodged in a log building, where John Mings' store now stands. A people's court was organized and the trial commenced.

James Brown and H. P. A. Smith were in favor of a trial by twelve men, but E. R. Cutler opposed this, for he knew that the jury would have been empaneled by a road-agent sheriff. A vote was taken on the question by "ayes" and "noes," but this failing, two wagons were drawn up with an interval between them. Those in favor of a trial by jury of twelve went through first. Those who preferred a trial by the people traversed the vehicular defile afterward. The motion of a jury for the whole prevailed. Judge G. G. Bissell was appointed President, by virtue of his office. He stated that it was an irregular proceeding, but that if the people would appoint two reliable men to sit with him, he would carry it through. This was agreed to, Dr. Steel and Dr. Rutar being chosen as associates. Three doctors were thus appointed Judges, and naturally enough directed the "medicine talk" on the subject. E.R. Cutler, a blacksmith, was appointed public prosecutor, Jem Brown was elected assistant; Judge H. P. A. Smith was for the defense, and the whole body of the people were jurors. We may add that the jury box was Alder Gulch, and that the throne of justice was a wagon drawn up at the foot of what is now Wallace street.

The trial commenced by the indictment of Buck Stinson and Haze Lyons, and continued till dark, when the court adjourned. The prisoners were placed under a strong guard at night. They were going to chain them, but they would not submit. Charley Forbes said he "would suffer death first." This (of course?) suited the guard of miners, and quick as a flash down came six shot-guns in a line with Charley's head. The opinion of this gentleman on the subject of practical concatenation underwent an instantaneous change. He said mildly, "Chain me." The fetters were composed of a light logging chain and padlocks. All was quiet during the rest of the night; but Haze sent for a "leading citizen," who, covered by the guns of the guard, approached and asked him what he wanted. "Why," said he, "I want you to let these men off. I am the man that killed Dillingham. I came over to do it, and these men are innocent. I was sent here by the best men in Bannack to do it." Upon being asked who they were, he named some of the best citizens, and then added, "Henry Plummer told me to shoot him." The first half of the statement was an impossible falsehood, many of the men knowing nothing of the affair for several days after. The last statement was exactly true. After breakfast the trial was resumed, and continued till near noon. The attorneys had by this time finished their pleas, and the question was submitted to the people. "Guilty, or not guilty?" A nearly unanimous verdict of "Guilty" was returned. The question as to the punishment to be inflicted was next submitted by the president, and a chorus of voices from all parts of the vast assembly shouted "Hang them!" Men were at once appointed to build a scaffold and dig the graves of the doomed criminals.

In the mean time Charley Forbes' trial went on. An effort was made to save Charley on account of his good looks and education, by producing a fully loaded pistol, which they proved (?) was his. It was, however, Buck Stinson's, and had been "set right" by Gallagher. The miners had got weary, and many had wandered off when the question was put; but his own masterly appeal, which was one of the finest efforts of eloquence ever made in the mountains, saved him.

Charley told a gentleman of the highest respectability that he killed Dillingham, and he used to laugh at the "softness" of the miners who acquitted him. He moreover warned the gentleman mentioned that he would be attacked on his road to Salt Lake; but the citizen was no way scary, and said, "You can't do it, Charley; your boys are scattered and we are together, and we shall give you —— if you try it. The party made a sixty-mile drive the first day, and thus escaped molestation. Charley had corresponded with the press, some articles on the state and prospects of the territory having appeared in the California papers, and were very well written. He was acquitted by a nearly unanimous vote. Judge Smith burst into tears, fell on his neck and kissed him, exclaiming, "My boy! My boy!" Hundreds pressed round him, shaking hands and cheering, till it seemed to strike them all at once that there were two men to hang, which was even more exciting, and the crowd "broke" for the jail.

A wagon was drawn up by the people to the door, in which the criminals were to ride to the gallows. They were then ordered to get into the wagon, which they did, several of their friends climbing in with them.

At this juncture Judge Smith was called for, and then, amidst tremendous excitement and confusion, Haze Lyons crying and imploring mercy, a number of ladies, much affected, begged earnestly to "Save the poor young boys' lives." The ladies admit the crying, but declare that they wept in the interest of fair play. One of them saw Forbes kill Dillingham, and felt that it was popular murder to hang Stinson and Lyons, and let off the chief desperado because he was good-looking. She had furnished the sheet with which the dead body was covered. A letter (written by other parties to suit the occasion) was produced, and a gentleman—a friend of Lyons—asked that "The letter which Haze had written to his mother might be read." This was done amid cries of "Read the letter," "—— the letter;" while others who saw how it would turn out shouted, "Give him a horse and let him go to his mother." A vote was taken again, after it had all been settled, as before mentioned—the first time by ayes and noes. Both parties claimed the victory. The second party was arranged so that the party for hanging should go up-hill, and the party for clearing should go down-hill. The down hill men claimed that the men were acquitted, but the up hills would not give way. All this time confusion confounded reigned around the wagon. The third vote was differently managed. Two pairs of men were chosen. Between one pair passed those who were for carrying the sentence into execution, and between the other pair marched those who were for setting them at liberty. The latter party ingeniously increased their votes by the simple but effectual expedient of passing through several times, and finally an honest Irish miner, who was not so weak kneed as the rest, shouted out, "Be gorra, there's a bloody naygur voted three times." The descendant of Ham broke for the willows at top speed, on hearing this announcement. This vote settled the question, and Gallagher, pistol in hand, shouted, "Let them go, they're cleared." Amid a thousand confused cries of "Give the murderers a horse," "Let them go," "Hurrah," etc., one of the men, seeing a horse with an Indian saddle, belonging to a Blackfoot squaw, seized it, and mounting both on the same animal, the assassins rode at a gallop out of the Gulch. One of the guard remarked to another—pointing at the same time to the gallows—"There is a monument of disappointed justice."

After March, 1862, trivial cases of a civil character continued to be brought before the justices' courts; but all criminal cases were subject to be tried by the vigilance committee, a magnificent tribunal, which followed up a criminal, captured him, tried him on the broad principles of human justice without legal technicalities, and if found guilty, hanged him to the nearest tree, or if only an involuntary instrument or associate of the criminals, offered him so many hours to leave the territory forever. This was a secret tribunal embracing in its membership almost every good man residing in the territory, and forming its own police, sheriff, jury, judge and executioner. The history of the Vigilantes, given in other pages, is one which recommends itself to every student. Not only does it prove what solidarity of interests is capable of achieving; but also conveys to the mind what the spirit of union, intelligence and justice can accomplish where laws do not exist, or where they fail to be of service to the citizen. The courts were organized by Governor Edgerton, October 20, 1864 (vide political history). The first term of the United States district court was opened at Virginia City, December 5, 1864, seven days before the first territorial legislature convened at Bannack.

The first legislature passed an act dealing with the organization of the courts—supreme, district, probate and justices' courts. To the first appellate jurisdiction was given in cases where the disputed amount exceeded $100, as well as in all criminal cases tried in the district courts. The sections of the act relating to the district court were as follows:

The territory shall be divided into three judicial districts, for each of which there shall be a district judge, and each given original and appellate jurisdiction. The district court shall have original jurisdiction in civil cases where the amount in dispute, or value of the property sued for, exceeds fifty dollars, and in all criminal cases not otherwise provided for. Provided, The district court may enter judgment for a less sum than fifty dollars upon the plaintiff paying costs, and may in like manner enter judgment for the recovery of personal property of less than fifty dollars value. The appellate jurisdiction of these courts shall extend to hearing upon appeal an order or judgment of a probate court or justice of the peace in the cases provided by law. The courts and judges thereof shall have power to issue all writs necessary and proper to the complete exercise of the power conferred on them by the constitution, organic act, and laws of this territory. The terms shall be held at such times and places as provided by law. If a room for holding the court be not provided by the county, together with attendants, fuel, lights, and stationery, suitable and sufficient for the transaction of business, the court may direct the sheriff to provide such room, attendants, fuel, lights, and stationery, and the expense shall be a county charge. The district judges shall at all reasonable times, when not engaged in holding courts, transact such business at their chambers as may be done out of court. At chambers they may try and determine writs of mandamus, certiorari and quo warranto, hear and dispose of all applications for orders and writs which are usually granted in the first instance upon an ex parte application, and may in their discretion also hear applications to discharge such orders and writs. When an action or proceeding is commenced in a district court in which a probate court has concurrent jurisdiction, the district court may, if the parties agree, by order transfer the same to the probate court of the same county. Upon such transference the probate court shall have and exercise over such action or proceeding the same jurisdiction as if originally commenced therein.

The probate court was established with all the powers of the county courts, while to the justices was given the same jurisdiction which they exercise to-day. The office of clerk of probate was established by act approved in January, 1869.

The act of January 10, 1865, designated the second Monday in March of that year, instead of the first Monday in February, as proclaimed by Governor Edgerton, for holding the first term of the district court for Madison county. The act of February 9, 1865, provided for holding court in Beaverhead in June and September and in Deer Lodge in July, and also for attaching Missoula to Deer Lodge for judicial purposes. The act creating the office of district attorney and regulating his duties was approved January 10, 1865. Sections 3 and 4 of this act were amended in the act of January 15, 1869, extending the usefulness of this officer.

The various efforts to legislate regulations for the courts were generally ignored in deference to the governor's proclamation. In December, 1866, the legislature took a firm stand in this matter, divided the territory into three judicial districts, and decreed that a term of the supreme court should be opened at the seat of government in August of each year. The act of December, 1866, provided that Beaverhead, Madison and Gallatin should form the first district, with Chief Justice Hosmer presiding; Deer Lodge, Missoula, Edgerton, Meagher and Jefferson the second district, with Associate Justice L. P. Williston presiding; and the counties of Choteau, Vivion and Big Horn the third district, with Associate Justice L. E. Munson presiding.

Since the approval of this act the growth of the territory has necessitated many changes of an organic character in the courts, while the bar remains unchanged. A few of the lawyers who pleaded in the courts of 1865–6–7 are to-day among the legal lights of the Northwest, and enjoy a popularity and confidence which their modern brothers cannot dim. A Masonical fraternity rules among the old and new lawyers of Montana, rendering their professional and social intercourse an example which men of all professions and trades might follow with profit.

The laws of the territory were first printed in 1866, under the supervision of Edward B. Neally, under the authority given him by General Thomas Francis Meagher, in compliance with "An Act relating to the Printing of the Laws and Journals of the Council and House of Representatives of the First Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana," approved January 31, 1865. In his introduction Mr. Neally says that he could not venture on the correction of the many errors which occur in the original entries.

The laws adopted by the Legislature of the Territory, in 1864, were prepared by Harry Burns, to whom $400 was voted by the Legislature in the Act approved February 9, 1865. Following this compilation other attempts were made toward a codification of laws; but in 1869 the legal statutes were in such confusion that their codification became a necessity, and gave rise to the following Joint Resolution:

That the present judges of the Supreme Court of this Territory, to wit: H. L. Warren, Hiram Knowles and G. G. Symes be and they are hereby constituted a commission, invested with full power and authority to revise, classify and codify all the general laws of this Territory, omitting from their consideration all special laws, and they shall have authority to sectionize, index and arrange the same in one volume, as in their judgment may seem best; and shall have power in such revision and codification to omit all surplus matter, such as titles of acts, enacting clauses, approvals, etc., if in their judgment they may deem it best; and such commission are required to report such amendments, alterations and modifications to the civil and criminal practice acts as they may deem important, which alterations can be made to appear as a part of the code they may prepare. And they are required to report the result of their labors to the Legislature at its next regular session for its adoption and ratification.

This work was accomplished; but still something was necessary to render it complete. The laws were subsequently revised, codified and issued from the press of the New Northwest in the elaborate form in which they are now found.

The leading officers of the courts of the Territory since its organization were the Chief Justices Hezekiah L. Hosmer, appointed June 30, 1864; Henry L. Warren, appointed July 18, 1868; and Decius S. Wade, appointed March 17, 1871, still pending. Judge Hosmer resides at Oakland, California. William H. Hunt was appointed Attorney-General.

Associate Justices.—Ammi Giddings, June 22, 1864; Lorenzo P. Williston, June 22, 1864; Lyman E. Munson, March 11, 1865; Hiram Knowles, July 18, 1868; Hiram Knowles, July 13, 1872; George G. Symes, April 5, 1869; John L. Murphy, January 27, 1871; Francis G. Servis, September 21, 1872; Henry N. Blake, July 30, 1875; John L. Murphy, E. J. Conger and W. J. Galbraith. Ammi Giddings did not accept the appointment. Judge Servis died at Canfield, Ohio, March 6, 1877. Judge Conger's history is well known. W. M. J. Galbraith was appointed January 7, 1884, and John Coburn, February 19, 1884.

United States Attorneys.—Edward B. Neally, June 22, 1864; Moses Veale, April 20, 1867; Alex. E. Mayhew, July 11, 1868; Henry N. Blake, April 22, 1869; Cornelius Hedges, March 3, 1871; Wilbur F. Sanders, March 6, 1872; M. C. Page, March 17, 1872. W. F.

Sanders declined to accept the position. J. W. Andrews, Jr.; Thomas J. Lowry; F. M. Eastman, and W. H. DeWitt, March 3, 1883. M. C. Page was drowned in the Madison, May 13, 1877.

United States Marshals.—Cornelius F. Buck, June 22, 1864; Geo. M. Pinney, February 20, 1865; Neil Howie, March 18, 1867; William F. Wheeler, May 15, 1869, and December 18, 1873; Alex. G. Botkin, April, 1878; Robert Kelly, 1885. Mr. Buck declined to serve.

Admitted in December, 1864.—Wm. Chumasero, Wilbur F. Sanders, Wm. L. McMath, Alex. Davis, Thos. Thoroughman, Samuel Word, Jas. G. Spratt, W. M. Stafford, R. B. Parrott, Lewis W. Borton, A. E. Mayhew, Gaylord G. Bissell, Chas. S. Bagg, Wm. T. Lovell, G. W. Stapleton, J. A. Johnston, W. J. McCormick, H. Burns, R. H. Robertson, Theo. Muffly, Edward Sheffield, W. T. Pemberton, Jerry Cook, John C. Turk.

Admitted in 1865.—W. W. Dewey, A. F. Strickland, Larkin Fleshman, W. L. Brown, Sidney Edgerton, O. F. McCarthy, Cornelius Hedges, Elanson C. Moore, John P. Bruce.

Admitted in 1866.—Thos. V. Russell, Thos. R. Edwards, J. L. McCullough, Thos. J. Dimsdale, E. C. Stoddard, John L. Slater, Greene Clay Smith, Jas. K. Duke.

Admitted in 1867.—David Cowan, Wm. J. Marshall, Martin Beem, H. N. Blake, James Tufts, J. H. D. Street, L. C. Reyburn.

Admitted in 1868.—A. M. S. Carpenter, Louis McMurtry, F. C. Deimling, L. I. Sharpe, John H. Shober, A. H. Beattie, A. J. Snyder, J. C. Robinson, R. E. Arick, John Desbeck, Henry Burdick, J. J. Williams, J. H. Rodgers, Thos. J. Lowry, W. F. Chadwick.

Admitted in 1869.—A. G. P. George, H. Z. L. Hosmer, E. W. Toole, Sample Orr.

Admitted in 1870.—W. E. Cullen, Geo. May, W. W. Dixon, Jas. H. Brown, M. B. Harrison, Chas. W. Turner, Jos. J. Davis, J. K. Weston, Benjamin F. Potts, Jos. K. Toole.

Admitted in 1871.—Massena Bullard, G. G. Symes, Henry L. Warren, Geo. G. Coleman, Jas. E. Callaway, Wm. F. Kirkwood, M. C. Page, W. H. Claggett, T. L. Napton, Henry F. Williams, J. Allen Hosmer.

Admitted in 1874.—Robert W. Hill, D. P. Newcomer, W. H. Layton, T. E. Collins, Owen Garrigan, J. A. Kanouse.

Admitted in 1875-6.—Jas. M. Young, Edward W. Willette, Chas. P. Blakely, H. N. Maguire, H. M. Porter, Clarence O. Ewing, Benj. T. Porter, Isham B. Porter, Harry R. Comley, W. F. Davis, E. S. Wilkinson.

Admitted in 1877.—Thos. M. Pomeroy, Frank H. Woody, Oliver B. Toole, John J. Donnelly, Patrick Talent, John F. Forbes.

Admitted in 1878.—Chas. Walker, Herbert P. Rolfe, Ira H. Pierce.

Admitted in 1879.—Hiram Knowles, W. F. Wheeler, W. H. DeWitt, J. F. Warner, Stephen DeWolfe, Hiram Blaisdell, Arthur S. Higgins, Lawrence A. Brown, F. K. Armstrong, Jas. H. Garlock, J. W. Andrews, Jr., J. W. Tattan.

Admitted in 1880.—Wm. H. Hunt, Horace R. Buck, F. T. McBride, Geo. C. Randolph, John C. Rogers, W. H. Frye, Jas. L. Dryden, J. W. Strevelle, John T. Baldwin, Wm. O. Speer, W. T. Pigott.

Admitted in 1881.—Wm. A. M. Young, Ben. Sheeks, A. C. Swift, Asa A. Brown, Thos. Laspeyre, Benj. F. White, R. M. Hall, W. J. Stevenson, Wm. H. Ross, Arthur G. Hatch, David A. Dingley, M. Kirkpatrick, Edmund Sherwood, Jas. Walker, Wm. B. Settle, Max Waterman.

Admitted in 1882.—Wm. C. Casterline, Henry F. Titus, Andrew F. Burleigh, Isaac D. McCutcheon, W. H. Trippett, Wm. C. Stackle, John H. Duffy, E. D. Edgerton, Geo. D. Farwell, O. B. Batten, Thomas H. Carter, M. H. Parker, Bernard D. Powers, H. P. Nagton, Chas. O'Donnell, Lewis Smith, John H. Curtiss, Howard B. Smith, W. S. Barbour.

Admitted in 1883.—Walter A. Burleigh, R. B. Smith, David C. Campbell, R. B. Massell, Edward Floyd Crossby, Wm. Wallace, Jr., H. B. Wilkins, J. L. Staats, Sydney C. Edgerton, Edward B. Howell, James J. Hedges, H. Brady Wilkins, James B. Wells, G. W. Settle, Llewellyn A. Luce, E. A. Harwood, Wm. Lewis, Jr., Wm. A. Imes, James W. Forbis, A. K. Barbour, Rudolph Von Tobel, Jr., John H. Elder, Orren Emerson, Geo. B. Winston, O. F. Goddard, George Voss, Thomas F. Casey, R. T. Allen.

The names of lawyers admitted in January and February, 1884, are as follows: Geo. F. Shelton, Thos. C. Marshall, W. H. G. French, Wm. Scallon, David M. Durfee, F. P. Sterling, Elbert D. Weed, John M. Gray, James A. Smith, Willis F. Parker, Fletcher M. Maddox, Henry B. Eastman, Henry N. Platt, John Mills, Jr., Sample H. Orr, Z. T. Cason, George Haldorn, Max J. Leaming. The admissions to the bar of Montana since February 8, 1884, are referred to in local history. Cornelius Hedges is the reporter of the Supreme Court. Lucius S. Peck was appointed clerk of the first Supreme Court of Montana Territory. He was succeeded by Isaac R. Alden in January, 1870. Mr. Alden was one of the first justices at Alder Gulch in 1864, and now holds the position of Clerk of the Supreme Court and Librarian of the Territorial Law Library. The district attorneys and clerks for 1884–5, are named as follows: H. N. Blake, W. Y. Pemberton, W. H. Hunt, attorneys for the three districts respectively. T. Muffly, R. L. Davis, and B. H. Tatem, clerks of the courts. The United States Commissioners for 1884–5 are James M. Arnoux, Joseph J. Williams, Wm. P. Burcher, John Potter, E. E. Farman 2d, Isaac R. Alden, Theo. Muffly, Geo. F. Cowen. O. B. O'Bannon, Frank H. Woody and A. D. McPherson. The late A. H. Beattie was appointed deputy clerk of the third judicial circuit in 1868, and clerk of that district in December, 1871. This position he held until his death, December 20, 1884. The question of organizing a Territorial Bar Association was brought up in the fall of 1884, and a meeting to organize held at Helena, in January, 1885. (Vide chapter on societies.)

CHAPTER X.

THE NEWSPAPER PRESS OF MONTANA.

THE first newspaper published in the territory was the Montana Post, issued at Virginia City, August 27, 1864. This was a weekly journal, devoted to a review of mining interests. In politics it was decidedly republican, and in its dealings with general news, anti-national in spirit. During the political contest of October, 1864, the Post was issued tri-weekly. Professor Thomas J. Dimsdale, the historian of the Vigilantes, was the first editor. He was succeeded by H. N. Maguire and H. N. Blake. In December, 1866, Captain Mills took editorial charge, with Tilton & Dittes, proprietors. In 1868 George M. Pinney purchased this paper, moved the office to Helena, where it was published until May, 1869, with Captain Mills, editor, and the late A. H. Beattie, manager. The owners of the Post during the last year of its existence were Messrs. Thompson, Pinney, Whitlatch, Potter, Taylor, and Hubble, known as the Montana Publishing Company. (Vide reminiscences of Mills and Beattie.)

The Montana Democrat, a weekly newspaper, was founded in November, 1865, at Virginia City, by John P. Bruce, with John F. Wilson assistant editor.

The Tri-Weekly Republican was published at Helena, by D. W. Tilton and Benjamin R. Dittes, as a branch of the Post, from the office of which paper the Tri-Weekly Republican obtained its outfit. E. W. Carpenter was the editor during its brief career.

The Virginia City Republican, a newsy journal, published for some time at Virginia City, as successor of the Post, suspended publication in October, 1869, and the office was offered for sale by Frederick Cope.

The Montana Capital Times was issued in October, 1869, immediately following the suspension of the Republican, by Joseph Magee, S. P. Bassett and Isaac H. Morrison.

The Capital Fact was issued at Virginia City, November 8, 1869, with Mr. Bassett, formerly of the Radiator, and Messrs. Magee and Morrison, formerly of the Gazette, editors and proprietors.

The Montanian was published at Virginia City, in 1870, by Fred Cope, and continued publication until March, 1876, when it was merged into the Madisonian, its opponent since 1873.

HELENA.

HELENA.

The Madisonian.—The first issue appeared on November 15, 1873, is published at Virginia City, and is democratic in principles. Thomas Deyarmon was the founder and editor. In March, 1876, the Montanian (a weekly news paper established in Virginia City) was merged into the Madisonian, since which time the latter has continued the official paper of Madison, Beaverhead and Jefferson counties. In May, 1884, A. B. Kiser, who was connected with the office for some time prior to that date, purchased Mr. Deyarmon's interest, and with Thomas Baker. editor, carried on the publication of the Madisonian, until Mr. Baker assumed the ownership. The office of this journal is one of the best equipped in the territory, and the circulation large.

The Radiator was issued at Helena, December 17, 1865, by T. J. Favorite and Bruce Smith, and continued publication under varied trials until July, 1866, when it ceased to be published. This little paper was far inferior to that which Helena of those times called for. The folio was as small as the type was bad, and to render its chances of success less hopeful, it was a difficult matter to obtain a supply of paper in those early times. As a consequence the readers were often allowed to pass one, two and three weeks without any news from the outside world. The arrival of the Fisk brothers in the fall of 1866 tended to remedy this state of affairs. They purchased the Radiator office, made some additions to it, and on November 15, 1866, issued the first number of the Weekly Herald, a paper to-day which can compare favorably with the best weekly journals of the entire country. The printing outfit of the Radiator office, consisting principally of an ancient modeled Washington hand-press and a moderate supply of well-worn news, display and job type, had been packed by mule train from Washington Territory across the Cœur d'Alene and Rocky mountain trails a distance of more than six hundred miles. Single pieces of the press, including the bed, platen and standards—the latter sawed in twain—weighed hundreds of pounds each, and formed heavy burdens for the animals on their long, rugged and exhausting journey.

The Rocky Mountain Gazette, a weekly newspaper of democratic politics, was established in Helena by E. S., Henry C. and John W. Wilkinson in 1866, and before its first issue, August 11, of the same year, Peter Ronan and H. N. Maguire became partners. Maguire soon retiring, the paper was published by Wilkinson and Ronan for about fifteen months. In 1868 Martin Maginnis purchased the interest of H. C. Wilkinson, and became one of the editors. On March 30, 1868, a daily edition was commenced, and on the 22d of August, 1870, they issued their first paper printed by steam power. The office was destroyed by fire August 23, 1872. Its destruction so crippled the managers that they were unable to resume publication until the arrival of new material, when a joint stock company was formed. The publication was resumed in 1873, but before the end of a full year the office was again destroyed by fire, January 9, 1874. Its place was supplied by the Independent, the office of which paper was moved to Helena from Deer Lodge, and the first number of the Helena Daily Independent issued March 22, 1874.

The Helena Herald.—In the early fall of 1866 Colonel Fisk's expedition, numbering several hundred people, arrived from the States, coming overland by the northern route. With Colonel Fisk came three of his brothers, veterans mustered from army service at the close of the war. The elder of these, Robert E., a trained printer, purchased the mute material of the Radiator, and on November 15, 1866, issued the initial number of The Helena Weekly Herald—the first newspaper in the territory to advocate the principles of the Republican party. The color of the politics of the sheet was possibly intensified on the start by the dark shades of wrapping paper it was forced to adopt in lieu of whiter print, which, for the nonce, could not be obtained short of the Pacific coast. This circumstance quite plausibly suggested to a democratic rival, since defunct, the title of "Black-and-Tan," an epithet which the Herald, in its political course, then or since, has never tried to dodge. During the winter which followed shipments of paper stock were received by stage express from California at a cost of $125 per bundle of two reams. In the first six months of its existence the Herald did not come within $6,000 of paying expenses. In the spring of 1867 a Hoe cylinder press, a Gordon jobber, and a complete printing outfit of type and material were procured from New York, with a year's supply of paper, ink, jobbing stock, etc. Soon after the Weekly Herald was enlarged from a twenty-four column quarto to a forty column octavo sheet, and on the first day of August following the Daily Herald was issued—the pioneer daily of the territory. In the absence of the founder of the paper Colonel James L. Fisk occupied the editorial chair, performing the duties of that position efficiently during the winter and spring months of 1866–7. Colonel Fisk withdrawing to embark in mining ventures, Charles R. Stuart, an accomplished printer, was given a partnership interest, and for several years was connected with the paper, then conducted under the firm name of Fisk & Stuart. The Herald, though handicapped by a heavy debt, soon stepped to the front in Montana journalism; its circulation was largely increased, its advertising patronage grew enormously, and its job department swelled its annual revenues to many thousands of dollars. It required but a short time, comparatively, to pay off all encumbrances and satisfy every debt. Mr. Stuart's interest having been purchased, Daniel W. Fisk and Andrew J. Fisk became jointly associated with Robert E. Fisk in the proprietorship of the paper, and for a period of nearly sixteen years the three have owned and conducted the paper under the firm name of Fisk Brothers. The Herald occupies its own building—a handsome, imposing three-story brick block on Broadway. It is the largest and best appointed publishing house in Montana. The building has a street frontage of forty-eight feet, and a depth, with annex, of one hundred feet. Four steam presses are operated; the editions of the paper are folded by machinery, ready for the mails; an extensive bindery is kept constantly employed, and the job rooms are the scene of ever busy labor. The Herald, daily and weekly, has been enlarged within the year 1883, and their dimensions are shortly to be still further increased. Editorially and locally the Herald is one of the strongest and sprightliest of the journals in the Northwest. With its writing staff is connected Judge Cornelius Hedges, one of the ripest scholars and newspaper men of the Territory.

Montana News Letter was a weekly edition, first issued on February 21, 1869, by H. N. Maguire, at Helena. This journal continued publication for about three months.

The Independent.—This important journal was founded at Deer Lodge by Frank Kenyon, and the first number issued October 12, 1867. John H. Rodgers purchased the office in 1868, and conducted the Independent until May 3, 1869, when he sold his interest therein to J. C. Kerley, W. H. Todd, and M. D. Hathaway. On W. H. Todd's retirement, the other members of the company carried on the paper until June, 1870, when Addison Smith purchased a third interest. In April, 1871, Hugh McQuaid purchased Mr. Kerley's interest, and three years later L. F. La Croix, having purchased the interests of Addison Smith and M. D. Hathaway, became joint owner with Mr. McQuaid. About this time the office of the Gazette at Helena was subjected to a second burning, so that its revival was not probable. This was a democratic journal. The opportunity which the want of a thorough morning paper at Helena offered, was seized upon by the new owners of the Independent, and on March 22, 1874, the first number of the Helena Daily Independent was given to the public by McQuaid, La Croix, and Kerley, proprietors and editors. This enterprise was attended with success, and to-day Helena may boast of possessing as good a morning paper as cities, other than great centers of population furnish, with press dispatches of the same date. Mr. Kerley retired from the editorial chair, when Col. A. M. Woolfolk was called to that position, with Prof. G. C. Swallow, assistant editor. In April, 1884, Homer M. and L. K. Hill, Ohio printers, purchased from Messrs. Woolfolk and Swallow a part of their stock, and took the business management of the Independent. Mr. Piatt, formerly connected with this journal, is now connected with the press of Butte. Professors Swallow and Howie are now editors.

The Weekly News Letter, established at Helena, June 12, 1875, by J. W. Allen and Lee Travis, appeared as the Daily News Letter July 27, 1875, and as the Daily Montana News on September 1, 1875, at which time it was enlarged to a four-column daily, claiming "a larger circulation than any other daily in Montana," was published by Allen & Travis. For the balance of the year Lee Travis was sole proprietor and editor. T. M. Chisholm became sole proprietor and editor January 1, 1876, and in February of that year the News expired.

The Morning Capital.—A daily paper was issued by Guy X. Piatt, of the Independent, Lee Travis, H. C. Williams and William Shone, March 2, 1880. Owing to the journalistic field being so fully and competently filled by the Herald and Independent, the enterprise of these gentlemen did not give promise of that success which it would have received under any other circumstances, and so the publication of the new daily ceased.

DEER LODGE COUNTY COURT HOUSE AND JAIL.

TERRITORIAL PENITENTIARY.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS OF DEER LODGE COUNTY.

OFFICE OF THE "NEW NORTHWEST," DEER LODGE, CAPT. J.H. MILLS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

The Helena Era, a real estate journal, was issued from the Herald press in July, 1883, enlarged in August to a four-page quarto, neatly printed, and edited with great care. While not omitting anything which goes to prove the progress of the Territory, it contains many well-written descriptions of localities, a column of local news items, and claims many of the characteristics of a newspaper.

The Montana Stock and Mining Journal.—This is the name of a monthly paper of sixteen pages, established in May, 1884, with office at Helena. A. M. Williams is editor.

The Pick and Plow was started by H. N. Maguire in 1869–70, with the office in a frame building on the site of Phil. Skehan's hotel, at Bozeman, which was during the time of publication, and subsequently, used as the county court-house. This paper suspended when the office passed into the hands of L. M. Black in 1870, and he leased the office to Joseph Wright. Mr. Wright carried on the paper under the name of the Avant Courier, and issued the first number September 13, 1871. On the death of Mr. Wright, December 29, 1876, the Courier passed into the hands of W. W. Alderson.

The Avant Courier, Bogeman, was first issued September 13, 1871, with Captain Joseph Wright, editor. He continued its publication up to 1876, when Joseph Allen, associate editor, took charge. After the death of Mr. Wright, December 29, 1876, Mr. Allen continued the journal until it passed into the hands of the present owner and editor, in January, 1877. The associate editors of the Courier since 1877 have been J. V. Bogert, Matthew W. Alderson, and the present assistant editor, John S. Mills.

This journal has a weekly circulation of about 1,400. The value of the office, machinery, type and stock is about $8,000. Power presses, Cottrell & Babcock and great Gordon, are used, together with hand presses and small Gordon.

The present office was built in 1881, at a cost of $25,000. It is a two-story brick structure, northeast corner of Tracy and Main street. The building is occupied by the Courier office, Kleinschmidt Bros.' store, with a number of professional men's offices on the second floor. The press room and composing room are in the rear building on Tracy street in the Courier building. The first type was set on the Courier by Samuel B. Foreman, a native of Los Angeles county, California, who died at Santa Cruz, May 12, 1875.

The Bozeman Times was started November 13, 1874, by J. V. Bogert and M. M. Black. Its suspension took place September 14, 1875. The Times was revived by Henry C. Wilkinson and Raleigh F. Wilkinson, December 31, 1875, and edited by E. S. Wilkinson until August 27, 1878, when the office was purchased by Mr. Alderson and the paper merged into the Avant Courier.

The Gallatin News, a bi-weekly journal, was instituted by C. A. Carson in the fall of 1881, with the office in the May building. Its publication was continued for about eight months, when it passed into the hands of the Avant Courier.

The Bozeman Weekly Chronicle was started January 27, 1883, by Samuel W. Langhorne in the interest of the democratic party. The office is well equipped with new type, Chicago Taylor press, etc. The paper has a circulation of over 600, and is in every way a first-class local journal. Since its publication it has introduced itself into the homes of the people, and is becoming one of the most popular and newsy journals of the Territories. The press room is in the log house built by W. J. Beall about 1868 for a carpenter shop on Bozeman and Mendenhall streets, with the business office in a small frame house fronting on Bozeman street.

The Bozeman Baptist Bulletin is a new denominational paper issued in 1885.

The New North-West was first issued in July, 1869, with Captain James H. Mills, editor and publisher. It was started as a weekly journal, and was published continuously until 1870, when a daily paper under the same name was issued, the weekly being a compilation from it. The Daily New North-West was published during the summer of 1870, and again during the summer of 1871. Owing to the uncertainty of mails and the difficulty of telegraphic communication during the winters, the publication of the daily was suspended. At the close of the summer of 1871 the daily ceased publication, even as the Daily Independent, then issued at Deer Lodge, suspended publication. The two papers originated in competition between the Weekly Independent and New North-West. Shortly after the destruction of the Gazette office, the Independent was removed to a wider field at Helena, where it is still published. The Weekly New North-West again resumed its original importance, and has been issued regularly since that time, being the only journal then or since published in what now constitutes Deer Lodge county. The office gives employment to five men throughout the year, the paper has increased its circulation from 600 in 1869 to about 1,600 at the present time, and from a 24 x 36 folio in 1869 to a 28 x 42 folio of thirty-two columns in 1883. The journal is edited with remarkable care, and shows particularly that careful judgment which so happily marks the leading papers of Montana. The valuation of the office is set down at about $8,000. In 1873 H. C. Kessler had an interest in the paper, and again in 1879 John S. Mills had a half interest in the publication of the paper. With these exceptions, Captain Mills has been sole conductor of the New North. West since 1869.

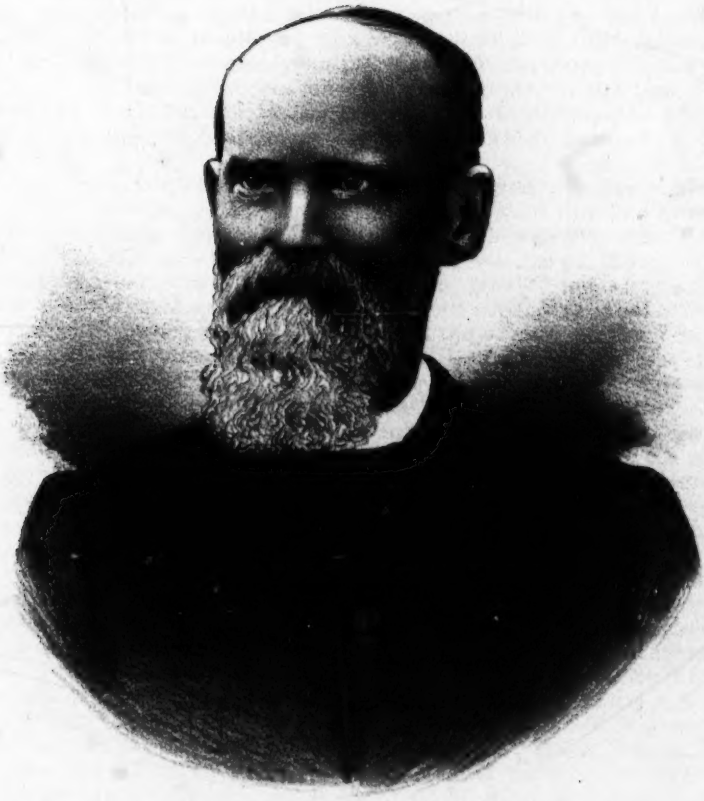
The School Tyro.—This was a monthly magazine, and was devoted to the interests of education in Montana. The first number appeared in January, 1875, at Deer Lodge City, and was ably edited by W. Egbert Smith, the present popular postmaster of Butte.

The Butte Miner was established by Messrs. H. T. Brown, James H. Mills and Harry C. Kessler. The former is still its business manager. The first number was issued June 1, 1876. It was then a four-page six column, 22 x 32, tri-weekly, and independent in politics. Soon after a change was made in proprietorship, Messrs. Mills and Kessler retiring and the paper conducted as a democratic organ. September 15, 1876, the tri-weekly edition was discontinued and a weekly issued, no change being made in its size. On August 5, 1879, the Miner was issued daily and weekly. January 1, 1882, the weekly edition was discontinued and a semi-weekly was issued in lieu thereof—the Daily Miner being continued as usual. On November 1, 1881, the Miner Publishing Company was incorporated with Joseph A. Hyde, president; H. T. Brown, vice-president; J. R. Clark, treasurer, and Daniel Searles, secretary. It was capitalized at $14,400—144 shares at $100 per share—all paid up at the time of incorporation. The Miner is the oldest paper in Butte, and the only Democratic paper on the west side.

The Daily and Weekly Inter-Mountain was founded in 1881 at Butte, and the first paper issued March 21, same year. The original officers of the publishing company were W. E. Hall, President; C. T. Meader, Vice-President; C. S. Warren, Secretary; H. A. D'Acheul, Treasurer, and Lee Mantle, Manager. Capital, $20,000. The name Inter-Mountain Publishing Co., was adopted by the corporators, and under this name the daily paper of March 21 was issued. In June, 1881, the weekly was issued, and since that date both papers have been published continuously. Chauncey Barbour was the first editor. He was succeeded by Frederick Lockley in August, 1881, and to him the editorial charge of the paper has been intrusted since that time. John B. Reed has held the position of local editor since the establishment of the paper, and Lee Mantle its business management. The office of the Inter Mountain gives steady employment to eighteen hands. It is one of the best equipped offices in the Territory, both in its newspaper and job departments, while the conduct of the paper has brought it, within two years, into the leading rank of Montana journalism, and one of the most influential of the republican party organs in the northwest. The list of stockholders comprises the names of many of the leading mercantile and mining men of the county. Guy H. Piatt is now connected with this journal. Mr. Lockley has retired.

The Frontier Index was publisher at Butte, August 5, 1878, by L. R. Freeman, who founded this newspaper at Fort Kearney. According to his own statement, made in the Union-Freeman of June 24, 1883, this garrison newspaper was so placed that the telegraph and correspondent were unnecessary, since the scenes presented within sight of the editor's desk offered sufficient subject to fill his journal. He says:

"The printers were detailed from the ranks of the army; the devil was a drummer boy; the imposing stone was made of a two inch oak plank obtained from the quartermaster's department, and the ink stone was presented by the government painter, who had used it in grinding and mixing paints. Quarters were set apart by the Secretary of War for this first printing office that ever crossed the Missouri above St. Louis. The principal patronage came from the military posts, and as outfitting towns sprang up at Omaha, Plattsmouth, Nebraska City and Leavenworth, the business men of those places found use for advertising space. At that time a plow had scarcely run a furrow in the Great Plains, which were reputed to be an inhospitable desert, and the Indians were so numerous and daring that we have known them to ride up to the stockade, built by General Stephen Kearney, lasso soldiers on the inside, drag them over the top and beat their brains out against the palisade of their own garrison. Buffalo abounded by the million, and cannon were stationed to fire on them in order to disperse the herds, before hunters would get among them and stampede them among the outside buildings."



S. W. Langhorne

BOZEMAN.

The vicissitudes of the Index from 1850 to 1878 belong to the histories of Wyoming and Utah. It appears that during the publication of the Index at Ogden the name Ogden Freeman was bestowed upon it, but on inaugurating the paper at Butte a return to the original name was agreed upon. Subsequently the name Inter-Mountains Freeman was adopted, and under this name the Index was published until law proceedings were taken against the owner to estop the use of the name, which was considered an infringement upon the privileges of the Inter Mountain Publishing Co., incorporated under the laws of the Territory. The name Daily Labor Union was adopted, and under this title the paper was issued December 3, 1882. The last word of the new, together with the last word of the former name—Union-Freeman—were adopted, and under this title the old Frontier Index is now published. Mr. Freeman is certainly an old citizen of the west. He has seen the Indian in war and peace, has been faithful to Mormon and Gentile, to the farmer and miner, to the merchant and mechanic, and in the later days of his newspaper life comes to Butte to share with her men of enterprise the rewards which her golden hills promise to industry.

In 1866 L. R. Freeman went to Fort Laramie to report the treaty with 16,000 Cheyennes, Arrapahoes and Sioux. Proceeding thence northward with two wagon loads of supplies, he came to the Yellowstone, built temporary quarters twenty miles below the present town of Livingston, one mile below Mrs. Gage's station and on the opposite side of the river, had many adventurous tours of exploration, notably among which was the trip through what is now known as the National Park, but which was at that time written up as "Yellowstone Hell," the account appearing first in the columns of the Frontier Index, and another set of articles were contributed by him to the Democrat, then published by Major Bruce at Virginia City. The Indians stole all the horses and he purchased cattle in Bozeman, which he packed with provisions, along the trails which the party cut with hatchets. The first inkling of the scenery that he obtained was from old Lu Anderson, a partner of the famous trapper, Jim Bridger, and he advised the party to explore the region. At that time Bozeman was a mere hamlet occupied by John Bozeman, W. W. Alderson, now of the Courier, and a few others, among them a number of half breeds.

The Real Estate News was issued at Butte in May, 1885. It is devoted to real estate and mining interests, and is published by Cobban Bros.

The Montana Christian Advocate, first issued at Butte in August, 1882, is a continuation, so to speak, of Kind Words of the Mountains, the first denominational paper published in the territory. The Advocate is made up in pamphlet form, contains eight pages of reading matter pertaining to church affairs, and is altogether an interesting monthly magazine. It is conducted by Rev. J. Jay Garvin for the proprietors, C. H. Fowler, LL.D.; F. A. Riggin, A.M.; S. E. Winger, A.M.; Geo. Comfort, A.M.; O. W. Mintzer, A.M.; Jacob Mills, A.M.; Wm. E. King, Geo. C. Stull, B.A.; E. B. L. Elder, M.A.; T. B. Gray, Bishop J. F. Hurst, Wm. Van Orsdel, Wm. A. Shannon, Marion J. Hall, Hugh Duncan, T. D. Lewis.

The Atlantis, the first paper published in Beaverhead county, was issued December 16, 1879, by L. R. Freeman, editor of the Butte Frontier Index, at Glendale. Mr. Freeman ordered the discontinuance of the publication at the close of 1880.

The Dillon Tribune, the official journal of the county, is a newsy, spirited newspaper. Its publication marks the revival of the mining and commercial life of Beaverhead. Hiram Brundage is editor and proprietor.

The Messenger was founded at Sheridan in 1879.

The Missoula and Cedar Creek Pioneer was established in Missoula, September 15, 1870, by the Montana Publishing Company. Joseph Magee, one of the proprietors, was afterward a liquor merchant, and is now engaged as stock operator in San Francisco. I. H. Morrison, the other proprietor, has worked at his trade almost continuously in Helena, except last fall and summer, when he was at work at St. Ignatius Mission. January 26, 1871, the name was changed to the Missoula Pioneer, and continued under the original management until November 2, 1871, when the name was changed to The Pioneer, with W. J. McCormick, publisher. On the 2d of December, 1872, F. H. Woody became ad interim editor, during the absence of Mr. McCormick in the east, and the name of the paper was changed to the Montana Pioneer. On February 8, 1873, the office was bought by Woody & Chisholm, and the name of the paper changed to The Missoulian. July 11, 1873, T. M.

Chisholm sold out to W. R. Turk, and the publication of The Missoulian was continued by Woody & Turk up to March 12, 1874, when Woody sold out, and Warren R. Turk became sole proprietor. In the spring of 1875, when it became apparent that Mr. Turk could not long survive an attack of consumption that had fastened itself upon him prior to his removal to the territory, he relinquished the office to Messrs. Worden & Co., from whom he had bargained for it, and the further publication of The Missoulian was continued by Barbour & Aspling, May 26, 1875. November 10, 1875, Charles S. Aspling sold out, and Chauncey Barbour became sole proprietor, and continued the publication until August 15, 1879, when Duane J. Armstrong became editor and publisher, and has so continued without change up to the present time. Of the various publishers connected with the press in Missoula county, two are dead—W. R. Turk, who died in the spring of 1875, and T. M. Chisholm, who died at Butte in the summer of 1880. The Missoulian is a twenty-eight column folio, printed entirely in the office, newsy, and has a weekly circulation of 850 copies. The office gives employment to four men. Chauncey Barbour, the former editor of the paper, is said to be one of the closest observers and best editorial writers in the territory. An old settler in Montana, he still makes Missoula his home.

Missoula County Times.—This journal was founded by Harrison Spaulding, November 15, 1882, and it has been carried on successfully since that date. The Times is published in the interest of the Republican party, and is a very competent exponent of republican prinprinciples. The paper is a thirty two column folio, printed at Missoula, and has a circulation of about 700 copies per week.

Livingston Tribune, published every Saturday, by Meehan, Dickinson & Eberman, was established February 3, 1883, by M. J. Meehan and C. A. Carson, under the firm name of Carson & Meehan, as the pioneer newspaper of Livingston. The present firm was organized June 26, 1883. The Tribune is a six-column eight-page paper. Independent in politics.

The Daily Enterprise, Livingston, was established June 4, 1883, with George H. Wright and J. E. Hendry, publishers and proprietors, under the firm name of Wright & Hendry. The Daily is a six-column folio.

The National Park Pioneer, originally established by W. D. Knight, now of the Yellowstone Journal, of Miles City, is now published by the Enterprise Company. Mr. Knight started the Pioneer June 24, 1883, and sold to the present proprietors in the latter part of August, of the same year. The paper is a seven-column folio. Independent in politics.

The Livingston Gazette was started by C. A. Carson, A. G. Carson, and J. W. Allen, December 19, 1882. This journal is published in the interest of the Upper Yellowstone country, and of Livingston in particular. It is independent in politics, its news columns are generally well filled, while contributions to its pages, descriptive of the country, are interesting and valuable.

Major A. R. Keller, agent of the Crow Indians, has become a newspaper man, and, in conjunction with H. D. Landon, is publishing the Public Opinion at Westerville, Ohio.

The Billings Post was founded by A. K. Yerkes, in the spring of 1882, at Coulson. He purchased a portion of the material of the Journal office and with this started his paper. In the summer of 1882 he moved the office to Billings, and within a few weeks sold his interest in the Post to Walter Matheson, who was its last editor and proprietor.

The Billings Herald was established in June, 1882, by Bromley and Devine, of St. Paul, as a weekly newspaper. In the spring of 1883 The Billings Daily Herald was founded by Alexander Devine, he having purchased Mr. Bromley's interest. In the summer of 1883 Mr. Devine formed a partnership with Mr. Matheson, and both now edit and publish the Herald. The Daily Herald suspended publication on January 16, 1884, and gave as its reason want of support by the advertising public. The proprietors continue to publish the weekly edition.

The Daily Rustler was founded at Miles City April 14, 1883, by E. H. Becker. The little journal had a circulation of 500, and always gave an epitome of the latest news. The Rustler was distributed every evening, the plan of publication providing for this method.

Daily Gazette. In May, 1885, the three papers known as the Post, Herald and Rustler consolidated under the name Daily Gazette, and the paper was issued May 11, 1885.

The Montana Stock Gazette is the title of a new stock journal started at Billings in May, 1885. It is published by the Gazette Publishing Company, and is the result of merging the Daily Rustler, Herald and Post.

OFFICE OF THE RIVER PRESS, JERRY COLLINS, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR, FORT BENTON, CHOTEAU CO.

The Yellowstone Journal was started by Major Thompson P. McElrath in July, 1879, at Miles City. Major McElrath transferred his interest in the Journal to W. D. Knight December 25, 1881, Mr. Knight then possessing a half interest as per his contract of February, 1880. Subsequent to December 5, 1881, W. D. Knight published and edited the Journal until June, 1883, when Samuel Gordon accepted the position of editor and manager. In August, 1882, the Daily Journal was inaugurated, and was published continuously until February 10, 1883, with Mr. Feeley, of Chicago, editor. The publication ceased on that day. The owners of the paper propose to revive the daily paper. This is the pioneer journal of the Yellowstone Valley, being the first paper established between Bismarck and the mountains. The material for the office was shipped from the then terminus of the road to Miles City, a distance of 350 miles by bull teams, two years in advance of the railroad. January 1, 1884, the publishers added a Cottrell steam power press to their outfit. The weekly has a circulation of 1,300. They have an associated press franchise for telegraph dispatches for Miles City, the only one (1883) in the Yellowstone Valley between Bismarck and Helena, a distance of 685 miles.

The Daily Press was established by Major Thompson P. McElrath, at Miles City, February 19, 1882. At that time he was associated with J. W. Cobb, but purchasing his half-interest June 16, 1883, the paper has continued regular publication up to the present time under his control.

The Weekly Press was founded by Major McElrath, June 26, 1883. This paper has steadily grown in popular favor, and like the Daily Press, forms a very creditable journal.

Miles City Press was first published in Miles City, June, 1882, John X. Davidson being the proprietor and its first editor. In February, 1883, Mr. Davidson sold out his interests to Messrs. Berth, Potter and E. H. Becker, the present editors and proprietors. Mr. Potter is a native of Wisconsin and an experienced newspaper man, and Mr. Becker was formerly from Reading, Pennsylvania, but has been a resident of Montana for the past nine years. The Daily Press is the "pioneer" daily of the Yellowstone valley, having been the first between Bismarck and the Rocky Mountains. It is the only paper in this section which makes a special feature of the stock interests of this vicinity and Montana in general. Issue both daily and weekly editions. Size of paper, four page, twenty-four columns, 22x32 inches.

The Glendive Times was first issued August 11, 1881, with W. W. Mabee, editor and proprietor. The paper at that time contained twenty-four columns, twelve of which were printed at Glendive and twelve at St. Paul. This journal was published uninterruptedly in this form, with some enlargements, until April 1, 1883, when the entire form was set up in the Glendive office. The paper is now a twenty-eight column folio, printed entirely in the office, and having a circulation of about six hundred copies. The office gives steady employment to four men.

The Yellowstone Press was started in the fall of 1882 as a campaign sheet, by Blake & Burdick. Publication was continued for a few months, when the office was sold to W. W. Mabee, editor of the Times, and by him in turn sold to the Dickenson company.

The Benton Record is one of the old journals of Montana. It was founded at Fort Benton by W. H. Buck, February 1, 1875. To the Record the whole Territory is indebted for its published lists of steamboat arrivals, with passengers and freight from year to year. It is celebrated for its intelligent advocacy of the free navigation of that great national highway, the Missouri river, and as the champion of Fort Benton as the head of that navigation, and for its publication of the very interesting "Frontier Sketches," by John J. Healy. Throughout the long and bitter contest between the government and the Sioux, this journal, being as it were in the heart of the war, dealt very fairly with the Indian question. Before and after the fall of the Sioux nation it was the Indian watchman, always chronicling some new outrage, and always petitioning for the settlement of Indian difficulties and the protection of citizens. The Record is democratic in politics.

The River Press was started in the fall of 1880, the first number being given to the public October 27. It started under disadvantage, its publishers being comparative strangers in this part of Montana, and there being already an opposition paper in a field which many thought too small for two. Indeed, it was prophesied by the opposition that it would not live a month. But these prophecies failed of fulfillment, as the paper has grown in favor from the first issue, and is now recognized as the leading paper of Northern Montana. In June, 1881, the interest of H. C. Williams was purchased by Jerry Collins, and in the August following Collins & Stevens bought out T. D. Wright. They put on a new dress and made considerable needed additions to the job department. The increase in the advertising patronage and the strong desire of the people for a daily paper that would give the news, induced the publishers to start the Daily River Press, and its publication was begun last June. Last fall the River Press Publishing Company was organized under the incorporation laws of Montana, Messrs. Collins and Stevens taking half of the stock and being retained as editors in charge. Heretofore the paper had been independent in politics, but the organization of the stock company threw the control into the hands of the republicans, they holding a large majority of the stock, and it is now recognized as a republican journal. The weekly is a 5-column 8-page paper, and the daily a four page. (River Press).

The Rocky Mountain Husbandman is a weekly journal first published at Diamond City, now at White Sulphur Springs, devoted to the agricultural and stock growing interests of Montana. It was established by R. N. Sutherlin (who is still its editor and proprietor), November 25, 1875. Its circulation is large. The paper is independent in all things, and is valuable for its columns devoted to the farm and domestic economy.

The Dillon Tribune is like the city which it represents, one of the additions to modern Montana. This is an eight-page weekly, containing forty columns of news, selections and advertisements, published by H. Brundage with F. E. Foote and John R. Wilson, editors. The Tribune has now reached its fifth volume.

The Mineral Argus was issued at Maiden, Fergus county, August 9, 1883, by Messrs. Fell and Vrooman. The Argus is devoted to the mining and commercial interests of the Warm Springs district.

The Sun River Sun, published at Sun River, Lewis and Clarke county, was issued in February, 1884. It was a 28-column sheet, published by the Sun River Publishing Company. Will H. Hanks was manager, and David B. Hall, editor. Mr. Hall had been a correspondent of the Husbandman for a number of years, and many of his articles have been highly appreciated and extensively copied. R. S. Ford was the purchaser of the first copy of the Sun River Sun, printed on white satin. It cost him $75. In April, 1885, the office was moved to Great Falls.

The Tranchant.—A paper called the Tranchant is published at Townsend, Meagher county. J. E. Stevens is publisher.

The Anaconda Review, published by J. S. Mills, is the new journal of the new town of Anaconda.

The Great Falls Tribune, a continuation of the Sun River Sun, was published at Great Falls, on the removal of the office from Sun River to that point.

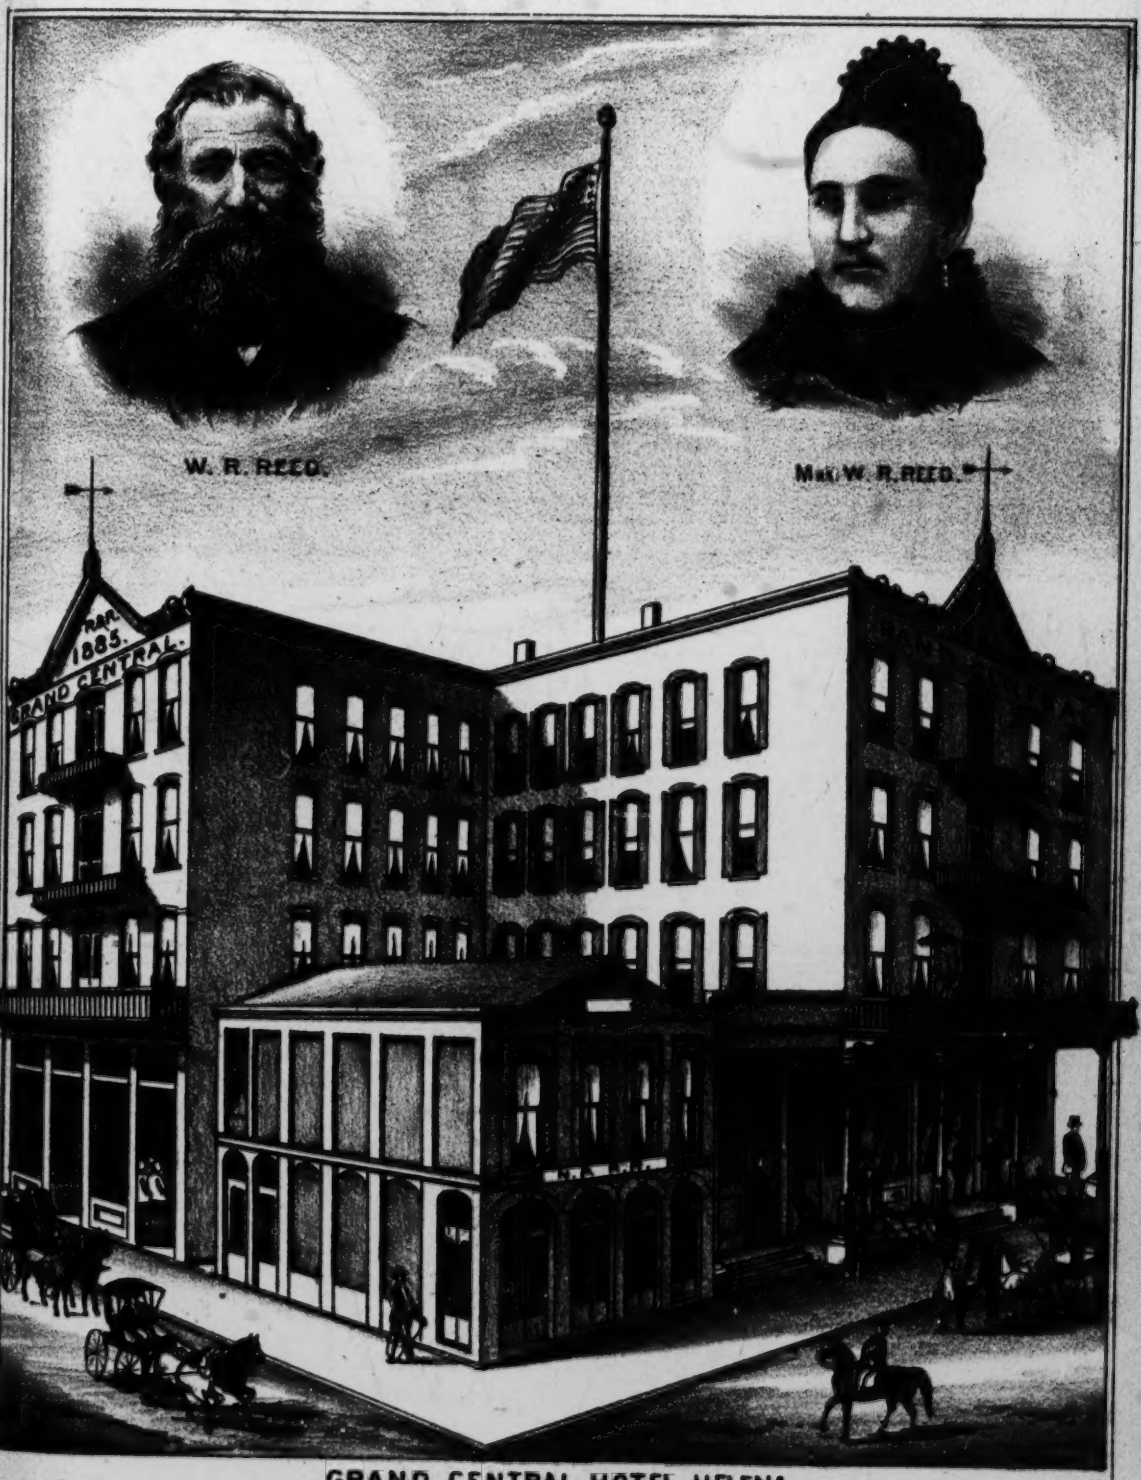
The Jefferson County Enterprise, established in June, 1885. Is a six-column folio, edited by Platt Burr, a well-known Montana journalist of ability and experience. The following extracts will indicate its character: "Jefferson county probably embraces the most extensive and richest mineral belts in the Territory, and if one point of a colossal compass were placed upon the roof of the Boulder court house, and the other caused to describe a circle at a distance of twelve miles from the center, there is no question but such a circle would inclose more mineral wealth in gold, silver, copper and lead than any other section of the same area in the known world. We need capital to develop this inexhaustible storehouse of wealth. It will be the province of the Enterprise to attract the attention of the outside world to the promising field for investment in our mines." It is not a party newspaper.

The Daily Town-Talk was established at Butte, in June, 1885, with Harry Rivers, manager. In politics the Town-Talk is independent. The paper is a seven-column folio of standard measure, containing all the news of the day.

The Daily Montanian was issued January 7, 1885, from the press of the Montana Publishing Company, Helena, composed of S. A. Robertson, R. Pelky and Fred. Carter, with Robinson managing editor and Thomas Worthington local editor.

Transactions of the Territorial Press Association.—Under the call for a meeting of newspaper men at Helena to form a Press Association, representatives of the following named papers assembled at the court house, February 10, 1885:

Wm F. WHEELER,
HELENA.



GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, HELENA.

Jerry Collins, River Press.
W. W. Alderson, Matt W. Alderson, Courier.
Prof. Swallow, Prof. Howey, H. M. Hill, Independent.
A. J. Fisk, Helena Herald.
A. R. Yerkes, Bozeman Chronicle.
J. D. Matheson, Billings Post.
Alexander Devine, Billings Herald.
J. W. Kinsley, Billings Rustler.

Will Sutherlin, Rocky Mountain Husbandman.
Will Kennedy, Missoulian.
J. E. Hendry, Livingston Enterprise.
Hiram Brundage, Dillon Tribune.
Geo. E. Boos, Stock and Mining Journal.

On motion of Sutherlin, W. W. Alderson was made temporary chairman. On motion of Matheson, Collins, was made temporary secretary. On motion, the chair appointed the following committee on constitution and by-laws: Mantle, Hendry, Fisk, Devine and Kennedy. On motion, the chair appointed on permanent organization and order of business, Matheson, Sutherlin, Swallow, Yerkes and Collins. The report of the committee on constitution was received and read, and the same adopted. The report of the committee on permanent organization was received as follows:

To the Temporary Chairman and Members of the Montana Press Association:

Your committee on permanent organization beg to recommend the election of the following officers: Jas. H. Mills, President; W. W. Alderson, W. H. Sutherlin and Lee Mantle, Vice Presidents; Alex. Devine, Corresponding Secretary; Jerry Collins, Recording Secretary; A. J. Fisk, Treasurer.

Respectfully submitted. J. D. MATHESON, Chairman.

The following were elected members of the executive committee: J. D. Matheson, H. T. Brown, J. E. Hendry.

The following is a list of the members who signed the roll: W. W. Alderson, Bozeman Avant Courier; Jerry Collins, Fort Benton River Press; W. H. Sutherlin, Rocky Mountain Husbandman; A. K. Yerkes, Bozeman Chronicle; J. D. Matheson, Billings Post; Lee Mantle, Butte Inter-Mountain; Alex. Devine, Billings Herald; J. E. Hendry, Livingston Enterprise; R H. Robertson, R A Pelkey, Montanian.

A resolution by A. J. Fisk, calling for a committee to consider matters relating to the Association, now before the Legislature, was adopted. The President appointed as such committee A. J. Fisk, of Lewis and Clarke counties; W. W. Alderson, Gallatin; J. E. Stevens, Meagher; H. T. Brown, Silver Bow; Harrison Spaulding, Missoula; H. Brundage, Beaverhead; Alex. Devine, Yellowstone; Jerry Collins, Choteau; Jas. H. Mills, Deer Lodge.

On motion of Lee Mantle, the Chair was authorized to appoint a committee of three to investigate and report by resolution to the Association in reference to remarks purporting to have been made on the floor of the lower house by members of that body derogatory to the character of the newspaper men of Montana. The Chair appointed as such committee Lee Mantle, A. J. Fisk and J. E. Hendry. There were elected S. H. Crounse, Rev. L. L. Wood and Rev. Mr. Prout, active members. On motion of H. T. Browne, Geo. W. Carlton and D. W. Tilton were elected honorary members of the Association. On February 11, the following named gentlemen were also elected to honorary membership: A. B. Kiser, Thos. Dayarmon, Hon. H. R. Buck, Hon. W. H. Hunt, C. L. Spencer, W. Y. Pemberton, Rev. J. J. Garvin, A. C. Botkin, E. W. Carpenter, Hon. Martin Maginnis, Hon. Van H. Fisk, J. C. Kerley, Hon. S. W. Langhorne, Hon. Henry N. Blake, E. S. Wilkinson, W. F. Sanders, Robt. S. Kelly.

The proceedings of this meeting, a summary of which has just been given, were published in pamphlet form by the River Press Company, and a copy presented by the Recording Secretary for the use of this chapter.

CHAPTER XI.

CHURCHES AND SCHOOLS OF MONTANA.

FROM a period anterior to the conquest of Mexico the missionaries of the Christian Church found their way by lake and river and mountain pass from Florida to the Pacific coast. St. Louis Bertrand was a preacher in America forty-eight years before the reformation of the Franciscans or Capuchins in 1551, thirty-seven years before the order of the Jesuits was approved by Paul III. in 1540, and twenty-six years before Luther and his disciples were styled Protestants in 1529. Bertrand re-embarked at Seville in 1562, with another friar of the Dominican Order, and landed at Golden Castle in South America. He afterward preached at Panama, Cipacoa, Paluato and other places. Within three years he converted ten thousand souls, and baptized all the inhabitants of the city of Tubara. It is said that he was prepared to undertake the missions in the far north then, had not the information been conveyed to him that already the Franciscan had entered the heart of the mountains. In the history of the explorations reference is made to the Spanish efforts to colonize the Northern Pacific country, to the priests of the Spanish missions who accompanied the colonists, and to other evidences of Spanish occupation; but the information given in records of this time is too vague to warrant a statement that the present territory of Montana was made subject to their knowledge and power. The opposite is the case with the records of the French missionaries. Not only did they chronicle the daily events, but also described vividly the new countries which each journey opened to their view.

Catholic Church.—The history of the Catholic Church in Montana forms in itself the story of the first settlement of the territory. Archbishop Charles John Seghers, in his pastoral of 1883, dealing with the appointment of Bishop Brondel, treats the subject with remarkable impartiality. The archbishop begins with the establishment of the church in Oregon thus: "When, on the third day of May, 1838, two intrepid missionaries, Very Rev. Francis Norbert Blanchet and Rev. Modest Demers, left their native country, Canada, to spend the balance of their lives on the Pacific coast, they journeyed westward, and on the 10th of October, 1838, the holy sacrifice of mass was offered for the first time on the summit of the Rocky mountains at 3 A. M., by Rev. Francis Norbert Blanchet, vicar general to the Most Rev. Joseph Signay, Archbishop of Quebec, and four days later, on the 14th of October, the Immaculate Lamb was sacrificed on the altar for the first time in the country, which was then known by the name of Oregon, at Big Bend on the banks of the Columbia. The great work of evangelization of the Indian tribes in Montana, Idaho, Dakota, yea, even in the British Territory of North America, will ever be inseparably connected with the imperishable name of the Rev. Father DeSmet, of the Society of Jesus. A neat and prosperous little town in Belgium, Termonde, in the province of East Flanders, situated at the confluence of the Scheld and Dender, is the birthplace of the apostle of the Rocky mountains. There he was born on the 31st day of January, 1801, and after an eventful career of labor, privation and self-sacrifice, he departed this life at St. Louis, Missouri, May 23, 1873. "What first directed the steps of Father DeSmet to the wilds of the Rocky mountains," says a chronicler of the progress of Christian civilization in Montana, "sounds almost like a romance and will ever be one of the most interesting incidents in the early history of the country." (Rev. L. B. Palladino, S.J.) But let us listen to a most authentic record, that of an eye-witness, the Bishop of St. Louis. In a letter dated St. Louis, October 20, 1839, Bishop Joseph Rosati wrote as follows to the Father-general of the Society of Jesus at Rome:

> Eight or nine years ago (about 1830) some of the Flathead nations came to St. Louis. The object of their journey was to ascertain if the religion spoken of with so much praise by the Iroquois warriors was in reality such as represented, and above all, if the nations that have white skin had adopted and practiced it. Soon after their arrival in St. Louis they fell sick, called for the priest and earnestly asked by signs to be baptized. Their request was eagerly granted and they received the holy baptism with great devotion; then holding the crucifix, they covered it with affectionate kisses and expired.

Some years after (1839) the Flathead nation sent again one of the Iroquois to St. Louis. There he came with two of his children, who were instructed and baptized by the fathers of the college. He asked missionaries for his countrymen, and started with the hope that one day the desire of the nation would be accomplished. But on his journey he was killed by the infidel Indians of the Sioux nation.

Let us incidentally remark that the Iroquois here mentioned was called "Big Ignace," the father of Charles and Francis Saxa, the interpreter. Big Ignace must have made two trips—one with his children whom he brought back to the tribe, and another with three Flathead Indians with whom he was killed. They were traveling with traders. At a place where the wagon followed the road along a mountain, a preacher who was in the company told Ignace: "What is the use of going all the way round? We had better take the trail over the mountain." Ignace assented and the five separated from the caravan. They fell in with a war party of Sioux, who asked who were the three Indians. The preacher said they were Snakes. Though Ignace protested they were not, for he knew the Sioux were at war with the Snakes, he was not believed. The Sioux told the preacher and Ignace to stand aside. "If my friends are to die, I will die with them," said Ignace. They took a position not to be surrounded. Seven Sioux were killed and our four braves also fell.

"At last," Bishop Rosati continues, "a third deputation of Indians have arrived in St. Louis (1839), after a voyage of three months. It is composed of two Christian Iroquois. These Indians, who talk French, have edified us by their truly exemplary conduct and interested us by their discourses. The fathers of the college have heard their confessions, and to-day they approached the holy table at my mass in the cathedral church. Afterward I administered them the sacrament of confirmation, and in an allocution delivered after the ceremony, I rejoiced with them at their happiness and gave them the hope to have soon a priest. They will leave to-morrow for their homes, a priest will follow them next spring."

That priest was Father De Smet. We may infer that the honor of the Christian apostleship in the Rocky mountains, as well as of that on the shores of the Pacific, belongs primarily to the Church in Canada, whence the germ of the faith was carried and deposited among the benighted children of the forest. But in what manner was this accomplished? Let us register it with all possible accuracy; the matter is too important to be ever obliterated from our minds. "A large number of Canadians and Iroquois," writes the venerable Archbishop Blanchet, "were employed by the companies trading among the Indians of the Pacific coast. The expedition of Captain Hunt, which started from Canada in 1811, in quest of furs, had great hardships to endure, and loss of men to suffer by desertion in 1812; of the number were twenty-four Iroquois, who joined the Flathead nation. They soon married and had families." Many a time they spoke to the Flatheads of their religion, churches, priests and festivals. They cautioned them against the so-called missionaries of the Methodist denomination, saying: "These are not the priests we have spoken to you about; they are not the priests with long black gowns, who have no wives, say mass and carry a crucifix." They finally brought about a dispatch of the above deputations to St. Louis, which had for result to introduce the Rocky mountain Indians into the true fold of Christ. It was, as we have said, Father De Smet who, at the call of the Flatheads, like another St. Paul called by the Macedonians, left St. Louis in the spring of 1840 and commenced his apostleship among the Flatheads. The two Iroquois, mentioned by the Bishop of St. Louis, who were successful in securing the services of the apostle of the Rocky mountains, were Little Ignace (Petit Ignace) and Left-Handed Peter (Pierre Gaucher). They met Father De Smet somewhere in Kansas. He went with them to St. Louis. The fathers deliberated about the matter. Who could go? They were so few. Where to find the money? Father De Smet said that, if the pension coming from his family could for once be applied to that purpose, he would volunteer to go. This was agreed to, and it was arranged that one of the Iroquois would remain to help and guide the father, while the other would return to the tribe of the Flatheads and instruct them to go and meet the father at their trading place (rendezvous), a spot on Green river, in Wyoming, where the different traders and Indians used to meet every year. At this suggestion the Flatheads started for the place, though they were apprehensive lest the man coming should not be a true black-gown, until a Canadian trader, Brouillet by name, told them there was nothing to fear, that he would know the man at once and tell them. From the courageous missionary's relation we gather that, after crossing Wyoming Territory, he met a deputation of Flatheads on Green river, a tributary of the Colorado, crossed with them the divide between the waters of the Atlantic and those of the Pacific, entered Idaho Territory, not far from Jackson lake, and having met the main body of the Flatheads in Pleasant valley, traveled up Henry river, which is the principal fork of the Snake river, and after crossing once more the main divide, camped in Montana on the west bank of the Jefferson river, one of the three forks of the Missouri. This may be called the first spot where Christianity was preached in the country of the Rocky mountains. It was near that spot that the intrepid missionary ascended a mountain situate between Henry lake and what he calls "Mosquito lake," perhaps now Red Rock lake, and enjoyed the sweetest emotions. But let us describe it in his own words:

The 22d of July we reached Henry's lake, one of the main heads of the Columbia (Snake) river. It is about ten miles in circumference. We were ascending, on horseback, the mountain that separates the waters of those two great rivers, the Missouri (Jefferson), which is properly the main branch of the Mississippi and empties into the Gulf of Mexico, and the Columbia (Snake), that mingles its waters with those of the Pacific ocean. From the elevated spot where I was, I could easily descry Mosquito lake, head of one of the principal tributaries of the north fork of the Missouri, called Jefferson. There is but eight miles distance between both lakes. I went toward the top of the high mountain to examine more closely the distance from each other of the springs where these two great rivers head: I saw them come down in cataracts from an immense height, leaping from rock to rock with loud roaring; already near their source they form two wide torrents, hardly one hundred yards apart. I wanted by all means to reach the top of the mountain. After six hours' fatigue I felt exhausted; I must have climbed 5,000 feet. I had passed over snow-drifts over twenty feet deep, and yet the brow of the mountain was towering high above me. Compelled to give up my design, I sat down. I thought of the fathers of the society who attend missions on the Mississippi and its tributaries from the Council Bluffs to the Gulf of Mexico. I wept for joy at the sweet remembrances that the emotions of my heart called up. I thanked the Lord for the signal favors he had bestowed on the labors of His servants scattered in that vast vineyard, and I implored His divine grace on behalf of all the tribes of Oregon, particularly of the Flatheads and the Ponderas (Pend d'Oreilles?) that had so recently and so fervently rallied around the standard of Jesus Christ. On a soft rock I engraved the following inscription in large letters: "Stus Ignatius Patronus Montium, die Julii 23, 1840." St. Ignatius, Patron of the Mountains, July 23, 1840.

The presence of the intrepid son of St. Ignatius in Montana came to the knowledge of Father Demers, when the latter was giving a mission at Colville, W. T., and on his return to St. Paul, he brought a letter from Father De Smet to the Vicar General, Father Blanchet, from which we extract the following, dated at the Fork of the Jefferson river, August 10, 1840:

"VERY REVEREND SIR,—Your reverence will be glad to learn that Mgr. Rosati, Bishop of St. Louis, in concert with my provincial, superior of the society in Missouri, and in compliance with the desires often repeated of the Flatheads, Pen d' Oreilles and a great number of the Nez Perces, has sent me to the Rocky mountains to visit these nations. I have found the two first in the best desirable dispositions, well resolved to stand by the true children of Jesus Christ. The few weeks I had the happiness to pass among them, have been the happiest of my life and give me firm hope, with the grace of God, to see soon renewed in these countries, so long forsaken, the fervor of the first Christians. Since I am among them, I give three, four or five instructions a day. They cannot be tired; all come to my lodge at the first ringing of the bell; they are anxious to lose none of my words relating to these instructions on heavenly subjects; and if I had the strength to speak to them, they would willingly listen to me whole days and nights. I have baptized about two hundred of their little children, and expect to baptize in a short time 150 adults."

After two months of constant labor, Father De Smet, having previously descended the Jefferson river to the place where the three forks meet and form the Missouri, left his neophytes on the 27th of August, went up the Gallatin, down the Yellowstone and returned to St. Louis, but not before he had given to his newly begotten children of the mountains a solemn promise to return in the following spring with other black-robes to establish permanently the mission of which he had now laid the foundation. The little mustard-seed was now planted and was soon developed into a good-sized and healthy tree. According to promise, in the spring of 1841, Father De Smet made his reappearance, accompanied by two youthful missionaries, as intrepid as himself, Fathers Nicholas Point and Gregory Mengarini, with Brother Joseph Specht, Brother William Claessens and Brother Charles Huet. He entered the Bitter Root valley, and there, close to where Stevensville now stands, established, under the name of St. Mary, the first Catholic Indian mission in what is now the Territory of Montana. (Father Palladino.)

Early in the spring of 1842, Father De Smet left St. Mary's to travel westward, and took the Clark's Fork trail. He met the Cœur d'Alene Indians, where the fort is now. They had heard of the black-gowns settled among the Flatheads—some had even seen them—and all asked eagerly to be taught to pray. But the father could not tarry; he was going to Vancouver, by the Hudson Bay Company's boats, and the latter could not wait for him. Following, is the expedient he used to teach them the prayers so as to improve the short time time he could afford to spend among them: With the assistance of Charles Lafantaisie, his interpreter, he translated the sign of the cross, self-offering, Pater, Ave, Credo, the commandments, the acts of faith, hope, charity and contrition; he then made the young Indians stand in a large circle, ordering them to take always the same place, entrusted to the memory of each a few words of the prayers, so that each in his turn reciting his own part, the whole of the prayer was gone through. This took him three days. Very soon after his departure most of them knew all the prayers. Thence the father went to Colville, and, as the boats were not ready to start, he visited the Okanagan tribe. While going down the Columbia in the boats of the company, he was preserved from a great danger. At the Okanagan Dalles the men of the boat told him that it was a bad pass. He requested to be put ashore. The boat was engulfed in a whirlpool; only two of the men escaped death—his interpreter and another. It was in the same year, 1842, that Father De Smet arrived at St. Paul, in Oregon, having traveled from St. Mary's mission by the way of Colville, and the three first missionaries of this country enjoyed the unspeakable blessing of a fraternal meeting, the charms of which will never be known except to their own hearts. A scene ensued, so affecting and so edifying that it drew tears from the eyes of the only witness present, Father Demers, from whose lips we received the moving narrative. No sooner had Father De Smet descried the vicar-general than he ran to prostrate himself at his feet, imploring his blessing; and no sooner had the vicar-general caught sight of the valiant missionary than he also fell on his knees to implore the blessing of the saintly Jesuit. Admirable struggle of humility, where the last place, not the first, was the object of the contest.

The three apostles of this vast region resolved to combine their efforts for the conversion of the natives. The vicar-general would remain at St. Paul and take care of the converts, Father Demers was to leave for New Caledonia, now British Columbia, which he visited as far as Stuart lake, and Father De Smet promised to leave for Europe and return with fathers, brothers and sisters of charity. Pursuant to this arrangement, Father De Smet parted with Father Demers at Walla Walla, crossed the Bitter Root mountains on the Cœur d'Alene trail, part of which is now the Mullan road, and, on meeting again his Cœur d'Alene Indians, he told them to go later in the fall to the St. Mary's mission, when the Flatheads would be back from the hunt of the buffalo, promising that a father would accompany them and start a mission among them. Leaving St. Mary on July 29, 1842, Father De Smet met with the hunting party and instructed Father N. Point, who was with the hunters, to go with the Cœur d'Alene deputation, he and Brother Charles Huet, and establish a new mission, which they did on St. Joseph's river, a very beautiful place that time of the year, but mostly under water in the spring. This mission was moved in 1846, to the Cœur d'Alene river, to the place now called Old Cœur d'Alene Mission, whence it was removed to Hangman creek, where it is now permanently located, not far from Farmington, Wyoming Territory. Having arrived at St. Louis at the end of October, of the same year, 1842, the indefatigable missionary was instrumental in sending Fathers F. De Vos, as vice-superior of the missions, and A. Hoecken, with Brother J. B. McGean. He accompanied them until he saw them fairly on the road, in company with Lord Stuart, and then returned to St. Louis, where he found the Jesuit Fathers Joset and Zerbinati and Brother Magri, who, having been fifty-two days crossing the Atlantic, had arrived too late from Europe to join the expedition. They had to wait until the next year. It was in October, 1843, that Father Blanchet received, at St. Paul, in Oregon, the news of the arrival, with a caravan, of 700 souls, of the Rev. Fathers De Vos and Hoecken. In the meantime Father De Smet arrived in Europe, where he was known by his letters, welcomed by all, and much encouraged. In Rome, when the general of the order of the Jesuits, Father Roothan, presented him to His Holiness Gregory XVI, the pope rose from his throne and embraced him. But when he found out that they had resolved to raise him to the episcopate, he became much alarmed. He represented that Father Blanchet, his senior in age, had preceded him in Oregon, and was in every way qualified for the episcopal dignity. With the help of his father-general, he succeeded in throwing the episcopal burden on the shoulders of the vicar-general of the Archbishop of Quebec. In the year, 1844, a new impulse was given to the Catholic missions of the Rocky mountains by the arrival of the Jesuit Fathers, Joset and Zerbinati, with Bro. Magri, who crossed the plains and traveled overland, and Fathers Ravalli, Accolti, Nobili and Vercruysse, who arrived by sea with Father De Smet, several lay brothers and six sisters of Notre Dame. It was on the 17th of August that the latter religious caravan reached St. Paul, in Oregon. In the fall of the same year, 1844, Father De Vos sent Father Hoecken to establish the St. Ignatius mission on the right bank of Clark's or Pen d'Oreille river, about sixty miles below Sandy Point, in a place called Kalispel, whence, in 1854, it was removed to its present locality near the Jocko creek, Missoula county. At the end of November, 1844, Father De Smet, having visited the St. Ignatius and St. Joseph's (Cœur d'Alene) missions, anxious to see his dear Flatheads, started by the trail, now Mullan road. They were engaged in the defile when a sudden thaw caused the river to swell very fast. The father's companions told him there was no time to lose to retreat their steps. When on the bank of the Cœur d'Alene river, above the old mission, they camped on high ground, but in the night they were awakened by the water gaining on them. All the bottom-land was under water; they had no means to cross, no way to call for help. Providentially a hunter came up in his small canoe. The first care of the Indians was to drive all the animals across the river; the current was so swift that the Indians expected them all to be drowned, but when they saw them all safe on the other side, the good Indians exclaimed: "It is because they belong to the father they escaped; had they been ours they would all have perished!" Then in successive trips the hunter took the father, his companions and their baggage across to a safe place and went to a mission, whence four canoes were sent to bring them down.

The news of the erection of Oregon into a Vicariate Apostolic had already reached the settlers of that extensive country when, on the 4th of November, 1844, two pontifical briefs were received at St. Paul, one appointing Vicar-General F. N. Blanchet Bishop of Philadelphia I. P. I., the other giving him charge of the newly elected Vicariate of Oregon. This title of Bishop of Philadelphia was changed, on representation made to Rome from Quebec, into that of Bishop of Drasa, I. P. I., on the 4th of May, 1845. In order to receive the episcopal consecration, the Bishop elect started for Canada, thence for Europe, and returned to Oregon and entered the Columbia river on the 13th of August, 1847, with seven sisters of Notre Dame, three Jesuit Fathers (Gaets, Gazzoli and Menetrey), three lay brothers, five secular priests (Fathers Lebas, McCormick, Deleveau, Pretot and Veryret), two deacons (B. Delorme and J. F. Jayol) and one cleric (T. Mesplie). The arrival of this numerous caravan procured additional help for the missions of the Rocky Mountains, where, a few years later, by the arrival of Father Giorda, S. J., that much lamented model of energy, zeal and self-abnegation, new life and vigor were infused into the Catholic missions. His arrival took place in 1859, when the mission of St. Peter was started among the Blackfeet. From the above we can infer that the present Territory of Montana was originally under the jurisdiction of both the Archbishop of Quebec and the Bishop of St. Louis, the western part being mainly in the possession of the Hudson Bay Company, the eastern part being rather a part of the United States, no precise line, however, being drawn between both jurisdictions. The fathers in the West had received their faculties from Quebec; those in the east from St. Louis. It was only in 1868 that, at the instance of the Fathers of the Council of Baltimore, two Vicariates Apostolic were erected, viz: the Vicariate of Idaho, including both the Territory of Idaho and that part of Montana which lies west of the Rocky mountains, and the Vicariate of Montana, comprising that portion of Montana which is situate east of the Ridge of the Rocky mountains. But the Bishop elect, appointed for the Vicariate of Montana, refused to accept the appointment, and that vicariate was annexed to the Vicariate Apostolic of Nebraska; and the Vicar Apostolic who took charge of the Vicariate of Idaho was compelled by ill health to resign, so that this vicariate was joined to the diocese of Oregon City. This was not a normal condition. The distance of Montana from the episcopal sees, to which that Territory was subject, hampered the exercise of the spiritual jurisdiction. The wisdom of the Holy See has sought and found a remedy for that evil by making of the civil Territory of Montana a Vicariate Apostolic, and it will be in charge of an Apostolical Vicar until the time shall have arrived to erect it into a diocese with an episcopal see, cathedral and residence. Rt. Rev. John Baptist Brondel, Bishop of Vancouver Island, entered upon his duties in August, 1883, as the first bishop of Montana. The history of each church is given in the history of the counties.

First Catholic Synod.—The first synod of the Catholic hierarchy of Montana was held at Helena June 24, 1884. It was composed as follows: Rt. Rev. John Baptist Brondel,

Edwin J. Stanley

BUTTE.

Bishop of Helena. Rev. J. M. Cataldo, Superior General of all the Jesuit missions in the Rocky mountains, a native of Sicily, and a missionary for twenty years in Montana. Rev. J. Minetery, S. J., rector of the church at Missoula, born in Switzerland, and a missionary for over thirty-five years in Montana. Rev. J. B. Imoda, S. J., resident priest at the cathedral, born in Turin, Piedmont, and a missionary in Montana since 1859. Rev. H. D'Aste, S. J., rector of Saint Mary's church, Bitter Root valley, a native of Genoa, and a missionary in the mountains for many years. Rev. L. B. Palladino, S. J., Superior of Saint Ignatius mission, a native of Italy, and well known for fourteen years as rector of the Church of the Sacred Heart in Helena. Rev. J. Deryckere, rector of Deer Lodge since 1866; born in Flanders, Belgium. Rev. J. Guidi, S. J., a Roman, resident visiting missionary at the cathedral. Rev. P. A. Barcello, S. J., missionary among the Crows; a native of Mexico. Rev. E. W. J. Lindesmith, United States army chaplain; born in Columbiana county, Ohio, a great-grandson of a revolutionary soldier, and a descendant of a soldier of the war of 1812. Rev. J. J. Dolls, rector of Butte; native of Limberg, Holland. Rev. Frederick Eberville, S. J., rector of the church at Benton; a native of Germany. Rev. J. Damiani, S. J., Superior at St. Peter's Mission; a native of Rome. Rev. L. G. Tremblay, S. T. L., licentiate in sacred theology; rector of Frenchtown, Missoula county; a native of Montreal, Canada.

The following priests of the diocese would be present at the synod except for disabilities sufficient to entitle them to a dispensation: Rev. Antoine Revalli, S. J. and M. D., a native of Rome, born in 1812, and a priest in the Montana missions for forty-two years, but now an invalid, residing at Saint Mary's, Bitter Root valley. Rev. L. Van Gorp, S. J., a native of Belgium, and well known as rector of the Church of the Sacred Heart at Helena for a number of years; missionary among the Flatheads, St. Ignatius Mission. Rev. J. Bendini, S. J., a native of Italy, and a resident missionary in Montana for twenty years, now residing at Saint Peter's Mission. Rev. P. Bendini, S. J., born in Italy, residing at Saint Ignatius Mission. Rev. J. Iler, a native of France, missionary among the Cheyenne Indians. Rev. P. Prando, S. J., a native of Italy, a missionary among the Blackfeet.

On the same day the corner-stone of the new buildings for St. John's Hospital was laid. At the dinner which followed the reverend gentlemen indulged in the pleasantry of addressing his lordship in toasts of welcome in twelve different languages: the Rev. Father Lindesmith in English, Father Dols in Flemish, Father Cataldo in Italian, Father Barcello in Spanish, Father Eberville in German, Father Tremblay in French, Father Guidi in Latin, Father Imoda in Blackfoot, Father d'Este in Blackfoot, Father Guidi in Nez Percez, Father Barcello in Crow, to which the Bishop responded in Chinook.

The Protestant Episcopal Church.—This church was founded at Virginia City December 25, 1865, when a number of members met in Judge Lovell's office, and attended services, conducted by Prof. T. J. Dimsdale. Services were continued by Mr. Dimsdale for twelve weeks, there being no clergyman of this church nearer than Boise City, Idaho. William J. Marshall conducted services March 24, 1867, and continued to preside until July of that year. On the 18th of that month Bishop Tuttle and Rev. E. N. Goddard arrived, and on the 21st held the first regular services of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Montana within the Council hall.

The Territory was set off as a missionary district in 1865, and in January, 1867, Rev. D. S. Tuttle, pastor of the church at Morris, N. Y., was chosen bishop. As has been stated, he arrived in the Territory July 17, 1867, accompanied by Mr. Goddard, and after founding a society at Virginia City, proceeded to Helena in company with Mr. Goddard, where he held services and organized a society August 11, 1867. Leaving Mr. Goddard in charge of the Helena mission, the bishop returned to Virginia, where he purchased the Methodist church building, partly completed it, and held services therein May 24, 1868, being the first church building owned by the society in the Territory. The bishop held the first services at his church at Deer Lodge July 19, 1868, and in September, 1871, Rev. W. H. Story organized the parish of St. James there, and Bishop Tuttle and Rev. Mr. Gilbert introduced the church to Butte, October 20, 1875, and the latter named gentleman organized St. John's parish there early in 1877. Bishop Tuttle visited Missoula in August, 1870, and held the first service of his church in that county. Seven years later Rev. G. L. Stewart organized the mission of the Holy Spirit there. The first services of this church at Bozeman were held in July, 1868, by the bishop. Seven years later Rev. T. E. Dickey took charge of the mission, organized the parish of St. James, and completed the church building there in 1877. Since that time missions were established as follows: Trinity Mission, Madison Valley; St. Luke's Mission, Sheridan; St. Paul's Mission, Fort Benton; St. James' Mission, Dillon, building begun July 1, 1882; St. Andrew's Mission, Philipsburg; St. Mark's Mission, Glendale; St. Paul's Mission, Miles City, organized August 1, 1882; ——— Mission, Deep Creek and Centreville; Choteau Mission, Fort Shaw and Sun River; Boulder Mission, Jefferson and Boulder; Fort Mission, Fort Assinniboine. In the history of the several counties of the Territory the history of these churches is given very fully; what the bishop and his pastors have done, to build up this denomination here, is portrayed. His whole career here was one of usefulness, one characterized by zealousness and steady work. On December 8, 1880, he subscribed his name to a valedictory letter, from which the following extracts are taken:

"WATERTOWN, N. Y., Dec. 8, 1880.

"To the Clergy and People of Montana:

"DEARLY-LOVED FRIENDS: In an hour or two the Rev. L. R. Brewer is to be consecrated your bishop. Then is made over to him the name I have always been proud of and have loved, the Bishop of Montana. It becomes me to say my good-bye. My heart, torn with sorrowfulness at this rupture, tells how you are all imbedded in it. Precious memories, crowding themselves upon this hour, witness how lovingly good you have been to me. Let me say out my sadness. The valleys and hillsides, the very nooks and crannies of your Territory, are dear to me from association. * * * * * Brethren beloved! Good-bye! That means God be with you! He will helpfully bide with you, if you trustfully lean on Him. My love and prayers are yours. With an almost bursting heart I lay down my pastoral staff as Bishop of Montana. God hold me. Amen."

On the same day Rt. Rev. L. R. Brewer, S. T. D., took charge of this missionary diocese, and under his direction the work of organization and church building has received a new impulse. The condition of the church in the Territory at the close of August, 1883, is shown in the following review:

The churches of the diocese are: St. Peter's, Helena; St. Paul's, Virginia City; Trinity, Madison Valley; St. Luke's, Sheridan; St. James', Dillon; St. John's, Butte; St. Mark's, Glendale; St. James', Deer Lodge; St. Andrew's, Phillipsburg; St. James, Bozeman; Holy Spirit, Missoula; St. Paul's, Benton; chapel at Fort Assinniboine; at Fort Shaw and Sun River; at Deep Creek and Centreville; at Jefferson, Boulder, Livingston, Billings, and other places. The number of clergy in 1882–3 was nine, including the bishop; of church buildings, 7; of communicants, 485, and property valued at $54,357.80. The number of baptisms was 165; of confirmations, 67; of marriages, 38; of burials, 62. The Sunday schools were attended by 527 pupils, and presided over by 64 teachers.

Presbyterian Church.—The establishment and growth of the Presbyterian Church in Montana is told by Rev. J. R. Russell, in his historical paper of 1880: "At the session of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, held in Detroit, Michigan, May, 1872, the committee on overtures recommended to the Assembly as follows: That the Rev. Sheldon Jackson, the Rev. W. S. Frackelton, of the Presbytery of Colorado; the Rev. Josiah Welch, of the Presbytery of Wyoming; the Rev. Lyman B. Crittenden, of the Presbytery of Pittsburgh; and the Rev. William C. Rommel, of the Presbytery of Elizabeth, together with the Presbyterian churches in the territories of Utah and Montana, be, and they hereby are, constituted a presbytery, to be known as the Presbytery of Montana, and to be connected with the Synod of Colorado; and that the said presbytery shall hold its first meeting at Helena, Montana, on Tuesday, July 16, 1872, at 11 o'clock A.M., to be opened with a sermon by the Rev. Sheldon Jackson, or, in his absence, by the oldest minister present, who shall preside until another moderator be chosen."

The above is the official order that called into existence the Presbytery of Montana. It was found that a quorum could not be obtained on the day appointed, so it was arranged by the members that the session should begin on June 17, 1872. According to appointment, Rev. Sheldon Jackson preached the sermon. The ministerial members present were: Messrs. Jackson, Frackelton and Russel. Mr. A. T. Williams represented the Helena church as elder. Mr. Jackson was elected moderator and Mr. Russel stated clerk. A distance of nearly five hundred miles separated the two portions of the presbytery, so it was almost impossible for the whole membership to be together at any one session. Arrangements were made at this first meeting for conducting only the work in Montana. It was decided that one session should be held in Montana each year and one in Utah. That first session of the Presbytery of Montana was never held in Utah. In the fall of 1872 Rev. Lyman B.

Crittenden left Corinne and came to Montana. Rev. Josiah Welch was thus left alone, the only member of the Presbytery of Montana in Utah. By an act of some church court that part of the Presbytery of Montana that lay in Utah was annexed to the presbytery of Wyoming, but no notice of such a division was ever sent to the part of the presbytery which lies in Montana. Rev. W. C. Rommel arrived in Helena to take charge of the church there in the fall of 1872. At the meeting of the Presbytery in Bozeman in February, 1873, four ministers and three elders were present. In April of that year Rev. W. S. Frackelton went back to the States. During that year Rev. Sheldon Jackson was transferred to the Presbytery of Colorado and Rev. Josiah Welch to the Presbytery of Wyoming. This left the church in Bozeman without a supply until the summer of 1877, when Rev. C. L. Richards, of the Presbytery of Cleveland, arrived. Rev. L. B. Crittenden, on his arrival in Bozeman, September, 1872, opened a select school. In about a year he moved to Hamilton and opened a boarding-school for girls. In addition to teaching, Mr. Crittenden regularly preached at a number of stations in Gallatin valley for several years. His health at last compelled him to give up traveling, and he devoted his time to the Hamilton church, until he was constrained by increasing infirmities to give up ministerial labor altogether. Rev. W. C. Rommel left in 1876. His departure left only two Presbyterian ministers in Montana.

On January 1, 1877, Rev. J. D. Hewitt arrived in Helena to supply that church. In the summer of the same year Rev. C. L. Richards came to Bozeman and Rev. M. L. Cook to Missoula. Mr. Hewitt leaving in 1879, his place was filled in the presbytery the same year by Rev. George G. Smith. Rev. R. H. Howey was received into the presbytery at the session in August. It was at this session that Mr. J. L. Henning, licentiate of the Presbytery of Transylvania, was received under the care of the Presbytery of Montana and ordained to be an evangelist. In 1880 Messrs. Smith and Henning left the territory. Mr. Henning still retains his ecclesiastical connection with this presbytery. Rev. Thomas Wickes, in 1880, came to this presbytery from the Kidder Congregational Association in Missouri. In 1881 Rev. W. B. Reed came to Helena, and is the first and only pastor in the presbytery in Montana.

At the session of the presbytery held in February, 1873, eight churches were reported as organized. No provision being made for their ministerial supply, five of them had no existence when the year closed. In 1876, under an order from presbytery, the Missoula church was started with ten persons. In 1877 Mr. Crittenden organized the church at Hamilton with seventeen members. In 1878 was organized with ten members the church in Butte. The church at Wickes was begun by the organization of all other professing Christians at that place in a union church. In a few months they unanimously agreed to apply for admission as a Presbyterian Church into the Presbytery of Montana. This was in 1880. The same year the church at Stevensville was organized, as, also, the church in Miles City. The church in Deer Lodge was the first Presbyterian church in Montana to possess a house of worship. It was finished in January, 1875. Following this church was the one in Helena, which completed its house in 1876, at a cost of more than $11,000. Then the Hamilton church building was erected. The church in Bozeman was erected in 1880. The Butte church is the only church in the presbytery that boasts of having a church debt. It would gladly remove all such cause of boasting.

The membership of the churches as reported at the first meeting of the presbytery, in 1872, was less than sixty. The membership in 1880 was nearly three hundred. It has not been a rapid growth, but it is permanent and substantial. The growth of Presbyterianism since 1880 has kept pace with that of other denominations, extended its influence along the Yellowstone and the Upper Missouri country, and continues to follow up the new settlers into the most remote corners of the Territory.

*Methodist Episcopal Church.—The history of the Methodist Episcopal church dates back to the fall of 1864. Rev. A. M. Hough was sent by the board of M. E. Missions as the first missionary to Montana, he and his wife arriving in Virginia City in September of 1864, coming all the way by stage coach from Omaha, a long and perilous journey. He at once commenced the work of preaching, as he could find opportunity, and the erection of a log chapel, was completed that fall, together with a log parsonage, which he built during the winter, he going to the mountains after, and preparing the logs himself, for the parsonage, to live in. Rev. Hugh Duncan, a local preacher and miner, living in Alder gulch, had, however, arrived the year before, and if I am not mistaken, preached the first sermon in

* Rev. Geo. Comfort, Sec. Mon. Mis.

Virginia City as coming from Methodists. Brother Hough organized a small class in Virginia City, had large congregations, and some revivals, the winter of 1864–5. He remained in Virginia City nearly two years as pastor and superintendent of the mission, but in the winter and spring of 1865 a stampede was made to the Last Chance gulch, where Helena City is now located. He made a visit to this place during this year, and saw the needs of a preacher there. Accordingly the Rev. William McLaughlin was sent as the second missionary to Montana, and appointed to Helena in 1865. During early autumn, he preached the first sermon in the now city of Helena, on a pile of logs, from which he erected the first Methodist church in Helena that season. Brother McLaughlin remained in Helena as pastor for a year, when in 1866 Brother Hough moved to Helena, Brother McLaughlin taking Diamond City. During the winter of 1866–7, the Rev. Mr. King was sent on as the third missionary, During his stay at Virginia City of a year, he succeeded in erecting a new frame church nearly to completion, when, with some pressing debts upon it, amid the discouragements facing him, he suddenly left, and has never been heard from. Through his mysterious departure, and because of a little debt on the church, it was sold on "mechanics' lien," and lots to Methodism, in the early spring of 1868; although $3,000 had been collected and paid thereon. By this unfortunate management, Bishop Tuttle, of the Episcopal church, succeeded in obtaining at a small sum the first church in Montana, erected by us. In April, 1868, Rev. George Comfort, of the Wyoming Conference, was appointed to Virginia City. But ere he arrived, June 1, the time for its redemption was passed, and it lost. Upon arriving at Helena, June 10, 1868, he was ordered by Superintendent Hough to remain. He had already commenced the erection of a large frame church there, and had tendered his resignation as superintendent of the Montana Mission, preparatory to emigrating to Southern California. He had now been missionary here in Montana, nearly four years, but his wife's health was such he felt it his duty to seek a balmier climate for her, and in July he closed his work, turning it over to George Comfort, who was in the meantime appointed by the bishop to take the pastorate at Helena. McLaughlin also returned to Ohio, and died there. This left George Comfort alone, as the only traveling preacher. He was, however, somewhat aided by Rev. Duncan, of Alder gulch, W. W. Alderson and Mathew Bird, of Bozeman, local preachers at that time. Mr. McLaughlin had organized the first class in Helena, and in the autumn of 1877, Mr. Hough made a visit to Bozeman, organizing the first class of eight members there. From 1864 to 1868, there had been received seventy-five members, with a removal of forty-seven, leaving only twenty-eight members at this time. There had been also a small frame church begun in Bozeman, which was occupied for services of preaching and Sunday-school, in which, however, the first district court of Gallatin county was held by the Hon. Judge Hosmer, in July, 1868. During this year George Comfort completed the church at Helena, raising some $3,500 additional to the $5,500 obtained before. On the 1st of November, 1868, he dedicated it, raising on that day $1,750, leaving a debt upon it of $1,000, which he carried himself. There had been an aggregate increase of members this year of twenty-nine, and the Sunday-school, grown from forty to eighty-nine members, while the congregations were large, with good order prevailing. In July, 1869, Rev. S. G. Lathrop, was appointed superintendent of the mission, arriving with his family in Helena, 1st of September. By appointment of Bishop Clark, George Comfort was made missionary at large, traveling through all the towns and settlements of the territory; he made Virginia City his headquarters. He was thus enabled to preach the first sermons in many places, among which were Sheridan, the Beaver Head valley, the Madison valley, the Upper Willow creek region, Fish creek, Silver Star, up the Bitter Root valley, and many other places. Classes were organized at Sheridan and Bannack. In June, 1870, Rev. J. A. Van Anda was appointed missionary. At Virginia City he organized a class of thirteen members, then he moved to Bozeman; Brother Duncan succeeding him on the Virginia City charge. Mr. Van Anda, reorganized a class of nine members at Bozeman, remaining there one year. In the early winter George Comfort returned to New York, and one year after S. G. Lathrop to Illinois. During the spring of 1871, Rev. T. C. Iliff came to Helena, where he remained until fall, when he located at Missoula, where he organized a class, and began the building of the Missoula church on about the 1st of June, 1872. Upon the retirement of Brother Lathrop Brother Van Anda was appointed superintendent of the mission, and moved to Helena as pastor, at the same time. At this time the records show a membership of 101, with an indebtedness on the Helena church of $1,478. Brothers Alderson and Bird sustained services following Brother Van Anda, leaving five preachers, all told, in the field. During the winter of 1871, Mr. Duncan bought a large house in Alder gulch and removed it to Sheridan and put it up for a church, which is now a commodious and neat little place of worship. On June 19, Mr. Van Anda's little boy, Paul, and two others were playing with fire, setting fire to the little barn, then the parsonage, and at last the church, when all our church property was destroyed, costing up to that time nearly $16,000. Immediately following this fearful disaster, a subscription was secured of $4,300, this, added to an insurance of $1,000, gave them encouragement to commence at once the erection of a brick church, which has since then been completed at a cost of some $10,000. The report shows in 1872 a membership of ninety-five; churches, five; parsonages, one and one-half; Sunday schools, twelve; scholars, 733. In 1872, by the act of the General Conference, the Montana and Utah missions were organized into the Rocky Mountain Conference. It held its first session at Salt Lake City on August 8th and 11th, having appointed to Helena district J. A. Vanda, P. E. with T. C. Iliff, H. Duncan, and W. W. Alderson, as preachers. Three charges were left to be supplied. Bishop R. S. Foster presided, and J. M. Jameson was elected secretary. In 1873, the second session of the Rocky Mountain Conference was held at Salt Lake City, Bishop Jesse T. Peck presiding, and D. G. Strong, secretary. During the previous year, Brothers F. A. Riggin and William W. Van Orsdel came to the work, the former by transfer from the Minnesota Conference, and L. W. B. Long, from the Central Ohio Conference. Six preachers were appointed for the year 1873–4, with about one hundred members, and eight Sunday-schools. The third session of the Rocky Mountain Conference was also held in Salt Lake City, commencing August 13 to 17, 1874, Bishop Bowman presiding, D. G. Strong again elected secretary. The fourth session of the Rocky Mountain Conference was held at Salt Lake City, August 12 to 16, 1875, Bishop G. Haven presiding, D. G. Strong, secretary. On July 27 to 31, 1876, the Rocky Mountain Conference held its fifth and last session at Helena, Bishop W. L. Harris presiding, with F. A. Riggin, secretary. Seven preachers were appointed to charges with two districts; F. A. Riggin and W. C. Shippen, presiding elders. The last Montana Annual Conference was held at Bozeman, August 2, 1884, Bishop Bowman presiding, and L. W. B. Long, secretary. Five preachers were appointed this year to charges, with ten charges left to be supplied. L. W. B. Long and F. A. Riggin, presiding elders. The Montana Conference held its second session at Virginia City, August 2, 1878, and Hugh Duncan was elected secretary, Bishop E. G. Andrews presiding, with six preachers present. At this conference we find reported 295 members, six churches, fifteen Sunday-schools, officers and teachers, 80; scholars, 570.

The third session of the Montana Conference was held in the city of Butte, July 3 to 7, 1879, Bishop Merrill presiding, and W. C. Shippen elected secretary. Four members of the conference were present, and the bishop requested to transfer Rev. George Comfort, who was again present, from the Wyoming to the Montana Conference. Seven preachers were appointed to charges, and four charges left to be supplied this year.

The General Conference of 1880 resolved the Montana Conference into the Montana Mission of the Methodist Episcopal church. Our membership at this time was 327; Sunday-schools, 12; officers and teachers, 64; scholars, 505; churches, 8.

In 1880, July 23, 24, our first Mission Conference was held in Virginia City, presided over by Bishop I. W. Wiley, D.D., with Geo. Comfort, secretary. Five members were present. Rev. F. A. Riggin was appointed superintendent of the mission, with five preachers and two charges to be supplied, making seven in all.

In July, 21 to 24, 1881, the second session of the Mission Conference was held at Helena, Bishop Wiley presiding and Geo. Comfort, secretary. Eight members were present, and four others with them appointed to as many charges this year. The third session of the Montana Mission Conference was held in Bozeman City, July 21–3, 1882, Bishop J. F. Hurst presiding, and Geo. Comfort elected secretary. Eleven members were present. Twelve preachers were appointed at this meeting to charges, with eight charges to be supplied. At this meeting the Montana Christian Advocate was adopted, and J. Jay Garvin elected its editor. A resolution was passed and a general committee appointed to inaugurate measures toward the founding of an institution of learning, to report at the next meeting. The object entertained was to start a primary school to a university of learning in Montana. The fourth meeting of the Montana Mission Conference, held its session at Butte, August 15 to 21, 1883. Bishop Wiley, who has had Episcopal supervision since its organization, for the third time was present and presided, Geo. Comfort for the fourth time being elected secretary. Sixteen preachers were in attendance. Five districts were formed and four presiding elders appointed along with F. A. Riggin, the superintendent, together with fifteen other preachers and twenty-seven charges, leaving nine to be supplied; Brother Van Orsdel being still missionary at large. There are now twenty-two preachers. The church has obtained a present membership, including probationers, of 610. She has twelve churches built and five more nearly completed, with eight parsonages, all worth, at the present time, not less than $85,000. She has twenty-two Sunday-schools with a membership of 1,000 scholars. She raised during the last year, toward churches, parsonages, the support of the ministry and benevolence, the sum of $16,704.02.

Congregational Church.—The conference of the Congregational churches of Montana was held at Livingstone in May, 1885. Four years ago this denomination had no church in the territory; to-day it has six that stand monuments of faithful endeavor; to-day it has about 175 members. The reports given by the churches were very encouraging and bespeak great things for the future. Rev. C. L. Diven, of Butte City, has received during his pastorate of less than two years (none of the ministers of this society have been in the territory two years) thirty-six members and raised the church to a healthy and very prosperous condition. Rev. R. B. Tobey, of Helena, received thirty-five members and has built one of the finest edifices in the far northwest. Rev. S. A. Wallace, of Billings, has received about thirty-six members, beautified the interior of the church, and reports progress in general. Rev. Mr. Pamment, of Glendive, reported encouraging progress in all departments. The interior of the fine church, which the large souled liberality of the Hon. Frederick and Mrs. Billings enabled the congregation to build at Livingstone, has been beautified and made to correspond with the elegant exterior appearance.

The Methodist Church South.—This society was introduced into the territory in 1863, at Virginia City, and subsequently at Helena. The membership is small.—Vide Local History.

The Baptist church is represented in the territory by about 200 members and three ministers. In 1882-3 church buildings were erected by this society at Butte and Helena, while missions were established in many other places.—(Vide Local History.)

The Christian Church claims a representation of 250 members, presided over by two elders.

Spiritualists, Mormons, Saints of the Most High, Quakers, Buddhists, and, in fact, representatives of every system of worship, are found in Montana.

SCHOOLS.

Prior to the organization of Oregon territory the schools of St. Mary and St. Ignatius were established in Montana and continued to afford all the facilities for education to be found in the Rocky mountain region. In 1863, when the mining interests gave token of permanence, private schools were instituted at Bannack and Virginia City. In 1864 the common school system was instituted. The school clause in the organic act provided, "That when the lands in said territory shall be surveyed, under the direction of the government of the United States, preparatory to bringing the same into market, sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in each township in said territory shall be reserved for the purpose of being applied to schools, and in the states and territories hereafter to be erected out of the same." This liberal provision, made by the general government, was supplemented by the first Territorial Legislature in the act approved February 7, 1865, providing for the establishment and support of schools. From this period forward the advances made under this system of public education were gradual, the enrollment embracing little more than half the children of school age enumerated in the census returns. In 1867-8 the first true census of children was taken, and reports of attendance furnished by teachers. From such reports the following table is taken:

In 1881 there were 91 log, 29 frame and 12 brick buildings devoted to public education. This number was increased in 1882 to 133, some of the old buildings being enlarged and the new buildings made commodious. The following table shows at a glance the growth of the school interest from 1873 to 1883:

T. F. Campbell, superintendent of public instruction, in his report of November 30, 1868, refers at length to the condition of schools in the territory at that time, and quotes from county superintendents' report as follows:

Mr. E. Thrasher, superintendent for Madison county, uses the following very encouraging language: "Madison county, with the present population and school tax, will be able to maintain about ten schools—a majority of them the greater part of the year. An annual report from the districts would be quite sufficient, with two appropriations as there now are. The schools are quite efficient and the people much interested." Dr. A. J. Hunter, superintendent of Meagher county, informs me that he districted his county soon after his appointment, but he has not succeeded in having a single district organized. His report shows nothing beyond the amount of money in the treasury belonging to the school fund. Mr. M. Perrin from Deer Lodge gives a more flattering report. In the organized districts schools are well sustained, and the people are generally showing a lively interest in the subject of education. From Gallatin I have only the statistical report of the superintendent, without note or comment. I infer, however, from the number of organized districts and the number of children taught, that the valley county is not behind in her educational facilities, and that her schools are in a healthy condition. Lewis and Clarke county has only three organized districts, two of which, in the Prickly Pear valley, sustain good schools during the winter months. The Helena district has now three common schools with an aggregate attendance of one hundred and eighty-one (181) pupils. The interest manifested, and the zeal and energy displayed by our present efficient board of directors in Helena, are worthy of the highest commendation. I may be permitted to note, also, the select school of Prof. E. W. Stone, numbering from twenty to thirty students, as an institution in the territory pushing forward the great interests of education. Prof. Stone is now conducting a course of lectures being delivered in Helena, which he proposes to extend through the winter months, from which we anticipate good results by placing the whole subject of education in a clear and impressive light before the people.

The condition of the territory with respect to education is shown in the following tables:

The following extract from Superintendent Hedges' report for 1884 points out at once the advances made since 1882: There are at present about 200 school districts in the Territory, those in the larger places employing several teachers and continuing the terms during nine months, but the larger number not more than four months, making the average between five and six months. The number of children of school age in the Territory is about 14,000, and about 54 per cent of that number are enrolled as scholars. If the enrollment were reckoned on the age of actual attendance—5 to 15 years—the per cent would be over 70, and the per capita of money expended in education would be as great as that of any state in the Union. There are no normal schools in Montana for training teachers, and relatively high wages are paid to induce their coming from other states, the average of teachers' wages for all grades, per month, being $60.

The value of public school buildings in Montana is not less than $250,000, and the amount expended in their support upward of $200,000 per year.

The text-book law was approved February 23, 1881.

The general government, in the act approved February, 18, 1881, granted to each of the Territories 72 entire sections of public lands for the use and support of a Territorial University. Superintendent Howie was appointed March 10, 1882, by the Secretary of the Interior to select the lands for the use of the University of Montana. This duty he accomplished without compensation. He says: "In view of the fact that all the best portions of the public lands of the Territory would soon be taken up, I undertook to discharge the trust on the terms indicated. The seventy-two sections have been located according to the requirements of the act, seven sections in the Miles City district, ten sections in the Bozeman district and fifty-five sections in the Helena district. Doubtless most of these lands will be valuable at no distant day. They have been selected along the watercourses, and for the most part in localities which are rapidly settling up. As far as it could be done a number of sections lying contiguous to each other were selected, as it was thought the land would ultimately be more valuable in large than small tracts. These lands will eventually be appraised and sold at auction, the proceeds thereof to be applied to the founding of a university according to the specifications of the act." This grant of 46,080 acres of lands selected by the careful superintendent ought to yield about $150,000, the annual interest on which, at five per cent., would give $7,500.

Two sections in every township, or one-eighteenth part of all the surface of the Territory, was granted for the use and benefit of schools. This would give a body of school land of about 8,000 square miles. If this land is sold at an average of $2 per acre, it will yield as a permanent school fund upward of $10,000,000. At five per cent. the annual revenue would be $500,000, a sum four times greater than the entire school revenue of the Territory in 1882.

Throughout Montana the cause of education is well protected. In addition to the common schools, there are many denominational and private schools, each well conducted. In Lewis and Clarke county Miss Helen P. Clarke holds the position of superintendent; while in Meagher county the electors conferred a similar office on Miss Alice Nichols, and on Miss A. M. Darcy, while in Choteau county Mrs. M. E. Johnson was elected, thus departing from the old-time principle of excluding ladies from important public positions. The system of education known in the Territory is at once liberal and practical. (Vide schools in history of counties.)

CHAPTER XII.

SOCIETIES OF MONTANA.

THE history of the Historical Society may be said to begin two years after the discovery of the mines at Bannack, and before the first Legislature of Montana convened there. In the summer and fall of 1864, a number of the leading citizens of the Territory saw the necessity of collecting material for history, and with the end in view of gathering all such material, they resolved to form an association, and sought from the Legislature authority to incorporate for that purpose. The act, approved February 2, 1865, constituted Judge H. L. Hosmer, C. P. Higgins, James Stuart, John Owen, Wilbur F. Sanders, Malcolm Clark, F. M. Thompson, Granville Stuart, William Graham, W. W. De Lacy, C. E. Irvine and Charles S. Bagg charter members of the society.

At a meeting of the corporators of the Historical Society of Montana, held at the office of Messrs. Dance & Stuart, at Virginia City, Montana, pursuant to a notice published in the Montana Post, on the 25th day of February, A. D. 1865, a majority of the corporators named in the act of incorporation were present, and the meeting was called to order by Chief Justice Hez. L. Hosmer. "Upon a motion for the purpose, Wilbur F. Sanders was elected temporary president, and Granville Stuart, secretary. The 'act to incorporate the Historical Society of Montana' was then read, and on motion it was resolved that we will and hereby do accept the said act of incorporation upon the terms and conditions, and for the purposes therein set forth, and will proceed to organize thereunder. Upon a motion made by Frank M. Thompson, which was carried, that the temporary president appoint committees on permanent organization and on a constitution and by-laws, the president appointed a committee on permanent organization, as follows: Frank M. Thompson, Granville Stuart and Malcolm Clark; and on a constitution and by-laws, as follows: Hon. Hez. L. Hosmer, Charles S. Bagg and James Stuart. On motion, it was voted that the persons named in the act of incorporation be invited to meet at this place on Saturday, March 25, 1865, at 8 o'clock P.M., for the purpose of a permanent organization of the society, and for the transaction of such further business as shall be brought before said meeting."

The meeting of March 25, 1865, was held in the office of Dance & Stuart, at Virginia City, when Wilbur F. Sanders was elected President; Granville Stuart, Secretary and Treasurer; Hez. L. Hosmer, Historian; Chris. P. Higgins, W. F. Sanders, Malcolm Clark, Walter W. De Lacy and Hez. L. Hosmer, Directors. Walter B. Dance was admitted a member at this meeting, and he, with Granville Stuart and Charles S. Bagg, were appointed a committee to examine applications for membership. From 1865 to 1873, the organization may be said to have slept soundly. No meetings were reported, and whatever was done was solely the work of individuals. In October, 1873, a meeting was held at Deer Lodge, under the provisions of the amendatory act of May 5, 1873. The Legislature, in the act approved May 7, 1873, authorized an annual payment of $150 to the society to be expended in the purchase of manuscripts and books relating to the Territory, and for postage, express charges and printing, on condition that a report dealing with such expenditures and the condition of the library be tendered annually to the Governor.

The session of October 25, 1873, witnessed the admission to active membership of Samuel T. Hauser, Charles S. Warren, Cornelius Hedges, William W. Alderson, Matthew Carroll, William E. Cullen and Charles Rumley. George Bancroft, John Lathrop Motley, Charles Francis Adams, Louis Agassiz, Joseph Henry and Francis Parkman were elected corresponding members. The admissions to honorary membership were James H. Mills, James Tufts, James F. Williams, Daniel S. Durrie, Charles Astor Bristed, James Parton, J. Carson Brevoort, John J. Astor, Addison Smith, John P. Bruce, John A. Creighton, Martin Maginnis, William H. Clagett, Hugh McQuaid, Frank H. Woody, Washington J. McCormick, George M. Pinney, George F. Cope, Robert E. Fisk, Peter Ronan, Ezekiel S. Wilkinson, Joseph Wright, Leander M. Black, John C. Kerley, Daniel W. Tilton, Joseph Magee, Charlotte O. Van Cleve, Alexander Culbertson, Addison M. Quivey, H. N. Maguire, Calcium C. Clawson, Harry J. Norton, Hamilton Fish, Robert Clarke, Francis Bret Harte, Bret Harte, J. C. Bancroft Davis, Silas H. Crounse, Warren R. Turk.

The constitution and by-laws of the society were adopted at this meeting, and under its provisions Charles S. Bagg was elected Vice-President; Cornelius Hedges, Recording Secretary; Samuel T. Hauser, Treasurer; and William E. Cullen, Librarian.

During the year 1873 the society had succeeded in collecting an extensive and valuable library. This was destroyed in the fire of January 9, 1874. To the credit of the Territory, it must be said that the Legislature was the first body to take cognizance of this great loss. The concurrent resolution approved February 10, 1874, provided, "That the sum of five hundred dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated to the Historical Society of Montana, out of any moneys in the Territorial treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the Territorial Auditor is hereby authorized to draw his warrant on the Treasurer therefor, and he may take such security for the faithful application thereof to the purpose for which said society was incorporated as in his judgment is proper to be given by said society." From this period the success which marks the history of this association dates. The library, which is now one of the leading historical collections west of the Alleghanies, began then to assume importance.

The annual meeting of 1875 was held at Helena, April 19, 20 and 21, 1875, when the following named officers were elected: President, Wilbur F. Sanders; Vice-President, Granville Stuart; Corresponding Secretary, William E. Cullen; Recording Secretary, Cornelius Hedges; Treasurer, Samuel T. Hauser; Librarian, Charles Rumley. The admissions to active membership at this meeting comprised Henry N. Blake, William A. Clark, Louis R. Maillet, Perry W. McAdow and Erasmus D. Leavitt. The honorary members elected on April 21 were:

Hon. Sidney Edgerton, Hon. Green Clay Smith, Hon. James M. Ashley, Hon. Benjamin F. Potts, Hon. Decius S. Wade, Hon. Hiram Knowles, Hon. Francis G. Servis, John V. Bogert, James M. Arnoux, Brev. Masonic History.—The history of Masonry in Montana is coeval with the discovery of her gold mines. According to the accepted statements of N. P. Langford, it was introduced shortly after the discovery of the Bannack Diggings, while yet Willard's was the only settlement in the northern part of Dakota Territory, now the southern portion of Montana. Mr. Langford says:

When the company, of which I was one, entered what is now Montana—then Dakota—a single settlement, known by the name of Grasshopper (now Bannack), was the only abode of the white man in the southern part of the Territory. Our journey from Minnesota, of fourteen hundred miles, by a route never before traveled, and with the slow conveyance of ox trains, was of long duration and tedious. It was a clear September twilight when we camped on the western side of the range of the Rocky mountains, where they are crossed by the Mullan road. The labors of the day over, three of our number, a brother named Charlton, another, whose name I have forgotten, and myself, the only three Master Masons in the company, impressed with the grandeur of the mountain scenery and the mild beauty of the evening, ascended the mountain to its summit, and there, in imitation of our ancient brethren, opened and closed an informal Lodge of Mas er Masons I had listened to the solemn ritual of Masonry an hundred times, but never when it impressed me so seriously as upon this occasion; such also was the experience of my companions. Our long journey, and its undeviating round of daily employments, had, until this occasion, been wholly unalleviated by any circumstance calculated to soften or mellow the feelings subjected to such discipline. We felt it a relief to know each other in the light of Masonry. Never was the fraternal clasp more cordial than when in the glory of that beautiful autumnal evening, we opened and closed the first Lodge ever assembled in Montana. It is pleasant, in refreshing these early memories, to recall the names of those whom we then knew by outward signs and met as brothers; prominent among whom were Walter B. Dance, Samuel T. Hauser, James Stuart, Neil Howie, Drury Underwood, James Dyke and others; Masons who, in the first terrible year of our history, were instant in every good word and work which had for its object the protection, improvement and purification of our little society. To the steady resistance to wrong of these early settlers of Bannack is Montana indebted for that condition of society which enabled the men of the succeeding year, Bros Wilbur F. Sanders, Paris S. Pfouts, Alexander Davis, John Fetherstun, J. X. Beidler, Wm. Berkin, Geo. Chrisman and others, all Masons, by uniting their efforts with those of the men who, the previous year, had preserved our little settlement from destruction, to finally rid our Territory of the murderers, thieves and robbers that then infested it. Previous to the occurrence of these events, indeed immediately after the funeral of Bro. Bell, measures were taken to effect the organization of a Lodge at Bannack. Application for a dispensation had been made in a proper form to the Grand Lodge of Nebraska, and in due time granted This instrument, now in my possession, declared the applicants to be a "Lodge of Master Masons," and appointed. "Bro. N. P. Langford, First Master; Bro. James Dyke, First Senior Warden; and Bro. John W. Morrison, First Junior Warden." It is issued under the hand of George Armstrong, M. W. Grand Master of Nebraska, and bears date April 27th, A. D. 1863, A. L. 5863. Before the dispensation was received, a large majority of the Masons of Bannack, attracted by the golden promises of other portions of the Territory, became scattered, and the Lodge never met under this authority. The papers I cheerfully surrender to the custody of the Grand Lodge, and ask for them, in the name of the early brethren of Bannack, careful preservation in its archives. While awaiting the receipt of this dispensation the Masons of Bannack cultivated that harmony and sociability which are the legitimate fruits of the Order, by holding frequent social meetings. In the midst of the terrors of that fearful period of crime these social gatherings inspired us with a feeling of security, which association in any other form never could have done. (Address October 8, 1867.)

The history of early Masonry in Montana is further treated in a paper contributed to the press of the territory in 1880, by Cornelius Hedges. He says:

There was certainly one, and I think two lodges that were completely organized prior to the formation of the Virginia City lodge. One of those, likely by dispensation, was for a lodge at Bannack, and the second for one at Nevada City, as I have often heard the circumstances related by Mark Moore, who was the W. M., and Robert Hereford, who was the secretary. The latter organization was fully completed, but the dispensation or charter was lost in the mail, and never reached its destination. When I reached the territory in July, 1864, there was a lodge fully organized in Virginia City with a charter from Kansas. Brother Pfouts was W. M. and J. J. Hall senior deacon. L. C. Lea was a member of committee. The lodge room was in a log building on the north side of Wallace street, over an auction store. In January, 1865, I came to Helena. The Last Chance mines were then attracting much attention for their richness, and the climate was so mild that season, there was scarcely a day's interruption of mining in Dry gulch, whence the dirt was hauled in wagons to be washed. The few masons who found one another soon began to hold occasional meetings, which ripened into an organization. We sent to Colorado for a dispensation, which was a long time in coming. I don't think we had the dispensation more than three months, during the first of which we could not do any work, before it was necessary to return it to Colorado if we would get a charter. We were urged to get a charter, although we had not conferred the three degrees, for we had not held the dispensation long enough. Through the representations of Brothers Frary and William Porter, who had both been W. M. in Colorado, we secured a charter. Our dispensation was issued to us July 10, 1865, which was returned with petition for charter October 25, 1865. On November 7, 1865, charters were granted by the Grand Lodge of Colorado to Montana and Helena lodges. The same year the brethren of Virginia City resolved to organize a grand lodge, and invited the Helena lodge to meet them at Virginia City January 24, 1866. The invitation was accepted, when Brothers Sealy, Mathew and myself visited the metropolis of the territory, where we were warmly received and sumptuously entertained. Brother Hull, W. M. of Virginia City lodge, was keeping a hotel and running a grand gambling hall, which did not comport at all with my ideas of masonic propriety. In session, there was a good deal more said of the person to be chosen as G. M. than on the formation of a grand lodge. It was a hot and stormy time from the moment we reached the hotel in Virginia City until we left one week later

In that little company from the three lodges there were Hull, Frary, Sanders, Langford, Boyce, Starr and myself who have since borne the honors of Grand Master, besides Brothers Duncan and Potter, who have so long and zealously served masonry in exalted positions. Dick Kennon was at that time secretary of the Virginia City lodge, and W. A. Clark, who has since been connected with a lodge in Helena and afterward in Deer Lodge, and has borne and passed the highest honors the jurisdiction of the craft had power to bestow, was then a member of the same lodge. In the heated strife on the part of Hull to be G. M., there was much time spent on the question whether Brothers Boyce, Connell and Langford, who had been Past Masters before coming to Montana, should be admitted to membership. Before the Committee on Credentials could report on this part of the subject, Frary's resolution transforming the convention into a Grand Lodge was carried. This occasioned the departure of Duncan, a member of the committee, for his Nevada home. Brothers Sealy, Connell and myself were appointed to induce the return of Duncan. There was such free expression of opinion on the evening of the first day, that if I had been as near my home as Brother Duncan was, I might have gone as he did. Next day we proceeded to Nevada City and returned with Duncan, when a copy of the laws of the Colorado Grand Lodge was adopted as the constitution of our Grand Lodge, and the question of admitting the Past Masters settled by giving them honorary membership. The election resulted as follows: Brother Hull had our majority for Grand Master; Frary was elected Deputy G. M.; Brother Sanders, Grand Secretary, and myself Senior Grand Warden. Brother Boyce acted as installing officer, and Brother Robertson, later Grand Master of Utah, as Grand Marshal. We were no sooner organized than we received a petition for a lodge at Nevada, which was granted the day following, and officers were installed the evening of same day. Several degrees were conferred on C. M. Davis by the Grand Master; Brother Dimsdale gave the address, and we closed in more harmony than we had met or acted in.

A convention of A. F. & A. M., of Montana, assembled at the Masonic Hall, in Virginia City, on the 24th day of January, Anno Domini 1866, and Anno Lucis 5866, at 12 o'clock at noon, when the following lodges, to-wit: Virginia City Lodge, No. 43, Montana Lodge, No. 9, Helena Lodge, No. 10, were found to be represented and present, as follows:

Virginia City Lodge, No. 43.—John J. Hull, W. M.; Wilbur F. Sanders, S. W.; L. Trapp, J. W.; and Brothers Samuel L. Wells, M. L. Strasburger, S. Star, Nat. J. Davis, F. C. Cornell and F. C. Deimling, Master Masons.

Montana Lodge, No. 9.—Leander W. Frary, W. M.; Luther C. Lee, S. W.; Hugh Duncan, J. W.; and Brothers Henry Metz and Samuel Word, Master Masons.

Helena Lodge, No. 10.—Cornelius Hedges, W. M.; R. P. Sealy, S. W.; C. W. Mather, J. W.; and Brothers H. M. Fee and John Potter, Master Masons.

The convention was called to order by Brother John J. Hull, W. M. of the Senior Lodge; Brothers W. F. Sanders and L. C. Lee were appointed secretaries. A committee on credentials, consisting of Brothers Duncan, Sealy and Trapp, was appointed, with power to make a report as to the members present who are ex-officio members of the Grand Lodge, and a recommendation as to the proper action to be taken on the subject of Past Masters. The committee made a partial report, and were given further time to consider the question of the admission of Past Masters. Brother Leander W. Frary offered for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the several Lodges of Ancient Masons in the territory of Montana, here represented, consider it as a matter of right and for the general benefit of Masonry that they ought to form a Grand Lodge within said territory, and do now proceed to form and organize themselves into a Grand Lodge accordingly, to be known and distinguished by the name of "The Grand Lodge of Montana."

The resolution was adopted and the convention stood adjourned, and the officers of the three lodges proceeded, in due form, to open a Grand Lodge. There were present Brothers Boice, Cornell, Langford, Word and Davis, and the following named temporary officers: Brother John J. Hull, Brother Leander W. Frary, Brother Cornelius Hedges, Brother C. W. Mather, Brother W. F. Sanders, Brother R. P. Sealy, Brother Lewis Trapp, Brother H. Duncan.

The officers appointed by the Most Worshipful Grand Master were: Hugh Duncan, F. C. Cornell, John Potter, T. J. Dimsdale, C. W. Mather, Lewis Trapp, O. P. Raymond, in the order of G. C., G. M., G. L., G. O., S. G. D., J. G. D., and G. T. respectively.

The following table shows at once the principal officers of the Grand Lodge, and the name, date of organization and statistics of each lodge within the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Montana in 1882–3.

The sketch of each lodge is given in the chapters devoted to local history; so also are sketches of the Commandery and Council organizations.

Independent Order of Odd Fellows.—The R. W. Grand Lodge of this society (I. O. O. F.) was organized July 16, 1874, at Helena, by Special Deputy G. S., D. H. Cuthbert, and representatives E. Frank, C. Hale, D. Vincent, J. A. Hyde, P. Lansing, J. L. Davis, C. E. Duer, L. E. Holmes, J. A. Bradley, and Arch. Graham, from the lodges known as Montana, No. 1; Cottonwood, No. 2; and Western Star, No. 4. The total number of members belonging to the Lodges of the Order existing January 1, 1874, was 165. The number added during the year was thirty-five, and the number withdrawn or deceased, thirty-one, leaving the aggregate membership in January, 1875, 169. The membership increased to 256 before January 1, 1876, receiving $4,958.55, and expending $604. During the year 1876 the society maintained its membership and sound financial condition. At the close of 1877 there were 277 enrolled members. The total amount received was $4,505.73, and the amount expended $681.28. In 1878 the number of contributing members was 327; amount received, $5,208.98, and amount expended, $844. During 1879, $6,116.53 was received, and $742.36 expended. The total receipts in 1880 amounted to $7,777.21, and the expenditures to $765. In 1881 the receipts summed up $7,408.81, and expenditures, $1,492.50. The number of contributing members was 458.

The officers of the Grand Lodge I. O. O. F. of Montana Territory, since its organization in 1874, are named in the following list:

M. W. G. M.	R. W. D. G.	R. W. G. W.	R. W. G. S.
D. H. Cuthbert, 1874,	Dr. L. E. Holmes,	J. A. Hyde,	Arch. Graham,

(1883 and 1884 vide local history.)

Zeno Hoyt was elected representative to the G. L. U. S., January 21, 1875. The last meeting of the Grand Lodge was held at Deer Lodge, August 22, 1883.

The lodges within the jurisdiction are named in the following list: No. 1, Montana; No. 2, Cottonwood; No. 3, Bannack; No. 4, Western Star; No. 5, Excelsior; No. 6, Covenant; No. 7, Virginia; No. 8, Fidelity; No. 9, Cable; No. 10, Samaritan; No. 11, Choteau; No. 12, Ridgley, Butte; No. 13, Custer, Miles City; No. 14, Gordon Valley, Stevensville. Virginia Lodge, No. 7, is now defunct.

Daughters of Rebecca: Naomi Lodge, No. 1, Helena; Miriam Lodge, No. 2, Butte.

In the local history full reference is made to each of these associations.

The Ancient Order of United Workmen.—This society was introduced into Montana in 1881. The Order is ancient only in the principles it seeks to foster—mutual aid and assistance to the honest workingman. Thirteen years ago it was organized at Meadville, Pa., and has increased in popular esteem so much within the last decade, that its membership now exceeds 100,000. It is distinctively an insurance society—each member who has taken the third degree is insured for the sum of $2,000, in case of death to be given to his family or friend whom he may name in his will. The Order in any state or territory may become a separate beneficiary jurisdiction. Up to this time the Montana lodges are within the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Nevada. According to the report of the Grand Secretary for the year expiring April 30, 1883, the membership of the Order in Montana was 570. The Secretary of Maiden Lodge, No. 18, writing in August 1883, placed the number at 1,970. In any case the advances made are very marked, and the organization of a Grand Lodge for Montana is an accomplished fact. Following are the names, numerical strength, and date of organization of all lodges in the Territory up to May 1, 1883:

NAME OF LODGE.	No.	LOCATION.	No. of Members.	NEW LODGES AND DATES.
Butte	1	Butte City	49	1881.

In the historical sketches of the counties, towns and villages of Montana reference is made to the several lodges of this order. The meeting of the Grand Lodge (Nevada jurisdiction) was held at Butte in May, 1885. The Grand Lodge officers for the ensuing year are: Past Grand Master Workman, W. M. Bullard, of Wickes; Grand Master Workman, James Sullivan, Helena; Grand Foreman, J. C. Harlowe, Carson, Nevada; Grand Overseer, J. L. Onderdonk, Boise, Idaho; Grand Recorder, David Thorburn, Ogden; Grand Receiver, J. Ross Clarke, Butte; Grand Guide, Robert Smith, Green River; Grand Watchman, S. H. Cave, Terrace; Supreme Representatives, J. W. Kinsley, Helenn, Montana; W. M. Bullard, Wickes, Montana; S. W. Chubbuck, Gold Hill, Nevada; Grand Trustee, W. D. Wagar, Reno, Nevada.

Knights of Pythias.—The present organization of the Knights of Pythias dates only as far back as February 19, 1864, and the Grand Lodge to April 8, of the same year. There are nine lodges; two divisions of the Uniform Rank and two sections of the Endowment Rank in Montana, each one of which is regarded in that part of the history referring to the town where the lodge is located. The Grand Lodge Knights of Pythias was instituted at Butte January 14, 1885. The following are the officers:

P. G. C.—W. L. Bretherton, Ivanhoe, No. 5; P. G. C.—T. H. Kleinschmidt, Myrtle, No. 2; P. C.—Lee Mantle, Damon, No. 1; G.V.C.—S. D. Bebee, Occident, No. 8; G. P.—E. J. Groeneveld, Valley, No. 6; G. M. of E.—J. E. Rickard, Oswego, No. 5; G. M. of A.—G. E. Baraby, Pythagoras, No. 2; G. I. G.—L. C. Dear, Crusader, No. 7; G. O. G.—J. E. Stevens, Crescent, No. 4. Supreme Representatives to be elected.

Independent Order of Good Templars.—The history of Good Templary in Montana, by Massena Bullard, G. W. S., was written in 1880. In his paper he says: The first Lodge in Montana was organized at Virginia City, March 23, 1868, by Thomas E. Bramhall, a Deputy to the R. W. G. Templar, and named Montana No. 1. For a period of more than twelve months, Mr. Bramhall and his wife, in the face of much opposition and amid many difficulties, devoted their entire time to the work of the order, and on the 19th day of April, 1869, had succeeded so well that they were prepared to and did organize the Grand Lodge of Montana, at Helena, having at that time ten Subordinate Lodges, with a membership of 337, composed of thirty-nine sisters and 298 brothers. The officers chosen and installed at the first session were as follows: G. W. C. T.—Robert Lawrence; G. Counselor—Charles W. Cook; G W. V. T.—Miss E. L. Earle; G. W. S.—Richard Lockey; G.W. T.—William Clancey; G. C.—George Comfort; G. M.—Adriel B. Davis; G. Mess.—George A. Douglas; G. G.—Mrs. A. S. Dailey; G. S.—George W. Wright; G. W. A. S.—Miss Emily E. Jeffrey; G. B. M.—Miss Lillie E. Gray.

Fifteen sessions of the Grand Lodge have been held, as follows: First, at Helena, April, 1869; second, at Helena, November, 1869; third, at Helena, November, 1870; fourth, at Bozeman, October, 1871; fifth, at Virginia City, October, 1872; sixth, at Boulder, November, 1873; seventh, at Helena, November, 1874; eighth, at Helena, November, 1875; ninth, at Helena, October, 1876; tenth, at Butte, October, 1877; eleventh, at Diamond City, October, 1878; twelfth, at Helena, October, 1879; thirteenth, at Butte, October, 1880; fourteenth, at Sheridan, October, 1881; fifteenth, at Boulder Valley, October, 1882. The sixteenth session was held at Wickes on the second Wednesday in October, 1883. The position of G. W. C. T. has been held by the following persons: Robert Lawrence, first and second terms; Adriel B. Davis, third and fourth terms; William W. Alderson, fifth term; Richard Lockey, sixth term; T. C. Iliff, seventh term; Massena Bullard, eighth term; William H. Sutherlin, ninth term; Clark Wright, tenth term; Timothy E. Collins, eleventh term; Geo. A. Douglas, twelfth and thirteenth terms; Thomas T. Taylor, fourteenth term; Joseph Trudgian, incumbent in 1883. Richard Lockey was elected Secretary at the first and eighth sessions, Hanson H. Barnes at the second session, and during the remainder of the time the position has been held by Massena Bullard.

There have been organized in Montana sixty-seven Subordinate Lodges, and over seven thousand persons have been admitted to membership. Many Lodges organized in mining camps and at military posts have been compelled to surrender their charters on account of the changes of population, and many hundred members have, for the same reason, ceased to retain active connection with the organization. At present there are in this Territory fourteen Subordinate Lodges, with a membership, as shown by the returns of 1883, of 825. The membership by counties is as follows: Lewis and Clarke, 122; Silver Bow, 169; Jefferson, 197; Madison, 150; Custer, 48; Gallatin, 8; Meagher, 37; Deer Lodge, 10; Beaverhead, 10; Missoula, 61. The total revenues of the Grand Lodge from its organization to its fifteen session amounted to $10,324.59, and its expenditures during the same period were $9,348.18, leaving a cash balance of $976.41. The Lodges of the I. O. G. T., founded during the year ending March 25, 1869, comprised 337 members, of which number 39 were females.

The report of P. G. W. C. T. and G. W. S. Massena Bullard, made to the Grand Lodge, October 11, 1882, showed a total membership of 790, made up of 510 male members and 280 female members. The number of halls owned by the thirteen lodges represented in the Grand Lodge was five, valued at $12,000, and other property valued at $1,500, together with the valuation of property belonging to the Grand Lodge, the estimated value of which was $1,225. In the history of the several counties a sketch of each lodge is given. The following named Grand Lodge officers were installed by Joseph Trudgian, P. G. W. C. T., of Eureka lodge No. 13, for 1885. G. W. C. T., Wm. Hamilton, of Butte City lodge No. 14. G. W. Counselor, Mrs. Lizzie D. Wickes, of Eureka lodge No. 13. G. W. V. T., Miss Mary E. Trudgian, of Eureka lodge No. 13. G. W. S., Massena Bullard, of Helena lodge No. 2. G. W. A. S., Miss Della Braford, of Helena lodge No. 2. G. Treas., Peter B. Mills, of Boulder Star lodge No. 3, G. S. J. T., Miss Hanna Shawl, of Butte City lodge No. 14. G. Chap., William E. Archibald of Rescue lodge No. 15. G. M., Miles L. Tuttle of Fish Creek lodge No. 5. G. D. M., Mrs. Mary E. Ragan of Butte City lodge No. 14. G.W. I. G., Miss Grace Porter of Butte City lodge No. 14. G. W. O. G. Thomas Loughridge of Unity lodge No. 6. P. G. W. C. T., Vining A. Cook of Boulder Star lodge No. 3. Representative to R. W. G. lodge, M. J. Hall of Diamond lodge No. 1. Alternate representative, George C. Stull of Butte City lodge No. 14.

The Territorial Union W. C. T. U.—The first temperance convention held in Montana convened in Butte, July 31 and August 1, 1883. A fair representation of leading temperance workers was present, and the occasion was one full of hopefulness and inspiration to all friends of the cause. On the evening of July 31 a large audience gathered in Mountain View M. E. church to welcome the lecturer, Miss Frances E. Willard, to the city of Butte. An interesting address from Mayor Whitford, who was unable to be present, was read by W. Egbert Smith, and addresses were also delivered by John F. Forbis, Dr. Thompson, and others, to which Miss Willard responded, when the audience was dismissed with the benediction. On the morning of August 1, the convention met in the Presbyterian Church, where most encouraging reports were heard from various parts of the Territory and a Territorial and local W. C. T. U. were organized. Following are the officers of the Territorial Union: President, Mrs. R. T. Clark, of Helena; Vice-President of First Judicial District, Mrs. James Kirkpatrick, of Dillon; Vice-President Second Judicial District, Mrs. L. W. Foster, of Butte; Vice-President Third Judicial District, Miss Alice Nichols, of White Sulphur Springs; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. A. H. Priest, of Helena; Recording Secretary, Mrs. W. E. Smith, of Butte; Assistant Recording Secretary, Mrs. L. J. Shannon, of Missoula; Treasurer, Mrs. L. C. Brown, of Helena. At the annual meeting of 1884, the following named officers were elected: President and Superintendent of department, Mrs. Mrs. G. B. Morse, Bozeman. To Influence the Press, Mrs. R. H. Howey, Helena. Juvenile and Young Women's Work, Miss Alice Nichols, White Sulphur Springs. Scientific and Literary Work, Miss Chynoweth, Bozeman. Foreign Work, Mrs. L. L. Wood, Helena. Vice-Presidents, Mrs. E. M. Morris, Livingston; Mrs. Kirkpatrick, Dillon; Mrs. M. J. Hall, White Sulphur Springs. Corresponding and Recording Secretary, Mrs. Davis Wilson, Bozeman.

The Territorial Teachers' Association, etc., etc., was organized at Helena in 1882. The first regular annual meeting of the society was held at Deer Lodge, August 30 and 31, 1883, when Professor R. H. Howey, of Helena, and Professor J. H. Meyers, of Deer Lodge, were elected President and Vice-President respectively. The officers for 1885–6 are: President, Professor S. G. Murray, of Helena; Vice-President, Miss Mary R. Layton, of Butte; Recording Secretary, A. C. Newill, of Butte; Corresponding Secretary, Miss Gertie Barker, of Butte; Treasurer, Professor A. E. Logan, of Miles City; Executive Committee, Professors S. G. Murray, Helena; Professor J. K. Davis, Butte; Miss M. M. Williams, Helena; and Professor J. Gannon, Dillon. The Ancient Order of Foresters, the Ancient Order of Hibernians, Printers' Union, Miners' Union, Robert Emmett Society, Knights of Honor, and Knights of Labor, are strong organizations (vide county histories).

Society of Montana Pioneers.—In July, 1884, a call was published by J. R. Wilson, of Dillon, and signed by many old citizens, requesting the pioneers to meet for the purpose of organizing a society. The first and last paragraphs read as follows: "All pioneer citizens of Montana who were residents within its limits at the date of the creation of the Territory—May 26, 1864—are cordially invited to attend a meeting to be held at the Court House, in the city of Helena, the capital of the territory, on Wednesday, September 10, 1884, at 10 A.M. (the day being during fair week), for the purpose of organizing a Pioneers' Association or Society of Pioneers. This society will not be organized in any hostility to or as a rival of the Historical Society, but in its scope and purpose it will radically differ from that corporation. While it is probable that membership will be permitted to those reaching Montana at a more recent date than the 26th of May, 1864, it has been thought best to confine the present call to those who were here at the time Montana was created a territory by act of Congress." * * * "Pioneers included in this call, and those who desire to sign the same and attend the meeting hereby called, are respectfully requested to send their names to Mr. Charles Rumley, at Helena. In addition it has been suggested that pioneers prepare papers relating their early experiences to be read at the coming meeting. Beaverhead County Pioneers—Jos. A. Browne, Gus. F. Graeter, George M. Brown, Con. Bray, James Harby, Wilson Wadams, Adam Fink, John Sutherland, E. Smith Ball, G. W. Emerick, James Mansfield, Phil. Lovell, Henry S. Pond, David Courtois, John C. Innis, Andrew Barber, A. H. Odell, Wm. Roe, H. Brundage, John R. Wilson. Lewis and Clarke county—Wm. Chumasero, Wilbur F. Sanders, Daniel H. Weston, Sidney Edgerton, Jr., J. X. Beidler, Jamuel Schwab, A. M. Holter, Sam. T. On September 10, 1884, a large meeting of pioneers was held at Helena, with Samuel Hauser presiding. James Fergus, of Meagher county, was nominated by him for temporary chairman and elected. Dr. Mussigbrodt, of Deer Lodge county, and W. W. DeLacey, of Lewis and Clarke, were elected vice-presidents; John Potter, of Gallatin, secretary; and Geo. W. Irvine, II., of Silver Bow, assistant secretary. Colonel Sanders, being called for, stated briefly the objects for which the meeting was called; the principal ones being to get together the pioneers of Montana for mutual association, and to collect and put in shape the early history of Montana. Upon motion, a committee on constitution and by-laws was appointed, consisting of Fergus, DeLacey, Mussigbrodt, Potter, Sanders, Pemberton, Chumasero, Johnston, Toole and Joseph Brown. This committee reported, a constitution and by-laws were adopted, and following named permanent officers elected: James Fergus, president; W. W. DeLacey, Granville Stuart, Joseph A. Browne, James M. Arnoux, Thomas H. Irvine, John Potter, H. H. Mood, Conrad Kohrs, P. W. McAdow, Enoch H. Wilson, Caleb E. Irvine, C. P. Higgins, vice-presidents; W. F. Sanders, corresponding secretary; George W. Irvine, recording secretary; Samuel T. Hauser, treasurer.

At this first meeting H. H. Mood was appointed to investigate the condition of Wm. Fairweather's grave, while $200 were subscribed in a few minutes to pay off a debt due for the monument erected over Dr. J. S. Glick's grave.

Committee on Credentials.

Granville Stuart was elected president, B. F. Potts, vice-president; R. B. Harrison, secretary; J. P. Woolman, treasurer. The executive committee was made up of one member from each county, while the delegation to the National Convention was similarly made up.

In April, 1885, the following officers of the new organization of the Montana stock growers were elected at the convention at Miles City: President—Colonel T. J. Bryan;

T. H. Kleinschmidt

First Vice-President—Governor B. F. Potts; Second Vice-president—Captain William Harmon; Secretary and Treasurer—R. B. Harrison. Colonel T. J. Bryan, who has been president of the Eastern Montana Association since its start, and who is the head of one of the largest cattle firms in the territory, was elected president of the new organization.

Miscellaneous Organizations.—The divisions of the A. O. H., the Catholic Knights of America are treated locally, as these societies are working under charters granted by grand divisions outside Montana. There are several organizations, both civil and military, in the territory, each, however, with a limited membership. Such societies are referred to in the history of the counties.

CHAPTER XIII.

NAVIGATION OF THE MISSOURI AND YELLOWSTONE.

FROM earliest times in the history of the West, the head waters of the Missouri formed the objective point of explorers. Verendrye was the first to whom the credit of discovering the upper river is due. To Lewis and Clarke we owe its exploration, and to them, in a measure, may be credited the honor of opening up to commerce the combined navigable stretches of the Missouri, Yellowstone, Mississippi, Ohio and tributary rivers, giving to the Union over 16,000 miles of navigable waters, and indeed, proving that a continuous navigable river between the Gulf of Mexico and the northern Pacific ocean was a possibility.

The following table of distances, taken from the journal of Lewis and Clarke's expedition, giving the number of miles from the mouth of the Missouri to certain remarkable places, is received as correct, as it was eighty years ago, and presents an evidence of the exactness of the surveys then taken truly remarkable.

	Miles.
To Fort Mandan, above Bismarck	1,600
To Rochejaune, or Yellowstone river	1,880
To Milk river	2,090
To Muscleshell river	2,270
To Judith's river	2,439½
To Marias river	2 521
To Portage river, five miles below the Great Falls	2,575
To mouth of Medicine (now Sun) river	2,593
To Rocky mountains, to a gap on the ridge which divides the waters of the Missouri from those of the Columbia, passing the north part of a mountain and crossing Dearborn's river (Lewis and Clarke's Pass)	2,643
To Three Forks of the Missouri	3,096
To Fort Clatsop, winter quarters of Lewis and Clarke, 1805–6, near the Pacific ocean	3,555

Like Lessep's Panama canal, this great idea of the explorers will take years to reduce to practice. The work of improving the Missouri below the falls and the Yellowstone was begun under Captain Edward McGuire, United States Engineer, in 1877, and is now continued under Captain James B. Quinn, United States Engineer.

From the earliest period in the history of the St. Louis fur-traders, the river was navigated by cordelles, the last of which were in use up to 1864. The commerce of the region in 1805–12 was limited to the products of the chase. Lewis and Clarke, in their report, state that "the products which are drawn from the Missouri are obtained from the Indians and hunters in exchange for merchandise. They may be classed according to the subjoined list: Castor, otters, foxes, Ponha foxes, tiger-cats, raccoons, black bears, gray and yellow bears, puces, buffalos, dressed cow-hides, shorn deer skins, deer skins with hair, tallow and fat, bear's oil, musk rats and martins. Those products brought to the Indians and hunters the sum of $77,971 per year; but of that amount about $61,250 were only returned annually to the district in peltries, cloths and provisions. The voyageur and trader were the principal characters in the Western life of those times, and to them the rivers of the northwest were well known.

"Up to 1830," says Major Walker, "the American Fur Company still clung to their keel boats, and dragged them by human labor from St. Louis to the mouth of the Yellowstone, when Pierre Choteau and the other members of the company determined to try a steamboat on the Upper Missouri, and for this purpose resolved to build a new boat suitable to the dangers of the navigation. The boat was built at Pittsburg, and in the spring of 1831 left that port for St. Louis. She was christened the Yellowstone, possessed timbers of unusual size, and withal so solid and staunch, that she set very low in the water, drawing three feet light and five feet loaded, seriously unfitting her to glide over the numerous shoals in her destined path. She was a side-wheel boat, with the cabin on the same deck with the boiler, and her single engine propelled the wheels by a single shaft, necessitating the unshipping of one wheel when in making abrupt turns it was desired to revolve only the other. She was commanded by Captain Bennett, and Mr. Choteau was so interested in the success of the experiment that he accompanied her in the first voyage. The Yellowstone succeeded in reaching Fort Pierre, in 1831, but an insufficiency of water prevented her further progress, and she returned to St. Louis. In 1832 the boat made a second voyage, Mr. Choteau again accompanying her, and this time succeeded in reaching Fort Union, at the mouth of the Yellowstone, with the annual supplies for that post. This boat was a decided triumph, and the company immediately took steps to construct another boat of larger size, with such modifications as were suggested by the experience gained in the two voyages of the Yellowstone. This boat, too, was built at Pittsburg, and was called the Assinaboine, but her cabin was upon the upper deck. The Assinaboine made her first trip in 1883, ascending to Fort Union and returning safely to St. Louis. On board, as a passenger, was the celebrated Catlin, who subsequently distinguished himself by his works upon the Indians and his collection of aboriginal curiosities. In 1834 the Assinaboine returned to Fort Union, repeating the trip in 1835. In the latter year, after discharging her cargo at Fort Union, she made an experimental trip still higher up the river, attaining the mouth of Poplar Creek. Here she was caught by the falling water and compelled to pass the winter. A fort was built for the double purpose of protecting the vessel and trading with the Indians, and the next spring she returned to Fort Union. Receiving her cargo of peltries she continued her downward voyage, but in the vicinity of Hart River, not far from the present town of Bismarck, she was destroyed by fire, with the loss of her entire cargo. The origin of the fire could not be ascertained, but it was believed to be incendiarism. The American Fur Company subsequently owned a considerable number of steamboats, and every year saw one or more ascend to the mouth of the Yellowstone. Several attempts were made to push still higher up the river, but with indifferent success, as only the El Paso succeeded in passing the mouth of Milk River, and this only a few miles. Keelboats, therefore, continued in use upon the Missouri, above Fort Union, and upon the Yellowstone. But in 1859 a more determined effort was made. The Chippewa had been built by the company with especial reference to the difficulties to be surmounted above the Yellowstone, being of light draft and of a model well suited to buffet the swift current of the upper river. The boat had a stern wheel, being the first of that description ever employed upon the Upper Missouri. She was commanded by Captain John Labarge, one of the best steamboat men that ever navigated the Missouri, and Mr. Charles P. Choteau accompanied her as his father had the Yellowstone.

The Chippewa left St. Louis in the spring of 1859. The Spread Eagle accompanied her to Fort Union, where, under the orders of Mr. Choteau, she was to remain until the return of the Chippewa, which continued her voyage up the river. When she reached and passed the point above the mouth of Milk River attained by the El Paso, and passed on through waters never before stemmed by a steamer, a shout went up from all on board, the cannons were fired, and a scene of general rejoicing ensued. It was considered doubtful whether the Chippewa would be able to pass the shallows above the mouth of the Judith, and a large mackinaw ninety feet long was towed behind to lighten her by unloading the freight destined for Fort Benton. This was done just above the mouth of the Judith, the Chippewa passed on, and on the 17th day of June arrived at the site of Fort McKenzie (Brule), a few miles below Fort Benton. Here the venturesome voyage ended, and, rejoiced at having achieved so decided a triumph, Mr. Choteau turned the prow of the Chippewa toward St. Louis. Upon his arrival at Fort Union he found that the Spread Eagle had disobeyed instructions and sailed down the river. Her captain had become alarmed at the rapid falling of the water, and left a few days after the departure of the Chippewa on her upward trip. The following year the Chippewa ascended to Benton, with the Key West, and in 1860 the first steamboat reached the head of Missouri navigation, July 2.

The Steamboat Arrivals at Fort Benton and Vicinity.—The arrivals since 1859 are recorded in the following list, compiled from the Historical Society of Montana: 1859—Chippewa (Fort Brule), July 17. 1860—Chippewa, Key West, July 2. 1861—Chippewa, bound for Benton, burnt in Disaster Bend. The owners, the American Fur Company, were smuggling alcohol through to Benton, for Indian trade, and one of the deck hands, in the act of stealing a drink, took a candle and gimlet and proceeded into the hull of the boat, and in drawing the alcohol it ignited, and the boat caught fire. She was loaded with Indian annuity goods, and also goods for the American Fur Company. There were about twenty-five kegs of powder on board. When the fire reached the powder, the boat blew up. Packages of merchandise were found three miles from the disaster.

1862—Emilie and Shreveport, June 17; Key West No. 2 and Spread Eagle, June 20.

1863—Shreveport (Cow Island), June 20, and Alone (mouth of Milk river).

1864—Benton, June 10; Yellowstone (Cow Island), June 21; Effie Deans (mouth Marias), July 9; Cutter, July 14. The Benton arrived at Benton, Montana, on June 27, with a trip from the mouth of Milk river, belonging to some other boat. She also brought another trip from same place to the mouth of the Marias, on July 9. From this time the cordelle became a thing of the past.

1865—Yellowstone and Deer Lodge, May; Deer Lodge, two trips; Effie Deans (mouth Marias), St. John's (mouth Marias), Twilight (mouth Marias), in June, and Deer Lodge (Dauphine's rapids), July 21.

1866—St. John's, Deer Lodge, Cora, Waverly, W. J. Lewis, all in May; Mollie Dozier, Marcella, Ontario, Big Horn, Walter B. Dance, Iron City, Amelia Poe, Peter Balen, Miner, Only Chance, Tacony, Favorite, Gold Finch, Luella, Helena, Tom Stevens, David Watts, Lillie Martin, Agnes, all in June; Sunset, Huntsville, Luella (second trip from Fort Union), Nellie Rogers, Marion (wrecked on return trip), Deer Lodge (second trip from St. Louis), Gallatin, all in July.

1867—Waverly and Miner, in May; Only Chance, Deer Lodge, Walter B. Dance, Gallatin, Amelia Poe, Mountaineer, St. Johns, Yorktown, Nile, Ben Jonson, Huntsville, Ida Stockdale, Octavia Guidon, Benton, Ida Stockdale, Amaranth, all in June; G. A. Thompson, Antelope, Abeona, Agnes, Tacony, Jennie Brown, Luella, Big Horn, Tom Stevens, Lady Grace, Lillie, Little Rock, Ida Fulton, Nymph No. 2, Viola Belle, Richmond, all in July; Only Chance, in August; Zephyr, Imperial (Cow island), Huntsville (Cow island), and a boat, name unknown, arrived in September, making a list of forty boats for the season.

1868—Success, Cora, Deer Lodge, Nile, Miner, Only Chance, Sallie, St. Luke, Henry Adkins, Mountaineer, Octavia, Ida Stockdale, Peninah, all in May; Antelope, Huntsville, Bertha, Lacon, Guidon, Benton, Yorktown, Importer, Ida Reese, Andrew Ackley, North Alabama, Fanny Barker, Hiram Woods, Viola Belle, Columbia, Urilda, all in June; Deer Lodge, Tom Stevens, Silver Lake No. 4, Andrew Ackley, Lena Leoti, all in July; Success, in August; Andrew Ackley brought some boat's freight from Dauphine's rapids in the month of August. She left Benton, for St. Louis, August 27.

In the latter part of July, 1868, while the steamer Tom Stevens was lying at the landing at Fort Benton, Captain Burke, its chief officer, ambitious of the distinction of navigating the Missouri to a higher point than any predecessor, made up a pleasure party and headed his vessel for the Great Falls. The necessity for great caution in these hitherto untried waters, and the determined resistance of the rapid current fresh from its plunge over a series of declivities aggregating more than 350 feet in sixteen miles, made the voyage a very slow one, and it was not until ten o'clock the following morning that the portage was attained, a point probably six miles below the main cataract, and some fifty from Fort Benton. The boat having safely moored at this point, the pleasure-seekers on board proceeded by land to the main falls, whose roar was plainly heard at that distance in consequence of a favorable wind. All returned to pass the night on board the steamboat, which the next morning dropped down the river, making a speedy and safe return to Fort Benton.

1869—Deer Lodge, Importer, Nile, Ida Reese No. 2, Cora, all in May; Fanny Barker, North Alabama, Silver Bow, Peninah, Andrew Ackley, Only Chance, Big Horn, Viola Belle, Sallie, Mountaineer, Huntsville, H. M. Shreve, Miner, Lacon, Utah, Silver Lake No. 4, Peter Balen, Colossal, Bertha, all in June.

The boats which made double trips from Dauphine's rapids to Benton in 1869 were: Cora, Silver Bar, North Alabama (a part of Mountaineer's trip), Big Horn, North Alabama (with balance on Shreve's trip), Only Chance, Fanny Barker, Viola Belle, Peninah, Andrew Ackley, Huntsville, Big Horn, Miner, Peninah, Only Chance, Silver Lake, Peter Balen, all in June, and the Andrew Ackley, July 2.

1870—Nick Wall, Ida Reese No. 2, in May; Deer Lodge, Viola Belle, Sallie, Bertha, Peninah, Ida Stockdale, in June.

1871—Ida Reese No. 2, Ida Stockdale, Far West, in May; Nellie Peck, Peninah, Flirt, all in June; The Miner, Silver Lake, Andrew Ackley, and Nellie Peck, all came to Cow island; the Flirt came to Fort Peck.

1872—Nellie Peck, Far West, in May; E. H. Durfee, Esperanza, Fontenelle, Sioux City, Western, Mary McDonald, Far West (quickest trip on record from Sioux City—seventeen days, twenty hours—Martin Coulson, master), Nellie Peck, Katie P. Kountz, all in June; Sioux City, in July, and the Sioux City, August 7, from Buford, with trip of Esperanza.

1873—Far West, Nellie Peck, in May; Josephine, E. H. Durfee, De Smet, in June; Katie P. Kountz and Western, in July.

1874—Fontenelle, Western and Nellie Peck arrived in May; Josephine, Key West and Josephine arrived in June.

In 1875 the Josephine was engaged in the exploration of the Yellowstone, and was the only boat on that river in 1883 of all the boats engaged in 1872. The Fontenelle was in the Yellowstone service in 1877.

Missouri Freights.—The Benton Record of November 10 has the following statement of the quantity, quality and value of the freights transported up and down the upper Missouri during the year 1867.

Exports.—Ore and bullion, 1,225 tons; average value per ton, $750; total value, $918,750. Wool, 208,459 pounds; value, $72,960.75. Buffalo robes, 50,512; value, $202,048. Antelope, dear and elk skins, 67,530 pounds; value, $12,335.40. Bear skins, 61 skins; value, $305. Wolf skins, 2,034 skins; value, $7,051.45. Beaver skins, 6,703 pounds; value, $6,703. Hides, 15,267 hides; value, $45,801. Mixed furs, value, $2,510. Sheep skins, 1,482 skins; value, $592.80. Cattle, 112 head; value, $2,240. Fort Macleod shipments, 595 tons; value, $303,600. Cypress shipments, 350 tons; value, $180,000.

Imports.—Montana freight, 4,648 tons; average value per ton, $300; total value, $1,394,400. Canadian contract freight, 1,025 tons; value, $310,000.

Miscellaneous.—Number of steamer passengers landed at Benton, 960; at Cow Island, 98. Average rate of freight, from Bismarck to Benton, 1½ cents per pound; from Bismarck, via Cow Island to Benton, 4½ cents per pound; average rate from Cow Island, 2 cents. Increase of commerce since 1870, fifty per cent. The imports and exports for 1878 via the Missouri river, as given by the Benton Record, were as follows: Exports, 1,832¼ tons; value, $651,587. Imports, 10,180, tons; value, $2,535,000. The values of imports are estimated at Eastern prices to which should be added at least twenty-five per cent for Montana prices, and from forty to sixty dollars per ton for transportation.

The boats engaged in the Missouri trade in 1878, with the number of trips to Fort Benton, are given as follows: Big Horn, 4 trips; Rosebud, 4; Josephine, 4; Helena, 6; Benton, 5; Red Cloud, 3; Key West, 2; Nellie Peck, 3; J. M. Chambers, 1; Far West, 1; Gen. Terry, 3; Western, 2; E. H. Durfee, 1; Fontenelle, 2; Yellowstone, 1; Eclipse, 1; Col. Macleod, 3. Number vessels, 17; number of trips, 46; first boat of the season, the Big Horn, arriving at Benton April 29; last one, the Col. Macleod, arriving September 23, 1878.

The fluctuations in river freights during the past three years have been great. In 1879 the importations by river amounted to 56,000,000 pounds. In 1880 they fell to 10,000,000 pounds. In 1881 the river freights up the Missouri and Yellowstone again swelled to 43,000,000 pounds, notwithstanding the near approach of railroads; but in 1882 the river trade again declined, the total importations by river being 27,481,141 pounds, or less by over 15,000,000 pounds than they were in 1881. The principal cause of this decline is the diminution in the quantity of freights up the Yellowstone. In 1881 the freights that came by the Yellowstone river amounted to 8,420,000 pounds. In 1882 they only amounted to 1,390,000 pounds—a decline of over 7,000,000 pounds. This is largely due to the fact that the Yellowstone river was tapped by the Northern Pacific, thus shutting off the river trade. There has also been a falling off in government freights by river. In 1881 the government freight up the Missouri and Yellowstone amounted to 7,200,000 pounds, while in 1882 it only amounted to 5,100,000 pounds, a decrease of 2,100,000 pounds. This added to the decline in the Yellowstone freights leaves only a decrease of 5 000,000 and 6,000,000 of pounds in private freights up the Missouri river during the year 1882. The private freights to Benton amounted to 27,560,000 pounds, while in 1882, they were only reported at 22,376,141, a decrease of 5,179,000 pounds during the year, as shown in the following table:

Boats.	Private Freight, Pounds.	Government Freight, Pounds.	Total Pounds.
Benton Line	7,244,441	3,605,000	10,849,441
Coulson Line	7,605,616	100,000	7,705,616
Baker Line	3,911,624	.....	3,911,624
Peck Line	2,239,020	.....	2,239,020
Yellowstone Line	1,390,540	.....	1,390,540
U. S. Steamer Sherman	.....	1,400,000	1,400,000
Grand totals	22,376,141	5,100.000	27,481,141

The Benton line had the government contract, of course, which accounts for the large preponderance of that class of freight. The steamer Sherman, since sold at St. Louis, was owned by the government and operated under the direction of Capt. E. B. Kirk, assistant quartermaster U. S. A. The season of 1882 saw a fleet of twenty-two steamers ready for the Missouri and Yellowstone river traffic, the latter scarcely counting, so slight was it as compared with the aggregate. The Eclipse was the first boat of the season to pull out for up river, which she did April 10, a number following in the days immediately succeeding. The closing of navigation is usually from the 1st to the 15th of November, and this year the Butte arrived from above and went into winter quarters November 10, the last until 1883. During the season there were eighty-six departures and eighty five arrivals from and at Bismarck, and only two trips all told were made on the Yellowstone. At Fort Benton, the head of navigation, and more than 1,800 miles above Bismarck, there were forty arrivals during the season—an unusual number and fully attesting the excellent effect of the government work. The Benton boats, too, notwithstanding the generally low water, were able to take much heavier freights than usual, and this ability, as may easily be imagined, is an important factor in transportation covering so long and tortuous a course. Only one boat came to grief, but this was the Red Cloud, one of the largest and handsomest, which struck a submerged stump near Bouche's grave, about sixty miles from Fort Peck, and sunk almost instantly. The boat was a total loss. A large part of the cargo was saved. The total value of the twenty-two boats was $493,000, and the aggregate tonnage 8,400, custom house measurement. The exports from Benton were:

Products.	Amounts.	Value.
Wool, pounds	920,000	$225,000
Cattle	1,000	40,000
Bullion	129,490	63,000
Beef hides	7,600	34,000
Buffalo hides	28,000	112,000
Bales skins	1,250	31,000
Bales robes	3,000	24,000
Merchandise	44,681	993

The valuations of the freight were: Private freight, $2,600,000; Government freight, $510,000, giving a total of $3,110,000.

It is impossible to figure accurately the amount of freightage paid on the above amount, but it is over $250,000 on private freight alone. The passenger traffic was more or less hurt by the railway, but a good many people traveled by river. The books show: Passengers up stream, 1,750; passengers down stream, 750; troops transported, 1,200; total number of passengers, 3,700. This, of course, does not include way passengers, who would probably swell the total to more than 5,000.

So early as 1865, the Legislature, in their act approved February 7, granted a charter to the Upper Missouri River Steamboat Navigation Company, composed of N. W. Burris, G. W. Stapleton, John D. Ritchie, A. V. Brookie, F. Moore, B. S. Peabody, Richard F. Lawless. This company was granted the exclusive right of improving the river between the Great Falls and the Three Forks, and also the sole right of navigation between these points. The enterprise which the merchants of Helena have recently organized and that is of the most vital interest, is the Montana Steam Navigation Company, for the improvement of, and the putting a line of steamboats on the Missouri, above the Falls of the Missouri to Helena. This company has been chartered, organized with regularly elected officers, its capital stock of $100,000 subscribed by men in the aggregate worth millions, and $13,000 of it paid in, and on deposit to-day in the First National Bank.

The improvements on the upper Missouri have been of great benefit. Notably among the improvements are the dams at Two Calf Island, 1,000 feet in length, and at Grand Island, 300 feet; Gallatin Rapids have been so far cleared of bowlders that boats drawing nearly four feet can easily pass over in low water.

The tragedy of the Great Falls occurred in 1875, when John Mangles and H. Zerbert were carried over them. They built a boat to descend the river to Omaha. After launching it at a point opposite Helena they were caught in a storm near the falls and ran upon a rock, which held the boat. Zerbert left the boat, endeavoring to reach shore, but was unable. Mangles, who followed him, was swept overboard. Zerbert returned, and decided his only hope was to go over the precipice, which he did by lashing himself to his boat with a rope. He wandered about for three days watching for his friend Mangles, who never was heard from. Zerbert returned to Helena.

The Little Phil, the first steamer to navigate the waters of the Missouri above the falls, was safely moored at Stubb's Ferry, opposite Helena, September, 1883. The trip from Townsend, where the boat was launched, was made leisurely, stopping en route at Edmonson's Ferry, Canon Ferry, and other points where people along the river, in considerable crowds, gathered to greet the pioneer steamboat on her trial run from below the Three Forks to the home port above the Gate of the Mountains. On this historic voyage the Little Phil was officered by Commodore Wm. F. Wheeler, an experienced navigator of the Monongahela; G. A. Knowlton, C. E., late of the Northern Pacific construction corps, who acted as pilot, and A. R. Knowlton, mechanical engineer, who took charge of the machinery.

Navigation of the Yellowstone.—In the year 1869 the steamers Alone, Captain R. B. Bailey, and Cutler, Captain Abe Hutchinson, went to a point forty-five miles from the mouth of the river to cross General Sully's command at the place now known as Crane's ranch. The next trip was by the steamer Key West, which started from Sioux City April 14 to ascertain if the river were navigable. The object of this trip was to see if the military expedition that was to escort the North Pacific surveyors could be supplied by boat at the mouth of the Powder river. The boat was under the command of General J. W. Forsythe, of General Sheridan's staff. Dan Scott, of the Sioux City Journal, was the correspondent of the trip. The boat reached the Yellowstone on May 6, made a successful trip to Powder river, and demonstrated that the Yellowstone is navigable for 245 miles. In June the steamers Peninah, Key West and Far West loaded at Bismarck with supplies for the troops who had started at Fort Rice, across the country, under the command of General Stanley. The boats carried all the stores up, and the Key West (Captain Marsh) remained to transfer the command across the river, and then returned out of the river. The next boat was the steamer Josephine, which went up in September to re-cross the command, returning to Buford on the 17th of September with nine companies of troops and twenty-eight officers.

The Bozeman, of the Pease expedition, was sunk near Hunter's Hot Springs, June 18, 1875.

There was no boat on the river in 1874. In June, 1875, General Sheridan ordered General Forsythe to take the steamer Josephine and make a complete exploration of the stream. The boat left Bismarck June 15, and made a very successful trip to a point now known as Huntley, forty-five miles from the mouth, where George W. Smith and Will Hagy, of Sioux City, had a large store. The results of that trip were that the expedition under General Terry, in 1876, was sent against the hostile Sioux, as it was found that the troops could be supplied at the mouth of the Big Horn by steamboat. If it had not been for that trip the Northern Pacific railroad would probably have failed to extend across the Missouri by this time, as the expedition under Custer would not have been made. The disaster to Custer was the cause of the country being occupied by troops. The boats used in 1872 to supply the expedition were the Far West, Tiger, Benton, Silver Lake, Carroll, Yellowstone, Durfee and Josephine, of which the last named is the only boat still on the river.

In 1877, the year that Forts Custer and Keogh were built, there were a large number of boats in the river. The following is a complete list: Far West, Western, Tiger, Yellowstone, Peninah, General Meade, General Sherman, Florence Meyer, Osceola—the last lost by being blown to pieces in a storm at the mouth of the Powder river—Savannah, Kendell, Weaver, Victoria, Arkansas, Fanchon, J. G. Fletcher, Tidal Wave, Silver City, J. H. Rankin—sunk at the mouth of O'Fallon creek—Rosebud, Big Horn, Fontannelle, General Custer and Josephine. Of these boats the Meade, Rosebud, Big Horn and Josephine are the only ones now in use.

In 1877 the Rosebud, Butte, Helena, Eclipse, General Sherman, Batchelor, Big Horn, General Custer, Yellowstone, General Rucker, General Terry, General Tompkins, Peninah

and General Meade ran up the river. Major Pease, Zed Daniels and Paul McCormick had the idea that a trading post established near the mouth of the Big Horn would attract nearly all of the Crow trade, and that the rovers of the upper river, whose trapping grounds were nearly cleaned out, would make this their headquarters; so they organized an expedition and built three flat boats. These they loaded with supplies, and on the 17th of June, 1875, with twenty-two men, besides themselves, they commenced their voyage down the river. Eight horses, owned by some members of the party, were taken down overland by three men, who camped with the boat party at some designated place every night. The boat captains were named Nelson Weaver, John Peck and Jimmy Crane. The last named ran his boat into a drift pile when opposite the old agency and was swamped; everything was wet, but nothing of value lost. Just above Stillwater the boat commanded by Peck ran into a snag and was upset. Twenty sacks of flour and other provisions, the Big Horn gun, eight rifles and several thousand rounds of ammunition, a barrel of whisky and half a barrel of brandy, Major Pease's trunk and the clothing and personal property of its occupants washed out. The Big Horn gun and most of the rifles and ammunition were found by diving, and some of the clothing and all of the flour but three sacks were picked up during the next day's trip. (Topping.)

McCormick with three others went afoot up the river to Bozeman. At Benson's Landing he made two boats and loading them with goods again went down the river. With him were George Herendeen, John Williamson and another man. Herendeen, after parting with Major Pease at Buford, had gone up the Missouri river by steamer to Carrol and thence overland to Bozeman. McCormick left one of the boats and most of his goods at Baker's battle ground in charge of Herendeen, and, with the other boat and the remainder of the goods, he, accompanied by Williamson, went on to Fort Pease and next day started again up the river for another load of goods.

In November, 1875, E. S. Topping built a mackinaw at Botteler's, on the upper river, and with a load of specimens from the National Park, started down the river on his way to the Centennial. David Kennedy, an ex-soldier from Fort Ellis, accompanied him on the trip. A day's run brought them to Benson's Landing, and finding there Jack McKenzie and Billy Smith preparing to take a stock of goods down the river, they awaited there till the third day, when the fleet of four boats started down together.

McKenzie's boats were not well handled and were turned over several times on the trip. At least half of his merchandise was lost and nearly all of the remainder was carried in the large boat. When near Fort Pease the weather turned cold and Topping, seeing that the river was going to freeze up, concluded to stop near the fort for the winter and wolf, so just above the mouth of the Big Horn he left some provisions, ammunition and bedding and ran the boat down to Pease. Here Kennedy and Williamson, who had joined at Baker's battle ground, walked back and packed their things about three miles up the Big Horn, and built there a small log house, then went to hunting and putting out wolf baits. (Topping.)

A yacht called the Speckled Trout was built and owned by Captain P. C. Sovereign. She sailed for 400 miles above Keogh, cost about $1,000, carried a cargo of 5,000, and six passengers. The cargo was partly owned by Omar Hoskins, who owned a ranch at Huntly, or Baker's Battle Ground.

In 1879, the Western, Batchelor, Terry, Benton, Rosebud, Big Horn, Helena, General Rucker and the Yellowstone were in the river. The Yellowstone sunk in Buffalo rapids this year.

In 1880, the Rosebud, Big Horn, Nellie Peck, General Terry, Batchelor, Butte, Helena, Western and Josephine, made the river alive with their smoke.

In 1881, the Batchelor, Josephine, Rosebud, Big Horn, Helena, and Black Hills and Eclipse, were in the river.

In 1882, the Eclipse made one trip, the General Terry one trip, and the Batchelor four short trips in connection with the railroad work.

In June, 1874, Frank Williams and E. S. Topping, furnished with a whip saw, canvas and rigging, went up the Yellowstone to its lake. There they sawed out sufficient lumber and built a row boat and a yacht, which they rigged in sloop form. They launched the latter on the 20th of July. On the trial trip the two ran the boat into a flock of geese which were moulting and could not fly, and secured enough to make feather beds and pillows.

They had advertised that the first lady to come up should have the privilege of naming the yacht. Two parties from Bozeman, each having a lady with them, came in at nearly the same time. These ladies, Mrs. Tracy and Mrs. Graham, were each named Sarah, and they compromised by naming the yacht Sallie, and took a cruise in commemoration of the event.

Yellowstone Transportation Company was organized at Bozeman in 1875 to secure boats and navigate the Yellowstone River. The success of this company seemed very slow, until taken hold of by Messrs. Lamme and Nelson Story, two of Bozeman's wealthy men. They asked nothing but the hearty co-operation of all; they also had a boat built at Evansville, Indiana, for the Yellowstone. The history of this enterprise is referred to on other pages. In addition to the exports for 1878 via the Yellowstone river, given in the history of the Missouri, there were nearly 100 tons of furs valued at over $8,000. The imports were as follows: 300 tons to Bozeman, 300 tons of private freight to Fort Custer, 700 tons of private freight to Miles City, and 12,000 tons of Government freight to Forts Custer and Keogh. Nine steamboats made fifteen trips up the Yellowstone in 1878 as far up as Sherman, and some of them higher up the river to Terry's Landing, one to Camp Bertie, near Pompey's Pillar, and others up the Big Horn river to Fort Custer. The number of steamboat arrivals at Miles City, not including down river boats, in 1878, was fifty-four. Up to the period when the Northern Pacific entered the Yellowstone Valley the navigation of the Yellowstone was an important factor in the economy of Montana.

The improvements of the Yellowstone, under the direction of Capt. James B. Quinn, U. S. Engineer, were confined to the vicinity of Glendive, M. T., and consisted in building dams to close chutes and confine the water to the main channel. The resulting source has caused a material deepening of the channel on the hitherto difficult shoals. It is alleged that a similar work below Glendive would give a short river haul to Fort Buford instead of three hundred miles up the stream.

Captain Labarge, who died at Bismarck, May 1, 1885, at the age of 70 years, had been over fifty years a steamboatman on the lower Mississippi, Ohio and Missouri. He was in the Government service during the war, and before that was in the service of the fur companies and plains traders, for whom he made many of the earliest voyages on the Missouri river. Except his elder brother, Capt. Joseph La Barge, now on the Josephine, the Government Engineer's boat—he was the first actual river sailor to take a boat to Fort Benton. It is remembered, as a coincidence, that his friend and mate, Capt. Andy Johnson, died similarly last season when he was about to start with the Helena for Benton, and La Barge took his place in the pilot house. Capt. La Barge's friends say he spoke of the trip to Benton the day before his death with an expression of a feeling that something serious was about to happen to him. It is recalled by them that in the burning of a boat in which he was pilot, a few years ago, he lost a diary in which he had kept a record of all his voyages on the Missouri, and from which he had thought he might furnish material for an interesting work on the settlement of the Missouri valley and the Indian wars of the Northwest.

CHAPTER XIV.

RAILROADS OF MONTANA.

THE Utah and Northern Railroad.—This was the first railroad which connected Montana with the outside world and abolished forever the old-time stage over the trail to Salt Lake. In the early settlement of Montana it was a five months' trip for freight teams to reach that land of gold, from the starting points at the river towns in Missouri and Nebraska. When the Pacific railways were completed, Corinne, Utah, became the point for stage lines and freight teams to start for Montana, a distance of 500 miles. Even this trip was a tedious one, but that northern country was then so near railway communication that the Territory received new life and has ever since prospered. In 1878 one hundred miles of track were laid. In 1879 thirty miles were almost completed, and the same year one hundred and twenty-three miles of roadway were built. In 1879–80 thirty-seven miles of roadway were added, and on the morning of March 9, 1880, a special train of three cars left Beaver Canon loaded with visitors to participate in the ceremony of driving the first spike in Montana on the Utah & Northern railway. The exercises commenced with songs, led by Dr. Dodge, in which all joined. The telegraph wire was attached to the spikes and hammer, so that all connecting offices would hear the strokes of the hammer. Bottles of champagne were then opened by Miss Rilla Ling, and the success of the enterprise was drank with enthusiasm. The speeches were opened by Captain E. T. Hulaniski, general agent at the terminus, giving a history of the building of the railroad. A speech was then made by L. J. Fisk, Assistant Superintendent of construction; Washington Dunn, Superintendent of Construction. Messages of greeting were received from connecting offices in Montana. The first silver spike was driven by Captain Hulaniski amid the cheers of the people. The second spike was driven by all the little children, each striking it a blow, which closed the ceremonies. The wire was cut and telegraphic arrangements made by Mr. Holt, operator of the Western Union Telegraph Company.

With the construction of the Utah & Northern a new impetus was given, and to-day much of the growth and prosperity of Montana is the result of such excellent communication by rail with the outside world. This railway starts at Ogden, Utah, and has its northern terminus at Deer Lodge, Montana, 550 miles distant. Leaving Ogden it runs at the base of the Wasatch range, with Salt Lake on the west, until Bear river is reached, then the road climbs Hampton hill, a spur of the Wasatch, and descends into the garden spot of Utah, the beautiful Cache valley. The views along the route from Ogden take in bold mountains, precipices and peaks, the Bear River bay of the Great Inland sea, the lake itself with islands, and the Promontory range, while Bear and Malad rivers are traced in silvery lines through their broad valleys. The various towns of Menden, Logan, Smithfield, Franklin and others are located in Cache valley, which with the beauties of the valley itself, inclosed by high ranges, make this a pleasant route. Having passed the southern boundary of Idaho at Franklin, the route lies over table lands and through valleys. The Portneuf canon, through which the road passes, is full of interest in a scenic point, while as hunting and fishing ground it offers attractions; also to the student of nature its singular formation is of much interest. At Pocatella, 156 miles north of Ogden, the crossing of the Oregon short line is reached, the latter road running both east and west. The road in going north passes through a portion of the Fort Hall Indian reservation, thence into the valley of Snake river, nearing that stream at the town of Blackfoot, Idaho, which besides being an eating station, is the point from which start the Challis & Bonanza and Wood River stage lines, and all the freighting to those places. The road crosses Snake river at Eagle rock, noted for its island in the river, the rapids, its beds of Lava, and for the extensive railway shops. Leaving Snake river the route lies across lava plains for many miles, giving the traveler an opportunity of seeing some of its wonders, and then it begins to climb the Rocky Mountain range. Beaver canon is passed through in this ascent. This canon is eight miles long, and is one of much beauty. The summit and Montana are reached at one and the same time, the name of the station being formed of the three first letters of Montana and Idaho, giving the singular word Monida.

After entering Montana the scenery partakes of all the majesty of the mountain region. Perhaps in no other place in the world, except the Yellowstone itself, are the views so grand. At Silver Bow junction a branch line seven miles runs to Butte, the Silver Queen of Montana, while the main line continues down the Deer Lodge valley to the town of that name, and yet it has been extended on northward to the mouth of Little Blackfoot, where it strikes the line of the Northern Pacific. We know of no pleasanter route to travel than to take passage in one of the cosy sleepers at Ogden and glide over this route through northern Utah, across Idaho and a portion of Montana. The road is well ballasted, finely equipped and well officered. All the modern improvements are used for safety, convenience and comfort. W. Doddridge is superintendent of the road, having headquarters in Ogden. This is one of, if not the longest of narrow gauge roads in the country, and enjoys a very large patronage both in the passenger and freight departments. Forty-three heavy engines are employed all the time, and these are taxed almost to their full capacity to do the business required. It is a good route to Montana, while it has enough fine scenery bordering it to entertain the tourist.

In the winter of 1882–3 the engineers of the Utah Northern Narrow-Gauge branch of the Union Pacific railroad surveyed the Gallatin extension of the National Park branch through Bozeman, where the company acquired large coal interests, to Gallatin City, near the headwaters of the Missouri. It is understood that the Park branch will be built and eventually extended to Fort Benton, the head of navigation of the Missouri, and to a connection with the Canadian Pacific. Meantime the Northern Pacific Company is making inquiries as to the feasibility of a line from Helena to Benton with a view to heading off the Utah Northern connection with the Canadian Pacific.

Northern Pacific Railroad.—Although the Northern Pacific Railroad was the first projected across the continent, it has proved the last to be completed in the United States. In 1835, almost 50 years ago, the newspapers of the country discussed a proposition to build a railway from New York city to the mouth of the Columbia River. While the papers presented an advanced theory, they confidently expressed the belief that, although the task then seemed to be herculean in its nature, it would eventually be accomplished. Many of the papers that then took part in the discussion have survived the storm and blasts that crowd upon the newspaper world, and chronicled the completion of the great railway which they then advocated.

Ten years after the question was first presented by the newspapers of the country, in 1845, Asa Whitney, a merchant of New York, submitted a proposition to Congress for the construction of a railroad from the head of Lake Michigan to the mouth of the Columbia river on the Pacific coast. His plan embraced a provision for a grant of land sixty miles in width—thirty miles on either side of the line—for the whole length of the road. After the maturity of his plan, it was embodied in a bill which was presented to Congress, where it hung for many years, and in 1847 came very near passing. Whitney traversed the country from Maine to Louisiana in support of the bill, addressing public meetings at various points, for the purpose of creating public opinion in its favor, and legislative bodies, in order to have them pass resolutions recommending Congress to take favorable action in reference to his bill. In his efforts to accomplish his purpose he expended his entire fortune and was forced to retire from the scene, acknowledging for the time being, that his project was a failure. For his propositions and his advocacy of them, Mr. Whitney is entitled to be recognized as the father of the enterprise, which is now an accomplished fact, after a period of nearly forty years under the title of the Northern Pacific Railroad. In 1853, 1854 and 1855, an expedition of officers and men under the leadership of Isaac I. Stevens, Governor of Washington Territory, who was commissioned by the United States Government, made an exploration of the country lying between the forty-seventh and forty-ninth parallels of latitude, to determine the practicability of a route for a railroad from the great lakes and the Upper Mississippi to the waters of Puget's sound. The scope of the exploration included, among other data, the characteristics of the intermediate regions, then very indefinitely known, or wholly unknown, as to their adaptability to agricultural pursuits, their water supplies, their mineral timber and other resources, and their conditions in general for the maintenance of a civilized and progressive population. The official report of the expedition confirmed the truly national character of such an enterprise as the Northern Pacific, brought prominently into view its advantages in respect to distances as a route of travel and commerce—its greater proximity to Asia, its shorter distance between great water lines, its greater proximity to Europe, and the fact that it was much the shortest and most direct route between Asia and Europe. It also established the fact that by the Northern route were the easiest gradients, the least and fewest engineering difficulties, and that there existed an abundance of wood, water and materials of construction. With respect to the general resources of the countries to be traversed by the proposed line, for the support of a compact population, the elaborate reports of the expedition presented the strongest confirmatory proofs. Except at the crossings of the mountain ranges the entire route was found to pass through a succession of fine arable lands—countries extraordinarily well watered by large rivers, many important confluents and numerous tributary streams—and covered with a vegetation which plainly indicated the richly productive capacity of their soils. The climate was shown to be universally superior in the qualities which assure healthful and pleasant living, generally favorable for the production of crops, and often more propitious than elsewhere found for the growth of wheat, oats, rye, barley and the vegetables. In 1862, when the Union and Central Pacific Railway Companies were chartered, a very strong effort was made to obtain a charter for the Northern Pacific line. For the time being it failed, but it was again revived in 1864, at the time the Union and Central Pacific Companies were asking Congress for legislation subordinating the Government to the first mortgages of the two lines. Supported by the well-ascertained facts embraced in the report of Governor Stevens and his corps of engineers, the enthusiastic friends of the Northern route again confidently sought the aid and encouragement of the Government, and, by act of Congress, approved July 2, 1864, a large body of corporators became a body corporate and politic, under the style of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, with power to build a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the line of the forty-fifth parallel.

The man who succeeded in getting the charter was Josiah Perham, who had organized a company, under the sanction of the Legislature of Maine, called the People's Pacific Railroad Company, and had attempted, in 1862, to obtain the Union Pacific charter for his corporation. Failing in this, he turned his attention to the Northern route, and, by promising to ask for no subsidy in bonds or money from the Government, he obtained, in 1864, a charter coupled with a land grant just double in area that given to the Union and Central Pacific Companies. The Northern Pacific grant embraces the alternate sections of land for twenty miles on each side of the road in the states and for forty miles in the territories, with an additional ten miles on each side as an indemnity limit, within which lands may be selected to compensate for those taken by settlers inside of the original grant. Perham had been a merchant in Maine, and also in Boston, and was principally known for his success in organizing railroad excursion parties; in fact he was the inventor of the cheap excursion system. He tried in vain for nearly two years to obtain capital for the Northern Pacific Company, of which he had been elected president. The obstacle in the way, besides the tendency in the public mind to regard the northern belt of states and territories as a semi-Arctic region, was chiefly a clause which Perham himself had inserted in the charter, and which prohibited the company from mortgaging its road or land grants, or issuing bonds. Perham's idea was that $100,000,000 of the stock of the company would at once be taken by popular subscriptions.

The first set of directors was elected December 6, 1864, and on the following day organized by the election of Josiah Perham, president. Mr. Perham and his associates were not men of practical experience. They proposed to raise $100,000,000 by the subscription of a million individuals, whom they believed could be found willing to take one share of stock each at par, and thus build the road. The scheme, of course, failed, and in December, 1865, Mr. Perham turned over the franchise to a syndicate of eastern capitalists for barely enough to pay his debts, and did not live to see the first spadeful of earth turned in the prosecution of the enterprise for which he had obtained from Congress a grant of land greater in extent than many of the kingdoms of Europe. He died at Boston in 1868.

The next set of directors, headed by J. Gregory Smith as president, memorialized Congress to the effect that the land grant, being mainly located remote from the then settled portions of the country, and little known to the public, had, with the many other favorable provisions of the charter, proved insufficient to induce capitalists to embark in the enterprise, more particularly so because other roads to the Pacific were able to offer not only their land-grant security, but also the bonds of the United States. The memorialists solicited similar aid for the Northern Pacific in Government bonds. Congress finally failed to adopt legislation authorizing aid in Government issues, and in May, 1869, and in January, 1870, the Northern Pacific Company, then controlled and directed by a combination of the best railroad experience and general ability and wealth in this country, made a contract with Jay Cooke & Co., then become eminent in finance by their success in negotiating the war bonds of the Government, to act as the fiscal agents of the Northern Pacific.

Jay Cooke obtained legislation in Washington authorizing the issue of bonds and changing the main line of the road, so that it should run down the Columbia River to Portland, and thence north to Puget Sound, instead of across the tremendous barrier of the Cascade Mountains. Cooke first proposed to place the Northern Pacific loan in Europe, but his plans to this end were defeated by the breaking out of the Franco-German war.

He then put the bonds upon the American market, using the same means to popularize them which he had successfully employed in selling the great war loans of the United States government. In two years' time, beginning in the spring of 1870, he sold about $30,000,000 of bonds. In 1870, with the means supplied by him, the company began to build its line, commencing work at Thompson Junction, twenty-three miles west of Duluth. Jay Cooke was then building a line from St. Paul to Duluth, and the Northern Pacific bought a half interest in the twenty-three miles from its junction to Duluth. Duluth was an obscure hamlet in the forest, inhabited by perhaps a hundred people. It had no harbor, but a good one was obtained by cutting a canal across a long, narrow sand-bank inclosing the Bay of Superior. Construction was also begun, in the same year, on the extreme western division of the road, running from the Columbia river at Kalamo, northward to Puget Sound. In 1871 the road was finished across Minnesota to the Red River of the North, and in 1872–3 it was built as far as the Missouri river, where a town was laid out and named Bismarck. On the Pacific side 105 miles of road between the Columbia river and Puget Sound were completed by the fall of 1873, and a terminal city laid out in a dense fir forest on the sound, and named Tacoma. During the same period there were completed and put in operation 555 miles of road—viz.: The Minnesota division, from Thompson Junction to Fargo, 230 miles; the Dakota division from Fargo to Bismarck, 195 miles; of the Pacific division 105 miles, from Kalama to Tacoma; also jointly with the St. Paul and Duluth railroad, the line from Thompson to Duluth, 25 miles.

In September, 1873, the house of Jay Cooke & Co. suspended—a memorable event, which precipitated a general financial revulsion, a sudden and enormous contraction of prices and values, which had obtained in the period of extravagance and inflation engendered by the war debt and the paper issues of the government. The failure of Jay Cooke & Co. involved the speedy bankruptcy of the Northern Pacific.

Two years were required to complete the readjustment of the company's affairs. The foreclosure of its mortgage was initiated by the trustees, with the concurrence of parties in interest, April 16, 1875, and a receiver appointed by the court. Later, during the same year, the entire property was sold under decree of foreclosure, and purchased by a committee of the bondholders. The reorganization was perfected, and a new board of directors elected September 29, 1875. The directory was organized by the election of Charles B. Wright, president; George Stark, vice-president; Samuel Wilkeson, Secretary, and by the choice also of treasurer and general counsel. In May, 1879, Mr. Wright, for reasons of health, resigned the presidency of the Northern Pacific, which he had held for more than three years, and was succeeded by Frederick Billings. During the incumbency of Mr. Wright in the office of president the general financial condition of the country and the difficulties opposed to extension into Montana by continued Indian hostilities, had long rendered the recommencing of construction across the continent impracticable. Important renewals, improvements and betterments in road-bed, track and equipment of the operated line had, however, been made. Also a branch line had been built sixty-four miles, from Brainerd to a connection with the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis at Sauk Rapids, and thirty-one miles had been added from Tacoma to Wilkeson, on the Pacific coast.

In 1879 the company had so far recovered its credit that it was able to borrow money to resume construction operations on a large scale. It began to build from the Missouri river westward and from the Columbia river, in eastern Washington Territory, near the junction of the Snake river, northeastwardly toward Lake Pend d'Oreille, in northern Idaho. The company did not feel strong enough to put forth any financial scheme for completing the entire road, but only asked for money enough to build two divisions, which it mortgaged separately, with the land grants attached to them. In 1880, after Mr. Billings had succeeded to the presidency, negotiations were completed with a syndicate of bankers, including the New York houses of Winslow, Lanier & Co., Drexel, Morgan & Co., and August Belmont & Co., and the London house of J. S. Morgan & Co., by which a loan of $40,000,000 was placed during that and the two following years, and money thus secured for completing the road across Montana and filling the gap in the track, which then amounted to over 800 miles.

In 1881 a very important change took place in the management of the Northern Pacific's affairs. Henry Villard, a German by birth, who came to this country at the age of eighteen, and who won considerable reputation as a newspaper correspondent during and after the civil war, and who had become interested in railroad management in Kansas and Oregon as the representative of large financial interests, had gradually obtained control, during the six years following the panic of 1873, of the transportation lines by rail, river and sea in the State of Oregon. These lines he had consolidated and greatly extended, so that they represented what, for a new country, was a remarkably efficient transportation system. In 1880 Mr. Villard determined, if possible, to secure a harmony of interests and control between his Oregon lines and the Northern Pacific line, so as to make the former the western extensions and feeders of the latter. In 1881 he organized what was known as the "blind pool" in New York, and obtained within a few weeks from subscriptions over $8,000,000 of money, without disclosing the use which he meant to make of this large sum, and without giving any other security than his personal receipts. With this money and other means of his own he quietly purchased a controlling interest in the stock of the Northern Pacific Company and was elected its president in September of that year, placing his friend and former associate in railroad management in Kansas and Oregon, Thomas F. Oakes, in the vice-presidency as the chief executive officer of the company. Construction operations went on rapidly during the years 1880, 1881 and 1882 from both ends of the line, and at the beginning of the year 1883 the track remaining to be constructed was reduced to about 300 miles, on which the grading had been mainly done. The Missouri division was completed in the spring of 1882, 217 miles to Glendive, its western terminus, and was at once accepted by the government. There are two great tunnels on the line; one at the Bozeman pass, in the Belt mountains, and the other at the Mullan pass, in the main division of the Rocky mountains. The former is 3,600 feet long, and the latter 3,850 feet. There are two great bridges on the Northern Pacific: The Bismarck bridge, across the Missouri, at Bismarck, Dakota, which is placed so high above the river as to require no draw, and fairly ranks among the great railroad bridges of the world; and the Ainsworth bridge, across the Snake river, at Ainsworth, Washington Territory. Both of these bridges are built upon stone piers, with superstructures of iron and steel. The Yellowstone river is crossed three times, the Upper Missouri once, and the Clarke's fork of the Columbia three times, by Howe truss bridges. Other interesting features of construction are the two long pile bridges across the arms of Lake Pend d'Oreille, each about a mile in length; and the great Marent Gulch trestle in the Coriacan defile, which has a height of 226 feet. This trestle is 866 feet long, 226 feet ten inches high at the center piers and contains 800,000 feet of lumber. On June 20, 1883, N. P. R. R. engine No. 452, weighing fifty-five tons, crept up this structure, and stopped in the center. The trestle was a success, scarce a creaking sound was heard, and an engineer calculated the deflection at the center of the trusses only half an inch. The engineers pronounced the structure as solid as any on the continent. On August 7, 1883, the first Northern Pacific train to cross the main range of the Rocky mountains passed over the overhead line. It consisted of a locomotive with five loaded cars. They made the trip with ease, showing the overhead line to be perfectly practicable and a thorough success. This is the highest point on the Northern Pacific between St. Paul and Portland, the altitude being about 6,000 feet. The first passenger car of the Northern Pacific to cross the main range of the Rocky mountains, came into Keene station, on the Little Blackfoot, on August 16, 1883. The headings of the Mullan tunnel met at seven A. M., August 8, 1883. The engineers who surveyed the Mullan tunnel and directed its line from both the east and west ends discovered since the meeting of the hole through the main range that the lines from the opposite directions came together within two inches, that the grades met within three-quarters of an inch, and the length within half a foot. This is certainly a grand engineering feat, and demonstrates the perfection of modern engineering. The engineering work of the tunnel was for over a year under the exclusive direction of F. C. Tucker, resident engineer, and Robert J. Walker and E. G. Bailey, assistant engineers. The work, however, was begun by I. C. Chesbrough, nearly five years ago, but the long and difficult tunneling through 3,850 feet of the great mountain was a task herculean in its proportions and a monument of scientific engineering creditable and honorable to the genius and skill of Chief Engineer J. T. Dodge, and his assistants Tucker, Walker and Bailey, and the Muir brothers, who were the contractors.

The Bozeman Pass Tunnel is another great undertaking. This tunnel completed is 3,650 feet long. Work on the east end was carried through solid rock. Steam drills were in use day and night under the direction of E. H. Beckler, engineer in charge. Messrs. Muir and Turner were contractor and superintendent respectively. The golden spike was driven on the afternoon of September 8, 1883, at a point between Garrison and Gold creek by Henry Villard. Three hundred men with brawny arms quickly laid the iron and drove the spikes on the 1,000 feet of uncompleted track, except the last spike. During the progress of the work, which was witnessed by the foreigners with amazement, the band played and the people shouted. When nearly completed a cannon salute was fired by the detachment of the Fifth Infantry present. The last rail was attached to a Western Union wire running into the branch office at No. 8 Broad street, New York, and when President Villard was driving the golden spike the blows of his silver sledgehammer were repeated in that city on the telegraph instrument. The general officers of the road gathered around the instrument listening to the strokes that told of the completion of the great national highway. The last spike was finally driven home by H. C. Davis, assistant general passenger agent of the road, who drove the first spike on the opening of the road, and this spike was the same one first driven by him. The end was reached as the sun was setting behind the mountains. Representatives of the American people from the Atlantic to the Pacific met there that day. The presence of a large number of foreigners, guests of the railroad company, loaned a little additional interest to the proceedings.

The mileage of the main line and branches of the Northern Pacific system, in operation in 1883–4, is as follows:

MAIN LINE DIVISION.

	Miles.
Minnesota Division, Duluth to Fargo	252½
Wisconsin Division, Northern Pacific Junction to Superior	23½
St. Paul Division, St. Paul to Brainerd	136
Dakota Division, Fargo to Mandan	199½
Missouri division, Mandan to Glendive	216
Yellowstone division, Glendive to Billings	225
Montana division, Billings to Helena	239
Rocky Mountain division, Helena to Heron	274
Pend d'Oreille division, Heron to Wallula	269½
Pacific division, Portland to Tacoma	145

The distance from Portland, Oregon, to New York, all rail, is 3,283 miles. The Yellowstone Park branch is only one of the hundred feeders of this great trunk line of railroad which the future will bring into existence. General Brisbin, in his letter of September 15, 1883, voices the desire for the spread of railroads. He says:

"A railroad can be run into the park by easy grades from the Northern Pacific branch up Tom Miner creek to near the Mammoth Hot Springs; thence to Norris Geyser Basin; thence to Gardner; thence to Fire Hole river and the Upper Geyser. Another branch will pass to the falls and lake and connect with the Utah Northern by way of Henry Lake and Red Rock. I have been all over these routes, and see no difficulty in building a road on them."

The circular of October, 1883, explained the action of the directors relating to the execution of a second mortgage for $20,000,000. This document was signed by Henry Villard, by order of the directors, in session October 6, and is a valuable addition to the history of the road. The circular says:

Your board consider it their duty to submit the following explanation relative to the objects of the meeting: In the fiscal year report of 1882-3 you were duly advised of the existence of a deficiency, arising from the excess of the cost of construction and equipment of the main line over the available resources, and amounting June 30, 1883, to $7,986,507. You were further informed that to avoid embarrassment to the company from the pressure of a large floating debt, an arrangement had been entered into with the Oregon and Transcontinental company, under which that corporation made the necessary advances in open account. It was agreed that this company should secure these advances temporarily by the issue of such obligations as could be created under the restrictions of the plan of reorganization. This assistance has proved of incalculable value, as, besides assuring the speedy completion of the road, it has saved this company during the construction from constant embarrassments that a large floating debt would inevitably have entailed. The deficiency at the close of the past fiscal year was increased by further requirements for construction and equipment purposes between July 1 and October 1 by the sum of $1,473,412, so that at the latter date it amounted to $9,459,920. Ever since it became evident that the main line could not be completed and equipped from the proceeds of the sale of the first mortgage bonds, your board has been fully impressed with the necessity of dealing with the deficiency at the earliest possible moment, but no measures of relief could be determined upon and proposed to you until the actual cost of the main line over the available resources could be ascertained with accuracy, which was not practicable until the construction work had reached its later stages. It is, indeed, only now that we are prepared to make a definite statement in this respect. There will be required, in addition to the deficiency of $9,459,920 October 1, the sum of $5,500,000 for the following purposes: For accruing construction, estimates and vouchers, $1,060,000; for meeting future estimates of the chief engineer for the completion of the main line, including machine shops, station houses, water tanks, coal bunkers, etc., $1,267,000; bridge over Snake river at Ainsworth, 20,000; for present work on bridge over Willamette river, at Portland, Oregon, $35,000; additional motive power, $746,000; additional rolling stock, $1,266,000; miscellaneous, $506,000; total, $5,500,000. This amount will provide funds to finish the construction and equipment of the road, except $750,000, which will be gradually needed in the course of the two years subsequent to March 1 next, for the completion of the bridge over the Willamette, and can be readily met out of the current income, or out of the reserve bonds hereinafter mentioned. We have thus a total, exclusive of the cost of the Willamette bridge, of $14,959,920 in excess of requirements over the proceeds of the general first mortgage bonds. It is due to you that you be told plainly so that you shall understand clearly the causes that combine to produce this deficiency. In the first place, the cost of the Yellowstone, Clark's Fork, and Pend d'Oreille divisions was greater by $5,500,000 than the engineer's original estimates. The loose material encountered, instead of solid rock, in the Bozeman and Mullan tunnels largely increased the cost of these works over these estimates, besides necessitating the construction of temporary overhead lines at an expense of $140,000. The cost of the Bismarck, Snake river and Willamette bridges will be more than expected, owing to the extra cost of foundations, approaches, etc. Then, again, the development of traffic was such that fully forty per cent more motive power and equipment was required than estimated. Last, and not least, the Minnesota, Dakota and Missouri divisions of the main lines were in such conditions, and the requirements of business so large, that in order to render their safe and economical operation practicable, the total expenditure in the past three years of $3,804,501 for renewal of track and superstructure erections of shops at Brainard and elsewhere, and other betterments, was indispensable. The cost of erection of the office building at St. Paul is also included in these expenditures. We do not hesitate to say that it is as good a road as has ever been built for money west of the Mississippi river. It has been examined by a number of eminent American and foreign experts since the opening to through traffic, and their united testimony is to this effect, and it is so thorough in character of construction that the excess of the actual cost over the estimates must be largely ascribed. But, on the other hand, the road will hereafter be operated so much more cheaply and efficiently in consequence of the thorough manner in which it has been built, that the stockholders will find that they have had a full equivalent in the enhanced expenditure. After due consideration of the situation of the company in all its bearings, your board has concluded to request your consent to the creation of a second mortgage as security for the issue of $20,000,000 six per cent gold bonds. The new mortgage to be on all property of this company, except lands east of the Missouri river, which were reserved by the plan of reorganization for the benefit of preferred stock, subject only to the priority of the present general mortgage, and it will be similar in terms and conditions to the general mortgage and subject only to its liens. Your board is pleased to say that it has received the proposition from a syndicate, represented by Drexel, Morgan & Co., Winslow, Lanier & Co., and August Belmont & Co., to take $15,000,000 of these second mortgage bonds at the price of 87½ cash, less 5 per cent commission in bonds, with six months' options, and to take $3,000,000 more on the same terms. Considering the proposition a favorable one, we accepted it, subject to the authorization of the mortgage by you at the special meeting to be held November 20. The sale of $18,000,000 second mortgage bonds at the stated price, will enable the company to meet all its existing liabilities and provide for its coming construction and equipment requirements and leave a reserve of $1,100,000 bonds in the treasury. Your board regrets the necessity of the creation of a new lien upon your property, but the stockholders should remember that every dollar of additional capital put into the road adds to its value and earning capacity, and permits of its more economic operation. The earnings of the road during the five weeks it has been operated as a through line, from September 8, have fully met our expectations, being $1,511,600, excluding construction and company freight, and we feel sure that they will continue to do so. All competent judges who know the system of railroads, steamboat and steamship lines tributary to the main line on the Pacific coast, agree with us that the through business will add very largely to our gross earnings. Moreover, October 1, under an amicable arrangement with the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the business of Butte City, M. T., was open to the company, and, as has been announced in the press, we have also made arrangements with the other railroad companies by which we take business to and from California. Our road will derive large benefits from both these sources.

At a meeting of the directors of the Northern Pacific railroad, held at New York, January 17, 1884, the committee appointed to nominate a successor to Henry Villard reported the name of Robert Harris, Vice-President of the Lake Erie & Western. The committee expressed confidence, from the ability displayed by Mr. Harris in the various positions which he has held on different railroads, that their nominee would be accepted as a surety that the property would be managed in the interests of the shareholders and of the public. The report was accepted and Mr. Harris was unanimously elected. After thanking the directors the new president at once entered on the duties of his office. Apropos of the building of this road and its effect upon the settlement of the central belt of Montana from east to west, the following story is told as related by a locomotive engineer:

"One day I was driving my engine over the prairie at the rate of forty miles an hour, without a house in sight, and supposing the nearest town to be thirty miles distant. But as I glanced ahead I was astonished to see that I was approaching a large city. I rubbed my eyes, thinking it was a mirage.

'Jim,' says I to the fireman, 'what's this place?'

'Blamed if I know!' says Jim, staring out of the cab. 'I declare, if there ain't a new town growed up here since we went over the line yesterday!'

'I believe you are right, Jim. Ring the bell or we shall run over somebody!'

'So I slowed up, and we pulled into a depot, where more'n five hundred people were waiting to see the first train come into the place. The conductor learned the name of the town, put it down on the schedule, and we went on.

'Jim,' says I, as we pulled out, 'keep your eyes open for new towns. First thing you know we'll be running by some strange place.'

'That's so!' says Jim. 'An' hadn't we better git one of the brakemen to watch out on the rear platform for towns that spring up after the engine gets by?'"

At a meeting held in Helena, August 13, 1883, the following County Assessors were present: J. W. Maloney, of Dawson county; Thomas Irvin, of Custer county; T. J. Howell, of Meagher county; A. M. Easterly, of Jefferson county; J. Y. Smith, of Gallatin county; R. E. Peters, of Yellowstone county; and H. H. Guthrie, of Lewis and Clarke county. The meeting came to an understanding as to the assessment and taxation of railroads and telegraph and telephone lines. It was decided to assess the Northern Pacific road (rails and ties) at $4,500 per mile, and the improvements, cars, coaches, buildings and material on hand at a proper valuation in the respective counties; telegraph and telephone lines at $200 per mile valuation. The attorney of the Northern Pacific, Colonel Sanders, was present, and proposed certain property of the road as taxable which the company would not object to and would pay along its route. He protested in behalf of the company against the assessment of the road, etc., which he claims was exempt under the charter. Colonel Sanders relied upon Sec. 2 of the Act, which says: "And be it further enacted, that the right of way through the public lands be, and the same is hereby, granted to said 'Northern Pacific Railroad Company,' its successors and assigns for the construction of a railroad and telegraph as proposed. * * * Said way is granted to said railroad to the extent of two hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad where it may pass through the public domain, including all necessary ground for station buildings, workshops, depots, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables and water stations; and the right of way shall be exempt from taxation within the Territories of the United States." The Assessors interpret this section as simply an exemption of the land—400 feet each side of the tracks—and on this interpretation resolved to assess and tax the plant and machinery of the railroad company.

Helena and Jefferson R. R.—For some years past the project of connecting Helena with Jefferson by railroad was discussed, but like former enterprises of a similar character, was allowed to fall through. Early in 1883 the project was revived by Samuel T. Hauser and other residents of Helena; a survey of the proposed line made, of which the plats in the office of Engineer Dodge show that about one mile of the line will be built in Lewis and Clarke county and nineteen and a fraction in Jefferson county. The survey was followed by the following notice:

"OFFICE OF THE HELENA & JEFFERSON COUNTY RAILROAD COMPANY, August 15, 1883.

"Notice is hereby given that on the 17th day of September, 1883, at 10 o'clock a. m., at the First National Bank in Helena, books will be opened for receiving subscriptions to the capital stock of the Helena and Jefferson County Railroad Company, under the supervision of Samuel T. Hauser and Edwin Stone, or one of them, at which time and place parties desiring to subscribe to such capital stock will be afforded an opportunity so to do. Samuel T. Hauser, Henry Villard, Thomas F. Oakes, George Gray, Edwin Stone."

The stockholders met again October 18, 1883, for the purpose of electing a Board of Trustees.

This road was opened to Wickes, twenty miles distant from Helena, in January, 1884, and a passenger train run over the branch on the 23d of that month, with Engineer J. T. Dodge in charge. The twenty miles of road-bed were constructed under Colonel Dodge's supervision for $60,000, and the track tied and ironed and completed for less than $250,000.

The Wyoming, Yellowstone Park & Pacific R. R.—Articles of incorporation were filed December 8, 1883, at Cheyenne, of the Wyoming, Yellowstone Park and Pacific railway. Among the incorporators were L. Dupont, the famous powder manufacturer; A. R. Converse, the president of the First National Bank of Cheyenne; and William A. Hale, Governor of Wyoming. The road will run through the coal, iron, soda and petroleum region of Western Wyoming, in the National park and Montana. The directors of the Wyoming, Yellowstone Park & Pacific Railway Company elected the following officers December 22, 1883: President, L. D. Shoemaker; Vice-President, S. H. Wallace; Secretary, H. M. Munsell; Treasurer, James D. Powers; Managing Director, John R. Bothwell. It is stated that the company will begin next spring the construction of an extensive railroad system in Wyoming, Montana and the adjacent Territories.

B. R. R. Company.—In January, 1884, articles of incorporation were filed at Helena by the Bullion Railroad Company; object, to build a railroad from the terminus of the National Park branch of the Northern Pacific railroad to Cooke City, in Gallatin county. Capital stock, $1,000,000; principal office, Cooke City. Incorporators, Geo. A. Eaton, F. D. Pease, Geo. A. Huston, D. E. Fogarty and G. Haldorn.

Montana & Dominion R. R. Co.—In May, 1884, the following named incorporators of this company: E. J. Conger, James B. Hubbell, Charles W. Savage, Willis W. Garland, Charles G. Cox, Lewis C. Currier, Louis B. Hubbell, Newman Borchard, Harry H. Gerish, Russell Briggs, William B. Gaw, A. H. O'Connor, A. J. Kennedy, R. L. Edwards, O. B. Lebcher, A. E. Potter and Segismond Deutch filed in the Territorial Secretary's office articles of incorporation for the construction of the Montana & Dominion railroad. The termini of the said road are to be Miles City, Montana; Fort Buford, Dakota; Fort Benton, Montana; Bingham, Wyoming, and Deadwood, Dakota. Capital stock, $1,500,000.

Montana Central R. R., generally known as The Butte and Bozeman R. R. Project, is taking practical shape. The route selected for this road (over the Pipestone pass) would make the line less than 100 miles from Butte to Bozeman and would carry it near to the Pipestone, Iron Rod and Silver Star mines; thence to the Pony, Sterling, Spalding and Red Bluff mines; thence to the Cherry and Elk Creek mines. The road would thus pass for almost its entire distance over a continual mineral belt. The construction of the line would enable the ores of Red Bluff, Pony and other points to be moved to the Butte smelters for reduction, thus giving the road an immense traffic, the mine owners an outlet for their ores and the Gallatin country a steady market for its mineral and agricultural products.

CHAPTER XV.

AGRICULTURE AND STOCK-RAISING.

THROUGHOUT the general history the rapid increase in the number and magnitude of Montana's industries has been often referred to; in the history of the counties, statistics and descriptions of these industries are given.

In the dry climate of Montana neither farming nor gardening can be done without irrigation as a general rule. In many places both Indians and half-breeds, as well as more recent white settlers, have irrigated successfully. The rich deep soils of the valleys and plains, the débris of neighboring granite mountains, when water is properly used, yield remunerative crops. Round the towns of the territory may be seen fields where, without other plant food than that naturally present in the soil and contributed by the irrigating streams, fifteen consecutive wheat crops have been successfully raised, and cabbage, spinach, and roots produced with small expenditure of labor or manure. There is much difference in the value of ranches. Some are well watered, undulating, with sheltering bluffs, warm valleys for winter quarters, hay meadows, and several fenced pastures for young heifers and other animals desired to be kept separate from the rest of the herd. Some are at high altitudes and only fit for summer ranges; the cattle quartered upon them in winter or stormy weather drift widely, and the percentage of loss is heavy. This was the chief disadvantage of an extensive ranch recently established in the mountains. Some comprise mainly poor, sandy soils, where the herbage is liable to suffer early and seriously from drouth, and at all times lacks the nutritious value of fodder grown on basalt or limestone. But the most fatal shortcoming is where water is far scattered and uncertain, and where in dry seasons the distressed animals have to travel for their daily drink much more than the ten miles, the estimated average walking which the ranch beast has every twenty-four hours in quest of food and water. Along the railroad routes and rivers the best country is now closely taken up. In such localities new settlers disposed to acquire satisfactory location, sometimes, however, have the opportunity of entering into partnership with some ranchman who has already his well-selected portion of country, his increasing herd and his registered brand. Few even of the oldest ranches are fully stocked, few of the ranchmen have all the capital they could profitably use; hence some are willing to dispose of a portion of their interest to any one who can introduce the needful capital to purchase more cattle, preempt more water-fronts, and open up the ranch farm, so that its full resources may be drawn forth.

"Of the 93,000,000 acres of land contained within the present boundaries of Montana Territory," says John W. Eddy, "probably 70,000,000 are of such character as to be valuable for agricultural and grazing purposes. While it is true that at least two-fifths of the entire extent of our territorial domain is properly ranked as mountainous, it must not be understood as being worthless on that account. Although it is in many places too high for grain-growing, the characteristic grasses are abundant, and grazing is excellent on the very summits of many of the ranges. The successful cultivation of our valley lands is secured with less liability to failure than in many other regions where irrigation is impracticable. The soil is deep and so hardy as to seldom need renewal, or the use of fertilizers, and the supply of water in the streams of all the large valleys is perennial. The rainfall is sometimes adequate for a season's crops, but the irrigation practiced is a certain guaranty against failure on account of drought. Excessive cold sometimes characterizes our winters, but they compare favorably with those of even lower latitudes." Since 1880 the area of government lands for sale in Montana has been daily subjected to great reduction. Settlers have flocked in to cultivate the rich valleys and garden spots among the foothills, as shown in the assessor's returns.

Richard Soeby.

The railroad lands are also meeting with a ready sale, while thousands are waiting for the action of the Government, which will throw the rich, fertile reservations of the Indians into the market,—providing for the non-industrial portion of the tribes other reservations better adapted to their tastes, while giving the working members of each band a fair acreage from which to win their sustenance. A portion of the Crow lands has been ceded, but other and greater reservations remain to be ceded. The Piegan and Blackfeet reservation to the north of the Missouri occupies a vast expanse of the choicest of lands, the Milk river portion of it being similar in topography and in the richness of its soil to the famous Red river valley of the north. Its altitude is lower than the valleys to the south, and it would seem that its crop products would be less subject to the blighting influences of frosts. The warm breath of the Japan current penetrates to a certain extent over this country, and as a result, its winters are many degrees milder than those portions of Dakota and Minnesota in the same latitude. The bottoms on this reservation are known to be very rich. The same may be said of the Flathead reservation, in the extreme northwest, with the addition that here the genial influences of the Japan current are more perceptibly felt, and apples, pears, plums and other fruits can be produced in greater abundance.

The breeding of cattle on the western plains has long been a lucrative business. It has enriched thousands of men of limited means. Four-year old steers could be raised for about $3.80 each, and were then sold for $18 to $25 at the railway station. But the old conditions are changing. The settlement of the western country has limited the free pasture lands, and, as in all other occupations, the large cattle breeders have driven out the smaller ones, the business is being concentrated into the hands of a few men comparatively; but this monopolizing tendency has some advantages. The land is being fenced in, and successful endeavors are making to improve the quality of the stock. American beef and mutton are now equal to, and will soon be the best of, any in the world. When ensilage is well understood in the middle and northern states, we will probably be able to raise more of our own cattle to supply the local demand, and then, doubtless, the smaller capitalists will again have a chance. Ensilage, it will be remembered, is the system by which fodder is kept succulent and fresh all through the winter months. It corresponds to the canning of fruit and vegetables, and is a comparatively inexpensive process. But while the great droves of cattle on the western plains are getting into fewer hands, it is also true that the large farmers are monopolizing the soil to the exclusion of the smaller tiller of the earth in all the prairie countries. This tendency to make great land and cattle kings is not a wholesome one, for the hope of our country is, after all, in a farming class which tills its own soil and are not hirelings. Luckily, in other parts of the country there is a steady increase of the number of farmers who own 320 acres and less. In California, for instance, there are but little over 5,000 farms of more than 500 acres, while there are over 30,000 of less than 500 acres. All the hilly and mountainous region of the country, including the ocean slopes, is more suitable for small than for large farms. In the neighborhood of the great cities, also, the fruit and vegetable farms are always limited in extent. The proportion of land-holders in Montana to the entire population, is not so well balanced as in California; but the time is assuredly near at hand when every acre of arable land in the Territory will be in the possession of the cultivator, giving peace and plenty to a prosperous and contented people, and adding to the mineral wealth of Montana the greater riches which spring from cultivated fields.

*Stock Growing.—This great industry, for which Montana is now celebrated, may be

* D. J. Hagan of Augusta, M. T., writing under date of June 22, 1885, says: "The first beef drive out of this Territory was made by me for Orenstein & Popper, of Salt Lake City, in October, 1868. The cattle were purchased of P. Largey, who said to have been founded in the summer of 1862, when the necessities of the mining camp suggested the business. During the years 1863–4 stock-growing assumed large proportions; cattle were imported, fattened on the rich grasses of the valleys; ranches were established in numbers, and at the close of 1864, the legislature was called upon for the "Act concerning Marks and Brands," which act was passed and duly approved January 31, 1865. The raising of sheep was next introduced, but this industry remained in its primitive condition until recent times, when a new impulse was given to it by the present sheep farmers of the Territory, under the opportunities presented by the newly constructed railroads. From the establishment of the stock export trade between Montana and Chicago to the completion of the Northern Pacific railroad to Helena, five routes or trails were generally adopted: First from the Sun river ranches via Snake river to Granger, on the Union Pacific railroad, 650 miles, and thence per rail to Chicago, 1,376 miles. Second, from Sun river, via Smith and Muscleshell rivers, to Pine Bluff, on the Union Pacific railroad, 700 miles, and thence per rail to Chicago, 968 miles, a total distance of 1,668 miles. Third (1878), from Sun river to Bismarck, on the Missouri, via Blackfoot reservation, and thence per rail to Chicago, a total distance of 1,579 miles. Fourth, from Sun river across the Marias to Fargo, 800 miles, and thence per rail to Chicago, 744 miles. Fifth from Sun river to Bismarck, via Camp Lewis, the Great Bend of the Muscleshell, down the Porcupine river, across the Yellowstone and Tongue rivers to Bismarck, via the main trail, 610 miles, and thence to Chicago, 879 miles, or a total of 1,489 miles. The construction of the Northern Pacific railroad has remedied many, if not all, the delays and vexations attendant on driving cattle hundreds of miles through a rugged country, brought the central market of Chicago within a few days' journey of the ranches, and opened up to stockmen an easy way for the exit of the product of their ranges, as well as a prompt and safe means for the return of their capital and its profits. Cattle raising is here no longer an experiment. The most severe winters cannot destroy the herds. The favored belt for stock-raising apparently extends from the vicinity of Fort Macleod, in the British northwest territory, to the southern confines of Wyoming. From Bow river north the snow lies too deep, while in the southwest of the United States cattle starve three months in the year, because of insufficient forage, and are subject to malignant diseases. In 1878–9 the loss from storms was estimated at about 2 per cent per annum. In 1880 the loss reached 8 per cent; in 1881, 7 per cent; and in 1882–3 less than 6 per cent. Such losses generally occur in new herds, driven into the rich pastures of Montana late in the fall, while still poor. Should they arrive in the summer or early fall, they are in fair condition by the beginning of winter, and come out in spring looking as healthy as if subjected to a course of stall feeding. It is apparent,—it is conceded, that the food and climate and water which Montana offers, afford all the elements to perfect animal life.

Snow did not cover the ground in Montana to a preventive depth until February 1, 1884, and then it lasted only until the 20th of the month, when the chinook winds came, and the mantle disappeared in a day. The cattle had to "rustle" for their food but twenty days, therefore, throughout the winter. The cold was not more severe than usual, and the blizzards were infrequent. Careful computations give the loss by death of range cattle at 2 per cent. State cattle, more susceptible to exposure, died in greater numbers, but 10 per cent. is a large estimate of loss to be charged against them. The range cattle number 550,000 out of a total of 650,000, so that the aggregate loss would foot up 21,000. Many good judges say 15,000 is nearer the figure. The following statistics form the results of the inquiries as follows:

Losses in cattle during winter	21,000	Value at $3 per head	$ 3,000,000
Number cattle in Territories Dec. 1, 1883	650,000	Value cattle and sheep Dec. 1, 1884	$32,850,000
Number Dec. 1, 1884	895,000	Natural increase cattle in 1884	195,000
Value at $30 per head	$29,850,000	Increase by importation in 1884	150,000
Number sheep in Territories Jan. 1, 1884	1,000,000

was then agent for Ed. Creighton, and used in the Salt Lake market and in filling contracts along the Union Pacific Railroad. The same fall, but later, a mixed herd, consisting of steers, dry cows and heifers, was driven by Jerry Mann to Utah and sold to Maj. Bent, who had a twenty-four mile grading contract on the Promontory. In the following spring a band of about 200 head was driven from Beaverhead and sold to Col. Johns, of Salt Lake City. The first shipment of Montana cattle East was made by James Forbes from Ogden, in 1874. He purchased out of Mr. Kohrs' Sun River herd. The same year a Mr. Allen purchased a large band of steers in Madison county and shipped from Granger. In 1876 Mr. Kohrs drove from his Sun River range and shipped from Cheyenne. The Madisonian stock man evidently refers to the third drive that was made from his section of the Territory."

Whatever errors in estimating may be chargeable against the above statements, they will surely be found to favor the debit rather than the credit side.

On January 1, 1884, the estimate of the number of cattle was 600,000, valued at $21,000,000. During the year 100,000 head were brought in, which, with the natural increase, has brought the number up to 850,000 head, valued at $30,000,000. In the following list the county is named in the first column, the number of cattle given in the next, and the value of cattle in the last:

Choteau	119,860	4,195,100	Meagher	193,171	6,760,985
Custer	189,769	6,642,860	Missoula	19,152	670,420
Dawson	51,992	1,819,720	Silver Bow	4,214	147,490
Deer Lodge	32,830	1,149,050	Yellowstone	53,084	1,857,940
Gallatin	59,125	2,069,375
Jefferson	26,554	929,390	Total	850,000	$30,000,000
Lewis & Clarke	47,855	1,674,925

The bunch grass which everywhere abounds is wonderfully sweet and nutritious. Cattle fatten upon it quicker and keep in better condition than those which feed upon the blue-grass of Kentucky and Southwestern Virginia, or the buffalo grass of Nebraska and Colorado. The immense grass fields are so large that in riding over them one would have some difficulty, except for the trails, to select the lands upon which the cattle had been feeding from those which have not been touched. The bunch grass grows not only all over the valleys and benches, but on the foot hills, and even on many of the mountains themselves. The supply of it is inexhaustible. Even in the older settled portions of the territory, where improved farms are frequent, often joining each other in the valleys, the cattle, sheep and horses do not begin to eat down the grass, and although the ranges on each side of the valleys may be nominally taken up, they are still capable of sustaining many times as many animals as now graze upon them. While such grass offers food for millions of stock, the presence of larkspur and wild turnip,—both poisonous herbs,—is a drawback which must be considered. Even these poisons entail only a nominal loss. There may be portions of South America where cattle, sheep and horses may be raised at less expense than in Montana, but there is certainly no part of the United States where the same grade of animals, ready for market, cost the ranchman less money, while the price which they command is many times greater than in any of the Spanish-American republics, and but very little below that obtained in the less remote states and territories west of the Missouri River.

The customary way of managing a band of cattle in Montana is simply to brand them and turn them out upon the range. Some stock owners give no more attention to their cattle until next spring, when they round them up, and brand the calves, select those they intend to sell, and turn the remainder out again. Under this careless management they are sure to lose some steers, which may stray away or be stolen The more careful managers employ one man for every 1,500 or 2,000 head of cattle, whose duty it is to ride about the outskirts of the range, follow any trail leading away and drive the cattle back, and go among neighboring herds, if there are any, looking for stray animals and drive them home. At the spring round-up a few extra men have to be employed for several weeks. In starting a new herd, cows, bulls and yearlings are bought. The older cattle of ordinary grade (they are all American—no long-horned Texans) cost from $15 to $25 a head, and calves under one year old running with the herd not being counted. Yearlings may be obtained for from $8 to $10 each. The average cost of raising a steer, not counting interest on capital invested, is from sixty cents to one dollar a year, so that a four-year-old steer raised from a calf and ready for market costs about four dollars. He is worth on the ranch about $22, and if driven to Fort Benton or the railroad depots on the N. P. or other railroads at least $30. A herd consisting of yearlings, cows and bulls will have no steers ready for the market in less than two or three years. Taking into account the loss of interest on capital invested before returns are received, all expenses and ordinary losses, the average profit of cattle raising in Montana for the last few years has been at least 30 per cent per annum. Some well informed cattle men estimate it at 40 to 45 per cent.

The percentage of loss in all states and territories ranges from 1 to 20 per cent, or general average 3½ per cent. The greatest loss was reported by Idaho, Indian Territory and Kansas.

Kansas is the only state that reports an increase in shipments of beeves this season, but the general average is reported the same as in 1882. The average condition of cattle on the range is reported by Kansas, Texas and Indian Territory to be worse when compared with the corresponding period of last year, but all other sections report an average or better condition of stock than in the spring of 1882. Prices on the range advanced during the last year from $2 to $10 per head, and in some instances the price of steers was stated at $75 per head, an extraordinary advance on old prices.

The heaviest transaction in cattle that ever occurred in the territory took place in July, 1883. Conrad Kohrs, for Kohrs & Bielenberg, and Granville Stuart, for Stuart & Anderson, purchased of A. J. Davis, of Davis, Hauser & Co., 12,000 head of cattle for $400,000. Stuart & Anderson were former owners of the herd, the sale being in fact a purchase of the two-thirds interest of Judge Davis by Mr. Kohrs for $266,667. This is the heaviest transaction in cattle that has ever taken place in the territory, the next highest being made a few weeks previous, when the Montana Company bought of Downs & Allen the old 7,000 head of Clark & Ulm for $235,000. By this transaction Conrad Kohrs placed himself at the head of the Montana cattle business.

Throughout the territory this great industry is being fostered by men whose capital and energy have been devoted to the building up of Montana from the beginning of her progressive era. Such industries are noticed in the history of the counties where they belong.

The Montana Stock Growers' Association, of which Granville Stuart was elected president in July, 1884, represents an ownership of over 500,000 head of cattle, while the E. M. S. G. Association represents capital placed at $35,000,000.

Sheep Raising.—This growing industry belongs particularly to modern times. The increase of capital, the extraordinary opportunities offered by the grazing fields of the territory, and the demands of the Eastern markets all prompted the enterprise and now contribute to its success. The Economist, an authority on such a subject, speaks of the industry thus:

"Without injustice to any other part of the West, it may be truly said of Montana that it is the best grazing section of the Rocky Mountain region, not only on the open plains and prairies, covered with rich and nutritious grasses, but on all the smooth hills and naked mountain slopes, and the same rich carpet continues even beyond these far up into the timber. Wherever a fire has swept up the mountains, destroying the pine trees, leaving the blackened stems and stumps to mark the place where the forest stood, there quickly springs up a tall green grass, covering every spot where it can gain a foothold. There, as in other parts of the West, as is well known, the grass cures on the ground, furnishing, in fact, a better food than if cut and cured. There is seldom any difficulty experienced on account of the cold or snows of winter, many who have stock running on the prairies making no preparations for winter feeding, which is seldom necessary. A large and increasing percentage of the sheep of Montana, as well as of the cattle, is owned by persons who do not manage them themselves. Nearly all the leading men of capital in Helena own interests in bands of stock, either sheep or cattle. The persons desiring to invest in the business of sheep growing take as an associate some man of experience and integrity, but destitute of capital, and give him entire charge of the flock. For his services he receives usually one-half of the increase of the flocks. Sheep must be herded summer and winter in separate bands of not more than 2,000 each, corralled every night and guarded against the depredations of dogs and wild animals. Cattle and sheep cannot live together on the same range. The latter not only eat down the grass so closely that nothing is left for the cattle, but they also leave an odor which is offensive to the cattle. Although the cost of managing sheep is greater than that of handling cattle, the returns are quicker and larger. While a herd of young cattle begins to yield an income only at the expiration of three years, the sheep yield a crop of wool the first summer after they are driven upon the range, and the increase of the band is much greater. Our informant considers sheep far more profitable than cattle, while the life of the sheep grower is much more easy than that of the cattle-herder. In his judgment, the annual clip of wool in Montana Territory will reach as high as 50,000,000 pounds within ten years."

The dealings in sheep for the past year prove conclusively the correctness of the Economist's views and prophecy. Wool is eagerly bought at Fort Benton at prices varying from nineteen to twenty-three cents, at Dillon from fifteen to eighteen cents, and in the northwestern districts at about the Dillon prices. The market value of Montana sheep in Chicago is about four and one-half cents per pound gross; they will weigh from 100 to 125 pounds each, which will insure from $4.50 to $5 per head. The price of cars will be about $100, and double-decked cars will carry 200 head, which will give a margin sufficient to insure the drover against loss by accident and fluctuations. With such opportunities it is no wonder that the sheep raisers look back in astonishment a few years and contrast their thousand sheep of that time with the hundreds of thousands which now mark the industry in the territory. Numerical statistics of sheep in the two territories are hard to get, but there were fully a million head on the plains and in the valleys in March, 1884. The principal sheep-raising localities are in Northern and Western Montana (Dakota's flocks are not numerous), on Powder river, Graveyard creek, in the Judith basin and in the valley of the Gallatin. It has been found that the hardiest and most profitable varieties are secured by crossing merino bucks with Cotswolds, Leicester, and other long-wooled varieties, and such crosses are most in favor with Montana sheep-raisers. The flocks have wintered well, and the losses have proven less than for several years—less, in fact, than was believed possible. The most serious losses to sheep have been from wolves, which are still abundant in Montana, particularly north of the Yellowstone.

Shipments.—We copy the following statement of shipments from Montana for the present year from the Yellowstone Journal, which, if thrown into dollars by a computation of the value thereof, would make a handsome showing of several great interests:

WOOL SHIPMENTS, 1884.

Via Northern Pacific to Boston (No. lbs.)	463,948
Via Northern Pacific to Chicago	284,714
Via Missouri river to Chicago	123,946
Via Missouri river to Boston	375,426
Total	1,258,034
Shipments in 1883	848,225
Increase of 47 per cent. or	399,809

HIDES, PELTS AND FURS, 1884.

Via Northern Pacific	713,213
Via Missouri river	150,000
Total	863,213
Shipment in 1883	427,000
Increase 102 per cent, or	435,313

CATTLE SHIPMENTS, 1884.

Via Northern Pacific	3,447 cars	76,560 head
Via Canadian Pacific	432 cars	8,740 head
Total	3,879 cars	85,300 head
Shipped in 1883	1,525 cars	30,418 head
Increase 180 per cent, or	2,354 cars	54,882 head

OTHER SHIPMENTS.

Sheep	200 cars	20,000 head
Horses and mules	15 cars	200 head
Dressed beef from Medora	93 cars	3,040 head

A reference to the chapter on statistics will point out the proportion of stock shipped to stock produced. In March, 1885, the following appointments (connected with the stock industry) were made: Thomas Stuart, of Deer Lodge, was confirmed veterinary surgeon for the Territory. R. C. Walker, of Choteau; Granville Stuart, of Meagher; Frank Robertson, of Custer; J. S. Day, of Dawson; R. S. Hamilton, of Lewis and Clarke, and A. S. Ellis, of Yellowstone, were appointed and confirmed as members of the cattle commission.

The Montana Cow Boy.—The term Cow Boy is the Western name of a herder, and under it the herder claims greater license than even a poet. This license he enjoys, seldom going beyond its limits, but always ready to defend the privileges which it offers. He is to the present time what the voyageur was to Montana's past, a good-hearted, faithful worker, who understands his business, and seldom fails to accomplish all the duties of that business so long as he is not interfered with. In many respects he is a wonderful creature. He endures hardships that would take the lives of many men, and is, therefore, a perfect type of physical manhood. He is the finest horseman in the world, and excels in all the rude sports of the field. He aims to be a dead shot, and universally is. Constantly during the herding season he rides seventy miles a day, and a majority of the year sleeps in the open air. His life in the saddle makes him worship his horse, and it, with a rifle and six-shooter, completes his happiness. Of vice in the ordinary sense he knows nothing. He is a rough, uncouth, brave and generous creature, who never lies or cheats. It is a mistake to imagine they are a dangerous set. Any one is as safe with them as any people in the world, unless he steals a horse or is hunting for a fight In their eyes death is a mild punishment for horse stealing. Indeed, it is the highest crime known to the unwritten laws of the ranch. Their life, habits, education and necessities breed this feeling in them. But with all this disregard of human life there are less murderers and cutthroats graduated from the cowboys than from among the better educated classes of the east who come out here for venture or gain. They delight in appearing rougher than they are. To a tenderfoot, as they call an eastern man, they love to tell blood-curdling stories and impress him with the dangers of the frontier. But no man need get in a quarrel with them unless he seeks it, or get harmed unless he commits some crime. They very often own an interest in the herd they are watching, and very frequently become owners of ranches. The slang of the range they always use to perfection, and in season or out of season. Unless you want to insult him, never offer a cowboy pay for any little kindness he has done or for a share of his rude meals. Outside his trade he is a very innocent abroad.

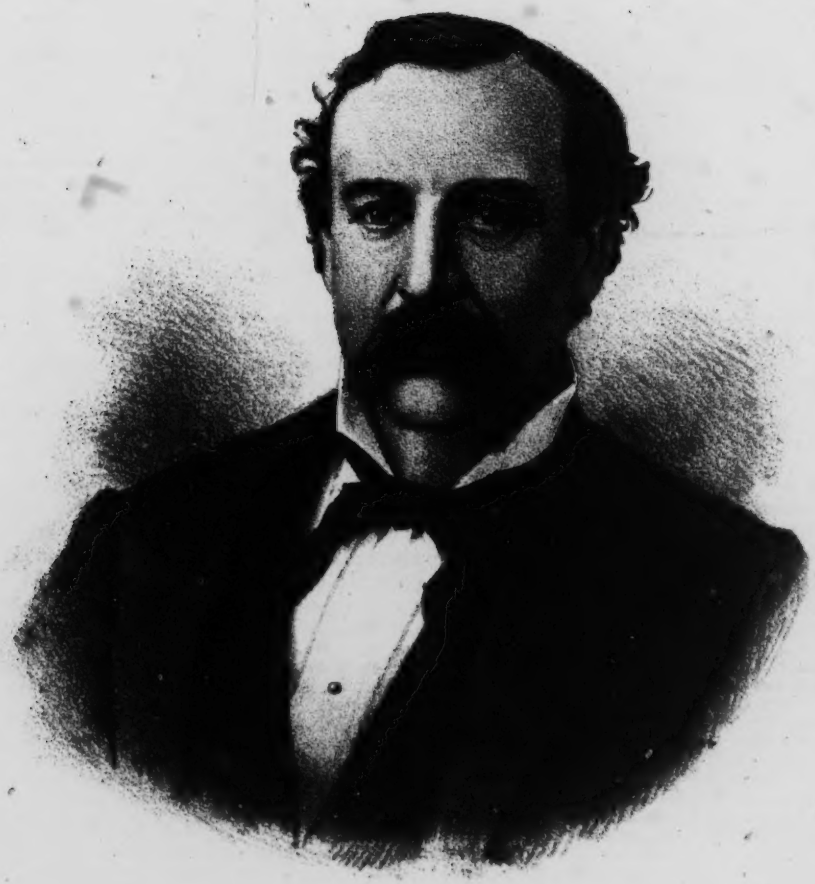
CHAPTER XVI.

STATISTICAL REVIEW.

FROM the organization of the Territory to the close of 1866, the collection of taxes and the expenditure of moneys were the principal questions with which the legislature dealt. The rough and ready manner in which the infant Territory was raised, the liberality of her guardians in appropriating funds, and the ten thousand demands for moneys to be expended in public improvements, rendered the road to the treasury a great thoroughfare, and urged an expenditure far beyond the sum which the economist would countenance in an older commonwealth. To provide for this extraordinary outlay, and to render the future liable for a share of the cost incurred in making permanent improvements, the legislature passed a Funding Act, which was approved December 14, 1866. The three principal sections of this economical measure were: "First, That all the Warrants of the Territory of Montana outstanding and unpaid on the 1st day of February, A.D. 1867, shall be taken up on or before June 1, 1867, and the bonds herein provided for issued in lieu thereof. Second, The treasurer of the Territory of Montana is hereby authorized to issue on the credit of Montana Territory, coupon bonds for the purposes set forth in this act, to an amount not exceeding fifty thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, redeemable at the pleasure of the Territory, after two years, and payable five years from date, and bearing interest at the rate of fifteen per cent per annum, and the bonds herein authorized shall be the denomination of fifty dollars and one hundred dollars each. Third, Any holders of Territorial Warrants outstanding and unpaid at the time aforesaid, shall present the same to the Territorial auditor, who shall certify the amount thereof, together with the interest accrued thereon to said holder, and the Territorial treasurer, upon such certificate, shall issue to said holder bonds to the amount of such certificate: Provided, That said Warrants shall be issued in some multiple of fifty dollars, and if any amount so held shall be of a sum less than fifty dollars, or less than the amount of any bond of higher denomination, the holder shall make up the amount in money, so as to equal the amount of the face of the bond to be issued."

W. H. Rodgers, auditor of the Territory, in his report for the year ending November 30, 1868, says: "On entering upon the duties of auditor, on the 13th day of December, 1867, I found the indebtedness of the Territory to be $104,038.90, which will appear by exhibit herewith transmitted. Most of this indebtedness accrued prior to the first of November, 1867. The last legislature, on the 3d day of December, passed what is known as the 'Funding Act,' intending to provide for the bonding of all indebtedness existing on the first day of November, 1867. This act provided for the funding of $60,000, which amount fell below the true indebtedness of the Territory, at that time about the sum of $18,401.61;



Oscar B. Patten

$10,636.10 of this amount has been received by the treasurer for taxes; 58,761.66 has been bonded, leaving a balance of this class of indebtedness, yet unprovided for, about the sum of 6,558.95. I would, therefore, recommend that said 'Funding Act' be so amended as to authorize the treasurer to issue bonds for an amount sufficient to redeem all of that class of warrants."

The Territorial indebtedness on the 30th day of November, 1868, is shown as follows:

Warrants outstanding on the 1st of November, 1867	$75,956 71
Warrants issued by former auditor, John H. Ming, from November 1 to December 13, 1867	28,082 19
Accounts audited and warrants issued since December 13, 1867, as per exhibit	36,379 26
CONTRA.
By amount of old warrants redeemed, as provided for in Funding Act of December 3, 1867, and certified up to Territorial Treasurer for bonding	$58,761 66
By amount of old warrants for taxes received of Territorial Treasurer	10,636 10
By amount of new warrants received of Treasurer and canceled	31,715 80
Present indebtedness exclusive of the bonds		$ 39,304 60

During 1869–70–71 financial affairs were in fair condition, although in 1871 the revenue collected was fully 33 per cent less than the receipts in 1870, while the assessed valuation was $509,255 above the valuation of 1870. This decrease was credited to the repeal of section 28 of the tax law in 1869, which section provided for an addition of 20 per cent on all taxes not paid in by the last day of the fiscal year. On December 1, 1871, the balance due on bonds was $45,405.39, and on warrants, interest, coupons, etc., $72,303.93, aggregating a total indebtedness of $117,709.32.

The revenue of the year 1873 fell below that of 1872, $12,850.78, made up of $1,894.72, decrease in direct tax on assessed valuation, $4,471.85, decrease owing to amendment of license laws in 1873; and $6,000 difference in amount of collections of delinquent taxes, due to the repeal of section 28 of tax law, previously mentioned. Treasurer W. H. Rodgers, in his report for 1873, refers to the expenditure of $428.57 toward repairing the arsenal. In his suggestions he deals with a few well-known events in the history of the territory as follows:

From my warrant account it will be seen that the expenses of the penitentiary, under executive control, have been enormous. The system created for its management at the late extraordinary session of the legislature has proven both cumbersome and extravagant. A method more simple and profitable to the territory might be adopted; and I recommend that the act approved May 6, 1873, entitled "An act to govern and regulate the penitentiary at Deer Lodge city, Montana territory," be repealed, and that in lieu thereof, the legislature provide for the letting, to the lowest and best bidder, of the possession and government of the penitentiary, and the care and maintenance of the convicts confined therein. That such contractor be allowed to reasonably employ such convicts and to receive to his own use all the earnings thereof; and that before entering upon the performance of such contract, he be required to execute an obligation to the territory in the penal sum of at least double the amount of his bid, conditioned for the safe keeping of the property committed to his care; that he will sufficiently detain and guard such convicts during their terms of sentence and imprisonment respectively; that he will supply such convicts with all necessary and wholesome food, clothing, bedding, medicines and medical attendance; that he will properly manage the penitentiary, and all affairs connected therewith, and faithfully perform all other acts which may be enjoined upon him by law; such bond to be approved by the auditor and treasurer of the territory, and to be filed and deposited with the auditor. If, however, you do not deem it wise to repeal the act mentioned, I suggest that it be so amended as to direct the payment of all moneys received from convict labor to the treasurer of the terrritory, at the end of each month; and that all expenses of the penitentiary be paid by the proper disbursing officer of the territory. The necessity for this amendment arises from the fact that I have had no official knowledge of the receipts and disbursements of convict earnings. I believe that were the law repealed in toto, and the method herein indicated adopted, it would be a saving to the territory, at the present time, of at least $5,000 each year. I would again call your attention to the necessity of changing the end of the fiscal year for territorial purposes from the first day of December to the thirty first day of December, and thus make the first day of January the beginning of the fiscal year for territorial purposes. I also recommend that all warrants outstanding on the first day of July, 1874, be bonded, by which all transactions of the territory will be reduced to a cash basis, and economy secured to the finances of the territory. I call your special attention to warrant No. 1769, amounting to $500 issued to James M. Fish, as a reward from Governor Potts, for the arrest and delivery of Mr. A. B. Kiser to the sheriff of Madison county. "I recommend that you cause the matter to be investigated by a select committee of the two houses, that the responsibility of the loss may be fastened upon the proper officer, and such measures taken as will restore the money to the treasury. The time has certainly arrived when you should provide for the punishment of faithless officers, that the treasury may not hereafter be robbed with impunity." To effect this desirable end, I direct your attention to section 457 of the Criminal Practice Act; and suggest that it be so amended as to require a concurrence of the governor, and the judge and prosecuting attorney for the district wherein the alleged crime was committed, before any reward shall be offered for the arrest of suspected fugitives from justice; and only in the event of such concurrence, when there is reasonable ground to convict. The loss of the $500 to the territory is not so great when compared with the heavy expense imposed upon the tax-payers of Madison county in Mr. Kiser's case; and I further recommend that the amount of such expense be restored to the treasury of that county.

From December 1, 1871, to April 1, 1873,—sixteen months—the total receipts from the Territory amounted to $78,082.25, of which $77,927.14 were disbursed. The total indebtedness of the Territory, April 1, 1873, was $146,586.37, an increase of $29,070.85 on the total debt as recorded December 1, 1871. The total debt of Territory and counties on April 1, 1873, exceeded $500,000, which was attributed to the extravagance of county commissioners, and the extraordinary expenditures of the legislature preceding that of 1873.

The years 1874 and 1875 were marked by a decided decrease in revenue, the receipts being lower each year than at any time since 1868. During the year 1876 there was a decrease of $8,100.87 in the Territorial debt and the entire debt refunded at 10 per cent, being 2 per cent less than the interest on the debt retired this year. Of the $141,732.74 received in 1876 as revenue, the sum of $91,200 was received from the sale of the 10 per cent bonds. The decrease in the Territorial debt during the year 1878 was $20,105.78, or 19 per cent of the total debt. The increase in revenue was $9,155.77. In 1879 the legislature, in extraordinary session, enacted the Funding Law, which authorized the funding of the warrant debt and refunding of the bonded debt. The 7 per cents, amounting to $70,000, were sold at 1.01$\frac{1}{4}$, and delivered to the New York purchasers on January 1, 1880, the same date on which the 10 per cents were redeemed.

In 1880 the debt of the Territory was decreased 66 per cent, or to the amount of $40,944.38. Immediately after the sale of the 7 per cents, in January, 1880, the warrant debt was extinguished, and at the close of the year the sum of $40,118.05 was reported to the credit of the warrant fund, and $9,000 in the sinking fund, the latter in trust for the bonds redeemable in January, 1883, and the former sufficient to meet all current expenses of the Territory for the year.

The financial condition of the territory at the close of 1881 is shown in the following paragraph from Treasurer D. H. Weston's report for that year:

"Notwithstanding a considerable increase in territorial expenditures, and the reduction of the territorial tax levy from three mills on the dollar to one mill on the dollar, it is very gratifying to be able to state that the debt has been decreased during the past year $8,038.41. This result has been obtained chiefly by the large increase in receipts from licenses and in the assessed valuation of taxable property. No interest on warrants has been paid the past year, as there has been an ample amount in the Warrant Fund to pay all warrants on presentation, and a balance of $54,274.29 remains at this date in the fund. If this large surplus should be retained to the close of the current year, it is to be hoped that the Legislative Assembly will appropriate it toward the extinguishment of the bonded debt, as at that time the territorial bonds will be redeemable."

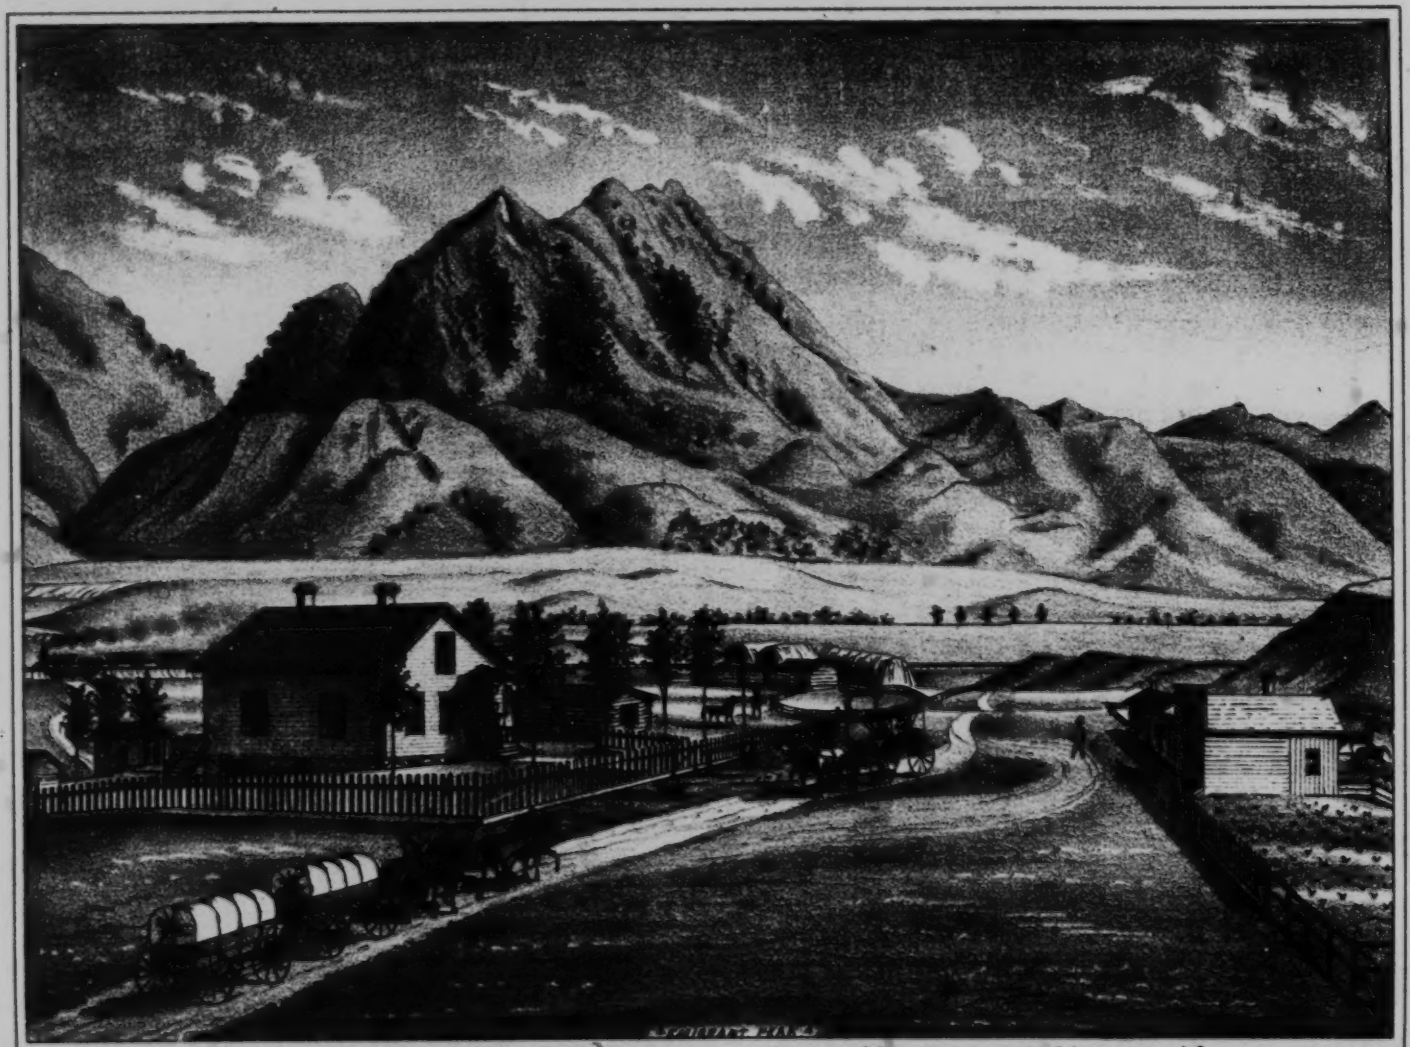
The report of Mr. Weston, tendered to Governor Potts in January, 1883, is remarkable in statement and testimony. The official term of each was about to expire, and with the end of their official services the end of the territorial indebtedness also came. Mr. Weston says:

"The most gratifying feature of the territorial finances for 1882 is the virtual extinguishment of the debt. For the first time since the organization of the territory it can be said that Montana owes nothing. It is true that there are seven per cent. bonds outstanding to the amount of $70,000. But I have called for redemption on this day of $25,000 of bonds, which exhausts all moneys legally applicable to the Sinking Fund, and there are moneys in the Treasury sufficient to redeem the $45,000 bonds uncalled, and to liquidate all registered liabilities of the territory, leaving a surplus of $14,005.90."

Governor Potts in his last address to the Legislature, January 8, 1883, said:

"The Thirteenth Legislative Assembly of Montana Territory assembles under more favorable auspices than any of its predecessors. The territory for the first time in its history is free from indebtedness, and with a surplus of $14,005.90 in its treasury. The tax duplicate of the territory has reached the sum of $33,211,319.12, and the revenue for territorial purposes for 1882 was $90,863.47. The assessment of property for taxation in 1882 was $9,475,082.82 greater than that of 1881, and an increase of $14,601,517.12 since the adjournment of the last Legislative Assembly. From the financial condition of the territory your attention is called to that of the several counties, whose aggregate indebtedness on the 1st of March last reached the startling sum of $658,974.32, and five counties of the eleven increased their indebtedness during the year ending March 1, 1882. I here repeat the language addressed to the Twelfth Legislative Assembly upon this subject: This exhibit is by no means a gratifying one, and is far from sustaining our boasted ability for local self-government."

Territorial Treasurer Weston, in presenting his report for the fiscal year ending December 3, 1884, says:



"Fridley's Ranch" Residence of F. F. Fridley, Upper Yellowstone Valley, Mont.

"The marked feature of the territorial finances for the past year is the fact that territorial expenditures have largely exceeded receipts of revenue; and that although there has been an important increase in the assessed valuation of property over 1883, the revenue has decreased $9,445.82. On January 1, 1884, there was a cash balance in the Treasury of $30,141.78, and a surplus over all registered liabilities of $26,508.59; while on January 1, 1885, not only was this surplus entirely exhausted, but a registered indebtedness had accrued of $3,016 18 over all assets on hand. It is much to be regretted that the territory should not be enabled to remain free of indebtedness, and to transact its financial affairs on a cash basis, which desirable condition was attained some three years since."

The equalized valuation and tax of the Territory from 1867 to 1884 is shown in the following table:

Year.	Assessment.	Total Tax Collected.	Year.	Assessment.	Total Tax Collected.
1867-8	$8,177,019 95	$59,391 88	1877	$11,193,874 00	$53,127 20
1869-70	8,762,735 00	61,926 56	1878	12,777,028 00	64,619 87
1871	9,271,990 00	49,582 54	1879	15,508,880 00	101,713 14*
1872	10,153,988 00	67,524 01	1880	18,609,802 00	176,612 86†
1873	9,803,745 00	61,157 14	1881	24,040,806 00	126,538 14‡
1874	9,384,311 00	48,109 96	1882	33,211,319 00	152,276 72§
1875	10,062,904 00	48,256 86	1883	44,834,461 00	116,000 00‖
1876	9,939,540 00	50,589 08	1884	49,746,268 00	108,687 41

The assessment of Custer County in 1884 was over $5,000,000, while the Territorial tax was paid on only $585,000.

In assessing mining property the improvements are only considered—not the estimated value of the mine.

In the record of expenditures the following item, amounting to $12,000, appears: Bounty for killing 568 bears, $4,544; 146 mountain lions, $1,168; 5,450 wolves, $5,450; 1,774 coyotes, $887.

The statistics respecting local indebtedness for March 1, 1882, vary much from the Territorial statistics. Silver Bow alone was free from debt, and claimed a surplus purse of $28,727.40. Dawson county was then a part of Custer, and shared in the $73,532.19 debt of that county, without obtaining any of the advantages which the enterprise of the upper county created for themselves. The following table shows precisely the financial condition of the older counties on March 1, 1884, as compared with the previous years.

The assessed valuation does not include the value of minerals in sight, nor does it approach the market value of lands and improvements. Were the true value to be ascertained, the assessment would show five hundred millions rather than its one-fifteenth part. The United States reports for 1882 show the following comparisons: The reported increase in the number of cattle in the territory, notwithstanding the unusually large shipments of beeves to the Eastern markets during the year, was 33,970. The importations of sheep during the year were comparatively few, and yet the returns show an increase of over 100,000, or more than 40 per cent, added to the aggregate of 1881. The receipts of the United States land office at Helena for the lands sold under various acts of Congress during 1882 amounted to $91,664.68, which is about $6,000 in excess of the previous year, when it was considerably larger than ever before. There were 185 applications for mineral patents made during the year, covering 3,957.78 acres, and there were final entries made to the extent of 3,815.04 acres during the same period. Another item indicating growth is the fact that the registered letters and parcels transmitted through the mails of the territory during the last fiscal year numbered 51,310, being an increase of nearly 13,000 as compared with the year 1881.

The returns of 1880 were obtained by Census Supervisor McQuaid. No one questions the accuracy of his figures. The population by counties is as follows:

In other pages the names of 98 per cent of the white inhabitants of the territory in 1862–3 are given.

From the message of Governor Meagher, March 5, 1866, it is learned that the population of Edgerton county was 8,000, of Madison, 10,000, and of Gallatin 2,000; the other counties not reported.

The growing importance of the Territory has been recognized in a most marked manner, by the appointment of Collector Fuller. The order relating to the redistribution of revenue districts was issued early in 1883. In the original order the districts of Montana, Idaho and Utah were consolidated, and O. J. Hollister, collector of the present Utah district, was designated as collector. This was changed by the appointment of Thos. P. Fuller, of Helena, collector of the present Montana district, as collector of the new district, vice Hollister, dropped, in the President's order of June 29, 1883. It seems from the report of 1882 that the internal revenue receipts of the three Territories were as follows: Utah, $48,000; Montana, $68,000; Idaho, $31,050—Montana exceeding Utah $20,000. This is given as the reason for the change, and a strong pressure was brought upon the President by the Montana people to retain Mr. Fuller and make Helena, instead of Salt Lake, the headquarters of the collector for the consolidated district.

The population of Dawson county	180

The total number of colored inhabitants include 1,737 Chinese and 1,750 Indians and Half-breeds; in Beaverhead county, 131 Chinese and 1 Indian; in Choteau county, 17 Chinese and 521 Indians and Half-breeds; in Custer county, 2 Chinese and 14 Indians and Half-breeds; in Dawson county, 11 Indians; in Deer Lodge county, 710 Chinese and 31 Indians and Half-breeds; in Gallatin county, 42 Indians and Half-breeds; in Jefferson county, 52 Chinese and 9 Indians; in Lewis and Clarke county, 359 Chinese and 306 Indians and Half-breeds; in Madison county, 265 Chinese and 18 Indians and Half-breeds; in Meagher county, 52 Chinese and 215 Indians; in Missoula county, 149 Chinese and 522 Indians and Half-breeds.

The reservation Indians are not enumerated, as their lands do not properly belong to the counties within the bounds of which they are situate.

The growth of Montana's population since June, 1880, is phenomenal. The Herald, commenting on the lessons of the fall election of 1882, says: "The total vote cast in 1880 was a few over 14,000, and the population, according to the census taken in that year, was 40,000 in round numbers. The total vote this year foots up 24,312, so that if 14,000 voters in 1880 represented 40,000 population, 23,312 voters in 1882 would represent a population of 66,600. This properly would only represent the population in May last, six months before the election, for voters conforming to the law have to reside in the Territory six months before election to enable them to exercise the elective franchise. To reach an estimate, therefore, of Montana's present population we must include those who have come with their families to the Territory since the 7th of May last. This increase would be moderate if placed at 10,000; so our present population is undoubtedly more than 75,000, or an increase in two years of 35,000 people. At the end of 1883, when the Northern Pacific railroad was completed across the continent, an additional 25,000 was added to the population, giving a round number of 100,000 inhabitants at the beginning of 1884. At the close of this year the population was placed at 100,000.

The prices paid for labor throughout the Territory are liberal, and the treatment accorded the employes everything which Western manliness might suggest. The present value of labor ranges from $1.25 to $7 per day, as shown in the following list:

Farm hands with board by the year, per month	$ 25 to $45
Sheepherders and horsemen by the year	35
Managers of stallions	50
Cattle herders for round ups	45 to 50
Farm hands for summer alone	40 to 45
Quartz miners with board	50 to 60
Teamsters with board	35 to 40
Clerks in stores	$ 75 to 125
Superior clerks and bookkeepers	125 to 175
Female cooks and servants	25 to 35
Placer miners without board, per day	$ 3
Quartz miners without board	3 to 3 50
Carpenters	4 to 5
Masons	7
Sheep shearers, 10 cents per head.

The total number of commercial firms in the Pacific States in 1878 was 28,361. Of this number 194 failed, with liabilities estimated at $13,113,171. Of the 401 firms doing business in Montana that year, not one failed.

In 1883 the number of business houses in the Pacific States reached 53,605. Of this number 1,041 failed, with liabilities placed at $11,239,131, while Montana boasted of 2,111 business houses in 1883, of which only 26 firms failed, with liabilities estimated at 315,000.

There were in 1879 in the territory 33 entries of desert lands, embracing in all 38,900 acres. Only five pieces of land, comprising 2,240 acres, have been entered under the desert heading in the Yellowstone Valley. These are located as follows: Benson's Landing, two; one of 320 acres, taken up in 1879, and one of 110 taken up in 1880; and at Countryman's, 140 acres, partly homestead, entered in 1879. Further down the stream at McAdow's is one "desert-land" tract of 140 acres, of which 300 are cultivated, and on which were raised in 1879 5,000 bushels of oats. This was entered in 1877. The fifth one is close by. It was entered in 1878, contains 480 acres, on 100 of which last year there were raised 3,000 bushels of oats and 1,000 bushels of potatoes, the latter selling quickly at two cents per pound. Statistics by the surveyor-general for 1884 gave the following figures:

" " " " acres	92,016,000
Number of acres exclusive of Indian and military reservations	61,442,000

It is too true that most people have a wrong impression of the character and prospects of the territory. To them it is a desert alkali plain, destitute of water and timber, barren of vegetation, and parched, during long summers, by a burning sun. Doubtless this picture of some portions of it is correct; but the announcement that it also contains many fertile valleys, watered by springs and streams which sparkle and tumble through prolific vegetation—that it has vast herds of cattle grazing in natural meadows and yielding rich returns to their owners—that it has forests of valuable woods as dense as any on the continent; and that its natural scenery is among the most beautiful in the world, may cause astonishment; yet all these things are literally and absolutely true. Hundreds of mines—gold, silver, copper—are in operation. Coal mining is fast entering the lists of great industries, iron mines await development; while many of the valleys of the land are settled by an intelligent, thrifty, industrious people, who find in both soil and climate all that for which they looked.

CHAPTER XVII.

BEAVERHEAD COUNTY.

THIS division of the territory derives its name from the curious rock formation near the mouth of the cañon, known as Beaverhead Rocks. These rocks form a perpendicular wall three hundred feet in height, forming a barrier against the waters of the Beaverhead river, as it sweeps around its base. It contains seams filled with beautiful crystals. On one side of the rocks are numerous hot springs, and the waters from each seem to contain different elements and properties. Their combined waters form a stream of considerable size. Four miles north, on the Big Hole River, is another collection of hot springs, which seem to find their origin in, and gush from, the same strata of rock. During the cold weather of winter, a dense fog or steam constantly rises from these warm waters, and they keep the adjacent ground so open and warm, that insects and snakes refuse to go into a winter home, and can be found enjoying life and activity at all times. Near Bannack is the Stalactite Cave. The area of the county is estimated at 4,230 square miles, and the population in 1880, 2,712. The revival of mining interests and the general development of the agricultural resources of the county within the last three years have tended to add largely to the population as well as to the wealth of this division of Montana. It contains some 40,000 head of cattle, worth $1,500,000; about 60,000 sheep, worth $200,000, and a large number of fine horses. Its total assessment approximates $3,000,000. Its principal mines are at Glendale and Lion City, and are owned by the Hecla company. They produce vast quantities of silver-lead and bullion.

In this county the political life of Montana was begun, and here also the first great flood of immigration found an introduction to the gold fields of the territory. Grasshopper or Williard Creek gold mines were discovered by John White July 28, 1862. Previous to this, however, there were many white men prospecting in the county, a few of whom made pretensions to being permanent settlers. It appears that in 1857 the late James Stuart, his brother Granville, and Rezin Anderson left the Pacific slope with a large party of excursionists for the old states. At the head of Malad creek a number of the excursionists left the party and turned north, when the trio of pioneers mentioned went into winter quarters, six miles below Brown's bridge on the Beaverhead, with Robert Dempsey, J. A. Le Claire and his family, Oliver Le Claire, Michel Le Claire, John McDonald, Robert Hereford, Thomas Adams, Jacob Meeks, L. Michot and David Morgan. The same winter, John F. Grant, James C. Grant, Richard Grant, Jr.; Thomas Pambrun, Robert Courtois, Antoine Pourriere, John Morgan, John Saunders, John W. Powell, Antoine Courtoi, Robert Hereford, John M. Jacobs, L. R. Maillet, D. Ross, the Delaware Indian—Jim Simonds, B. F. Ficklin, Edward Williamson, R. Anderson, Thomas Adams, Benetsee, the half-breed, were in quarters on the Stinkingwater, and these, with the party at Fort Owen and the fathers at St. Ignatius mission, were the only whites in what is now Montana. "In March," says Mr. Stuart, "the party started for Fort Bridger. At what is now Junction station, on the Corinne road, James and Granville Stuart and Rezin Anderson left the party and came to Gold creek, where they remained and prospected until June, getting good gold prospects—the first found in Montana. On June 1 they started to Fort Bridger, and went thence to Camp Floyd, south of Salt Lake, where they sold their horses. James and Granville went thence to Green river, and Anderson returned here with a stock of goods. The Stuarts wintered on Henry fork, and, with Dempsey, remained in that vicinity until the summer of 1860, when James and Granville Stuart came to Salt River valley, near the Oneida salt works, and that fall returned to Gold creek, built houses, and, during the summer of '61, prospected on Gold creek, and at other points along the Gold Creek mountains. So encouraging were the results that they wrote during the summer to Thomas Stuart, then in Colorado, and the letter being shown, the stampede to Montana began the following spring. Among the first party who arrived were Colonel Sam. McLean and Wash Stapleton; among the second party were Conrad Kohrs, Joseph Brown, of Big Hole, and David Jones, Rattlesnake; and among the third party W. B. Dance, King & Gillette, S. T. Hauser, Dr. McKel-lups and Joseph Underwood. Thus prominently figured James Stuart in inducing the first tide of immigration to Montana. In the fall of 1862, the Bannack diggings having been struck, James and Granville Stuart took a large band of cattle to that place, and remained there until April, '63, when James, at the head of fourteen men, among whom were James N. York, George Ives and A. S. Blake started on a most perilous and eventful prospecting trip into eastern Montana, traversing the three forks of the Yellowstone, the Rose Buds and Big Horn, on which latter river, near its mouth, they were attacked in the night by Crow Indians, three of the party being killed and four wounded, the survivors traveling thence by night until they reached the old emigrant road, near Rocky ridge, whence they returned to Bannack. In the fall of '63 W. B. Dance and James Stuart formed the copartnership of Dance & Stewart, in Virginia, remaining there until '65, when they removed to Deer Lodge, and associated with Worden & Higgins. The firm of Dance & Stuart dissolved in 1870. From 1866 to 1870 James Stuart was president and general superintendent of the S. L. and M. M. Co., operating at Phillipsburg. In 1871 he was appointed post-trader at Fort Browning, when he disposed of that interest, and accompanied A. J. Simmons, of the Sioux agency at Fort Peck, where his knowledge of Indian character was of the greatest service. Mr. Stuart was representative of Deer Lodge county in the Legislature of 1864, and was one of the first American pioneers of the territory. (Vide New Northwest, October 11, 1873.)

The settlers of Bannack in 1862-3, including those who arrived with Woodmansee's train, September 8, 1862, were W. S. Arnold, John Ault, Hosea Arnold, Henry Arnett, W. Arnett, James M. Davenport, Widow Catharine Durgan, Mrs. Frank Ray, Mrs. Short, Widow Hewins, Mrs. Tilley, Mrs. Meredith, Mrs. Susan Peabody, Mrs. James Harby, Mrs. G. Kuster, Mrs. F. LeGraw (Countess).

The first settlers at Big Hole, 1862–3, were Fred. H. Burr, James Conlan, Louis D. Erwin and James M. Minesinger. The foregoing names, with few exceptions, are taken from the list published by the Montana Historical Society, so also is the following tragic record of early settlement: W. H. Bell died November 12, 1862, being the first death at Bannack. George Edwards, murdered by road agents, in January, 1863. Ephraim Bostwick was killed on the Yellowstone in the manner related in the history of the expedition of 1863. Four years later John M. Bozeman was killed in the Yellowstone valley by Snakes or Sioux. John Barnett Smith, Thomas Fallon, Joseph Brown, Joseph Corrigan, William Mitchell, were killed in March, 1863, by Indians, on Salmon river. Louis Cossette, killed by road agent Reeves in January, 1863. N. W. Burriss was killed by Blackfeet at the mouth of the Marias river, in 1865. George M. Carhart was killed by road agents in 1863. Jack Cleveland, killed by Plummer, in December, 1862. George Copley was killed in an attempt to arrest a road agent, in 1864. H. T. Geery died on Big Horn, in May, 1863. See history. Big Gwin was killed on the Missouri, in 1863. Charles Guy was murdered on Red Rock creek, in November, 1862. Peter Herron, executed at Bannack, August 25, 1863. William Graves was executed at Fort Owen, in 1864. Fox and Bull killed Arnett at Gold creek, in July, 1862. William Hunter, executed near Gallatin City, in February, 1864. George Ives, executed at Nevada City, December 21, 1863. Lawrence Keeley, murdered by Peter Herron, in 1863. John Kritze, killed in a cave at Alder gulch, in 1864. Jason Lace, followed by avengers, and shot at Salt Lake, in 1863, for the murder of Bill Button. Haze Lyon, executed at Virginia City, in January, 1864. Frank Parrish, executed at Virginia City, in January, 1864. L. F. Richie, accidentally shot, in 1863. Daniel Phillips, murdered with Magruder's party, in 1864. Henry Plummer, sheriff of Beaverhead, and chief of road agents, executed at Virginia City by Vigilantes. George Shears and Cyrus Skinner, executed at Hell Gate, in 1864. It is believed that there are not over seventy of the pioneers of 1862 residing in Montana now. They are scattered over the Territory. The following is a list of the pioneers of 1862 who are living in Beaverhead county at the present time, and who reached the Bannack gold diggings in the fall and summer of 1862: Joseph A. Browne, Gus F. Graeter, George M. Brown, Con Bray, James Harby, Wilson Wadams, Adam Fink, John Sutherland, E. Smith Ball, Wm. G. Emerick, James Mansfield, Phil Lovel, H. S. Pond, David Courtois, John C. Innis, John Pascoe, Andrew Barber, A. H. Odell, Wm. Roe, John R. Wilson.

Selway Reminiscences.—Owing to the general character of a portion of the Selway personal history, the following is detached from the family history, and introduced here as a part of the record of settlement. Many other sketches to be found in the chapters devoted to personal history and reminiscences are equally instructive. In the spring of 1863, James Selway, accompanied by Philip Thorpe, came to the Territory, and engaged in mining in the far famed Alder gulch (Virginia City) with Mr. Thorpe, returned the following fall for his family and in the spring of 1864 organized a company consisting of his wife and three children; Robert Lovel and wife, Mrs. Eliza Selway, aged fifty-seven, and her sons, Thomas M., aged twenty-two, Robert H., aged twenty, and her daughters, Ada E., aged twenty-nine, and Annie B., aged eighteen; Wm. D. Fox, J. M. Sweeney, Thomas Lovel, Fred and Charles Blackwell, and Mrs. Blackwell, their mother; George Bliss, Bob Strong, E. Perkins, A. Bottsford, and Dave Phratt, were the original party. On arriving in the Indian country this company was greatly increased until it numbered some seventy-five wagons drawn by cattle—except two wagons by mules and horses, and about ninety men besides women and children. "Even with this large company," says Mr. Selway, "several of our boys thought we were just a little too small and sighed for home, as the gentle savages, swarmed around us. Many a mound we passed bearing the words on a pine board, 'Killed by Indians,' then followed the name, age and time. One from our party went to appease the Red man's wrath—poor Hanscome, from La Crosse. We buried him there in our corral at daybreak." James Selway had in the meantime purchased a squatter's right for the location on which he now resides, for about twenty-five dollars. On reaching Beaverhead valley, in September, 1864, the Selway family, including Joseph Selway, immediately settled on the same; Thorpe and family going to Gallatin valley, and the rest to various mining camps. The improvements on the claim consisted of a commodious log cabin with stone fire-place and holes for a window and door.

This cabin, occupied by the Selway family, was the first one built in this part of Beaver Head valley, and Mrs. Selway and her daughters were the first white female residents. In those days, when hotels there were none and houses were so few, many a tired traveler had cause to bless "Grandma" Selway's generous hospitality. In 1863 Frank Jacobs and Henry Hayman put in a small patch of potatoes adjoining the Selway place, spading the ground, and realized a good crop. The following season Selway brothers put in about eight acres and realized an abundant yield. They got their seed in Gallatin valley at thirty-one cents per pound. They disposed of their crop at Bannack at eighteen cents per pound, gold dust. They also put in seven acres of barley and oats with very fair success. It sold for twenty-eight cents per pound. In 1866 J. M. Selway and W. D. Fox started a farm on Black Tail Deer creek, putting in a crop of potatoes and small grains. The first white child born in the district was Henry Woods, October 10, 1869: the second, Carrie Carter, born November 10, 1869. The first stock was brought into the valley by Mrs. Selway, consisting of nine cows and six oxen, and three brood mares by the Selway brothers. The first shingle-roofed house was that of Mrs. James Selway in 1866. Mr. Stone and family settled at the lower end of the valley in 1865. The first funeral was that of Mrs. Eliza Selway, aged sixty-three years. The first religious service was held at the Selway house by a Baptist minister, in August, 1865. The first road supervisor was W. B. Carter, in 1869, his district embracing half of Beaverhead valley. (Vide also Stuart's reminiscences, Deer Lodge Hist.) Organic.—The county was established in 1863 by the first legislature of Idaho, and the first elections held therein October 30, 1863. George Chrisman, A. F. Smith and Elijah Moore were elected county commissioners. The first meeting of the board was held at Bannack City April 4, 1864, when George Chrisman was chosen chairman and J. M. Galloway justice of the peace, to fill vacancy caused by one of the justices elected failing to act. At that meeting the Lutzi building was rented for the use of the county officers, at $125 per month, payable in county orders. The organic act of the Montana Legislature, approved February 2, 1865, decreed "That all that portion of Montana Territory embraced within the following boundaries be known as Beaverhead county, to wit: Commencing at a point where the one hundred and twelfth meridian of longitude intersects or crosses the Big Hole river, thence south along said meridian to the boundary of the territory, thence along the boundary of said territory to the southern boundary of Missoula county, thence along the boundary of Missoula county to the southern boundary of Deer Lodge county, thence along the southern boundary of Deer Lodge county to the place of beginning; and the county seat of said Beaverhead county is hereby located at Bannack City." The boundaries mentioned were subsequently subjected to changes, the most important of which was the addition of that portion of the southern belt ceded by the general government to the new territory and detached from Dakota.

The proposition to remove the county seat of Beaverhead county from Bannack to Dillon was carried by a majority of 170 in May, 1881, and the offices of the county were removed to the newly-established seat of justice, where a substantial frame building two stories in height is occupied.

The county clerks of Beaverhead since 1864 are named as follows: A. W. Hall, 1864; L. A. Gridley, 1865; B. S. Peabody, 1866–7; J. H. Larwett, 1867–8; R. T. Ming, 1869; Wm. Peck, 1870–5; J. W. Earl, 1875–7. J. W. Earl resigned in 1877, when A. E. Graetor was appointed, and he served until Phil. D. McGough took possession of the office, after the elections of 1882. The notorious Plummer was sheriff of this county. The present officers are named as follows: Sheriff, Thos. E. Jones; Clerk and Recorder, Phil. D. McGough; Treasurer, Robert T. Wing; Probate Judge, Christian Mead; Commissioners, Phil. Lovell, O. W. W. Rote, G. M. Brown; Assessor, D. F. Reinhardt; Superintendent of Schools, John Gannon; Public Administrator, H. J. Sweet; Coroner, Dr. H. D. Pickman; Surveyor, J. C. Poindexter.

Equalization and Taxation.—The equalized assessment and amount of tax collected annually from 1867 to 1882 are given in the following table:

Year.	Total Ass'm'nt.	Ter. Tax.	License.	Year.	Total Assessment.	License
1867–8	$453,608	$791.38	$1,199 60	1877	$843,182	$2,851 78
1869–70	406,099	.....	2,615 85	1878	977,990	3,279 20
1871	569,378	.....	2,113 98	1879	1,029,596	4,753 85
1873	519,865	.....	2,272 02	1880	1,470,084	5,425 58
1874	547,954	.....	1,944 31	1881	1,763,877	6,329 53
1875	631,981	.....	2,294 05	1882	1,793,591	6,008 37

The returns for 1884 show an aggregate of $2,617,694, on which property owners pay thirteen mills only to run the public affairs of the county, support public schools, etc. Of this assessment we note the following interesting items: On their seventy-eight miles of road in the county, the Utah and Northern is assessed $276,129, or a little over one-tenth the whole. The Hecla Mining and Smelting Company pays tax on a greater amount, or $278,324. Poindexter & Orr, owners of stock and ranch, are assessed $102,536, and several other men are assessed as high as $45,000 on stock and ranches. These three interests thus represented indicate where most of the wealth of the county is found. No footings are made of the number of various kinds of stock. Horses are valued at about $40 each, cattle $20 and sheep about $3. Returns show assessments on horses, $363,007; cattle, $497,645; and sheep, $116,950, giving a total of $977,605.

The growth of the county is shown by an increase of about 25 per cent. in the amount of assessment in 1883 over 1882 and of over 20 per cent. in 1884 as compared with 1883. The healthy condition of the finances of the county is shown in the fact that on March 1, 1884, there was outstanding warrants amounting to only $4,924.81, and a total indebtedness of only $17,711.20, part of which has since been met.

Schools.—The condition of the schools of the county at the beginning of the year 1883 is shown in the following report by Superintendent J. Gannon: Number of organized districts, 10; number of white persons between 4 and 21, 586; number of pupils attending school during the year, 371; number attending private schools, 12; number not attending school, 215; number of male teachers employed, 3; number of female teachers employed, 10; total number of teachers, 13; average length of school in days, 107; number of frame school houses, 3; number of log school houses, 6; number of graded schools, 2; number of ungraded schools, 7; total number of schools, 9; rate of county tax for school purposes in mills, 3; amount per capita for school census children, $9.11; amount raised by county tax for schools, $5,027.64; total amount from all sources apportioned during the year, $5,342.92. At the date of this report there were no brick buildings devoted to educational purposes, but a $13,000 structure was in course of erection at Dillon; nor were there any African children reported in the census enumerator's returns.

Mines and Mining.—The sixteen mines of Beaverhead county produced in 1880, according to the census returns, $729,608 in silver and $19,750 in gold; in 1881 the total product of gold, silver and base metals was valued at $950,000, while in 1882 the value was over $1,000,000. Copper and iron ore are found in the Birch Creek mountains, and along the ranges skirting Beaverhead and Red Rock valleys are newly found veins of quartz producing very satisfactory assays. Coal is found on Medicine Lodge creek, in the southern part of the county, that burns well and sells at a remunerative price. Jeff. Davis gulch, at the head of Horse Prairie creek, has yielded large quantities of placer gold of good quality, and those, as well as the placers at Bannack, are still worked.—(Vide Chapter on Mines.)

The review of mining interests in Montana for 1882, prepared by John W. Eddy, under the direction of R. B. Harrison, and published in Director of the Mint Burchard's report for 1882, is the best official information on the subject. This report is historical as well as statistical in its dealings with Beaverhead county.

The Argenta district is, next to Bannack, the oldest quartz camp in Montana Territory. The first smelter erected in the Territory was built at this point by the Saint Louis and Montana Mining Company, of which S. T. Hauser, now the president of the First National Bank of Helena, was at the head. During the past season E. Ball has picked up little lots of ore from the dumps of the various mines and made about a thirty days' run with the old Tootle furnace, and produced about 40 tons of lead bullion, which carried 200 ounces of silver to the ton and some gold. One shipment of about 200 tons of ore, taken from the Legal Tender mine by C. Bray, was made recently, which sampled 200 ounces silver to the ton and 67 per cent. lead. The number of ounces of silver produced from all sources in this district last year was about 15,000, and of lead about 70 tons. Gold from W. Ravesscroft's placer, $2,000. The ores of this district are soft, and, as a rule, belong to the class known as smelting ores, and the work lately done there has been successful and profitable to the parties interested.

Bannack district, like the Argents, has been worked to little purpose except to make tests and examinations of mines with reference to future sales and transfers. There are probably more mines now under bond in Beaver Head county than in any other county of Montana, and it is believed that many sales will be made on or before the opening of another season. The 6-stamp mill on Grasshopper Creek is the only one of any kind in Bannack, although there are locations almost numberless in that locality, and many of them are acknowledged to be exceedingly valuable properties. Rattlesnake Gulch has been mined during the past season, and probably not less than $35,000 of gold realized. Some work has been done in the old Rochester district, also on Camp Creek, where about $5,000 came from the placers. Moose Creek, Fish Creek and Highland Gulch have done nearly as well as during the previous season, and may be credited with $12,000 gold.

Blue Wing district, near the Bannack, is in much the same condition as at the opening of the season. Titles have been secured to the waiting properties, and some have been developed to such an extent as in some to give good assurance of value and permanency, but until reduction works are secured this region will be comparatively quiet. The Only Chance Mining Company of New York have a Huntington mill, a steam hoist, and such appliances as were considered requisite for the treatment of the ores of their Only Chance mine, of Red Mountain, but the results have not been as good as were expected. Large expenditures have been made, considerable of which were at least injudicious. The mine is deep, and located on a high mountain, and as it was determined to place the mill on the mine, water had to be brought in pipes a very long distance. The Hecla Consolidated Mining Company of Glendale has been one of the most successfully operated companies in the Territory. Their mines display an almost incalculable quantity of ore, and their works are kept in operation to their full capacity. The plant has been established on a basis of economic working rarely found, and results prove it to be one of the best within our borders. The gross product of this company for the first nine months of 1882 was $694,200, or over $900,000 for the year, which represented about 500,000 ounces of fine silver, besides the lead and copper. Monthly dividends of one per cent. on its capital stock of $1,500,000 have been paid during six or seven months of the year. The Nevins mine has been worked on a lease, with about the usual results. Outside of the placers of this county there has been some increase in the product of precious metals during the past year, but the grand total for the county cannot be placed above $700,000, although the yield for last year was stated at $950,000, exclusive of lead and copper in the bullion.

Since this report was made in 1883, the Argenta and Blue Wing districts have become great producers of precious metals. In one—the "Blue Wing"—two men who bonded it in December, 1884, for $10,000, and went up there to work, had taken out enough to pay the amount of their bond on May 1, 1815, by July 1, 1885, when it becomes due, and will not have less than ten or twelve thousand dollars beside. They expect to clear $35,000 this year. Their names are Hayes & Ewing, and the mine was bonded to them by O'Leary & Gallagher. Oscar Vogel and David Neagle bonded the Mono mine from D. B. Mason and Mike Steele for $20,000, and intend working the mine vigorously at once. Among other mining transactions, it was stated that Patrick Kelly had sold his Gibbonville placer claim, and had about consummated the sale of some quartz interests at Argenta to London parties. On the new mines at "Old Baldy," Garrett & Dement, Cochran Bros., and Chase Bros. have very promising claims. The Argenta mines contain large bodies of low grade ore, and the erection of proper process works would, it is believed, make them productive. The New Departure silver mine, situate on the Beaverhead, within nine miles of Dillon, was developed by Professor Clayton in 1883. The vein varies from ten to fifteen feet in thickness, and the ore, which is free milling, will average seventy ounces silver. The first shipment of fifty tons selected ores, sent to Eastern reduction works for treatment, yielded $250 a ton net. A rich body of ore was struck in the Atlanta mine, Glendale, December, 1882, which for richness surpasses anything heretofore discovered. This find was made in a crevice or rather huge cavern.

In the Bannack and Marysville section, Shenon's six-stamp gold mill has been thoroughly overhauled and is making a successful run on free-milling quartz taken from the Pioneer mine. The amount of quartz on the dump of the mine is estimated at three hundred tons, and in the mine there is, seemingly, an inexaustible supply of the same grade of quartz. This quartz is soft and its easy extraction and rapid reduction insures a margin of profit on each ton crushed. The Shenon Tunnel is being driven ahead to tap the Bannack lode. The tunnel is as straight as an arrow; and has been advanced over five hundred feet. One hundred and fifty feet more of tunnel will have to be driven before the immense ore-vein of the Bannack mine is penetrated. On the Cahart property, old Dakota lode, efforts were made in May, 1885, to hoist the water out of the deep shaft.

Placer mining in the district is confined to a few old timers, who, at times, toil without recompense, and whose sands of life may run out without their striking it rich. The unworked bed of Grasshopper Creek is an inviting field for the prospector. The bed-rock of the creek is rich, but owing to its great depth it is expensive and difficult to work. Yank Williams & Co. are opening the creek at a favorable location for pay. In the lower part of the district Joe Harris and J. E. Williams are engaged in placer mining with fair results. In December, 1884, August Anderson, of Butte, discovered what are now known as the Berlin mines; four miles north of Melrose, west of the Big Hole, among the foot hills. Some samples of the rock assayed in proportion to $80,000 per ton.

Reports from the Blue Wing district, up to June 1, 1885, credit the locality with greater activity now than at any time since the discovery of mines there. The Blue Wing mine, under bond by S. H. Hayes & Co., is a bonanza of high-grade ore. The mine is opened by a tunnel which taps the vein seventy-five feet from the surface. An incline shaft has been dropped down one hundred and fifty feet. This shaft, for its entire depth, followed a rich ore vein, ranging from two to six feet in thickness. The mine is under the superintendency of Tom Hamilton, a practical and experienced miner. With a force of twenty-two men the daily ore-output is from seven to eight tons. The ore assays from $200 to $700 per ton. Since Hayes & Co. have been working the Blue Wing mine over two hundred and fifty tons of first-class ore have been extracted. Hayes & Co. are also working the Kent and Whopper mines and are taking out paying ore. A drift is being run on the Whopper mine for the purpose of opening it. Active operations have been resumed on the Ruby mine by the owners, Messrs. Trask, Graves & White. The only steam hoist in the district is in position on this property. A double-compartment main shaft has been dropped to a depth of one hundred and thirty feet. On the Delmonte mine Sears & Roe are working a force of men. On the dump thirty tons of first-class ore is piled up, which will probably be increased to fifty tons. The main shaft has been sunk to a depth of two hundred and thirty feet. Stoping is going on at the one hundred and twenty foot level. Frank Williams & Co. are working the Bismarck mine, under a lease from L. C. Fyhrie. It is an ore-producer at present and has been in the past a productive mine. A good-sized dump pile of 200-ounce ore has been taken from the mine during the past winter. The Bismarck is among the developed mines of the district. The Charter Oak mine, owned and worked by M. S. Herr, has produced considerable high-grade ore during the winter. The mine has been opened, by a main shaft, to a depth of 160 feet. Zook, Robinson & Mathews, owners of the Silver Rose mine, are doing developing work. Renois & Co. are opening the Czar mine. This mine has yielded considerable shipping ore in past years. X. Renois is at work on the old Sibley mine, with good prospects. On the Huron mine Lamb Bros. are making a new opening. The New Departure mine, owned and operated by Judge Brown, is the most extensively opened up and developed mine in the Blue Wing District.

Reports from the Bald Mountain and Lost Cloud districts, up to June, 1885, give the following facts:—A. H. Odell has the Rothchild and other mines in the Bald Mountain district opened up in good shape. The Mono, a promising mine, owned by Steele & Mason, has been opened by a shaft to a depth of thirty-five feet. The mine has just been bonded to Nagle & Hogle, of Anaconda, for $20,000. The Lost Cloud mining district is situated about eighteen miles from Bannack, and joins the Bald Mountain district. The Lost Cloud mine, owned by Cochrane & Co., is developed by a tunnel about one hundred and forty feet in length, which cuts the vein at right angles, where it shows three feet of from 100 to 400-ounce silver ore. At a depth of eighty feet from the surface drifts have been run each way, showing a continuous ore-body. Next to the Lost Cloud is situated the Silver King mine, owned by the same company. It presents a fine showing of high-grade mineral. A tunnel is run to tap the vein at a depth of one hundred and fifty feet. The Polaris mine, located in the winter of 1884-5 by Dr. J. S. Meade, has a vein of high-grade ore fifteen inches in thickness. Garrett & Dement have a fine showing of gold and silver ore in their mine.

The latest reports from the Argenta district are brought down to May, 1885. The revival of mining enterprise as well as mining in the district marks a new era of progress for it. U. J. Schumacher's furnace was started in May with $20,000 worth of ore waiting, and enough available to keep the mines running. The recent discovery of Mr. Knapp, one-and-a-half miles from Argenta, promises to be one of the richest strikes ever made in the district. The surface showing is good and the ore assays well. Dr. Pickman and S. D. Beebe, of Dillon, are lucky partners in the new discovery. Developing work will be vigorously pushed on the property. On the old Ferdinand mine a force of miners, under the direction of A. J. Schumacher, have developed a good body of lead ore, which will be utilized at the furnace. The valuable mining property of James Mauldin, represented in this work, belongs to this district.

Con Bray is at work on the Legal Tender mine, driving a tunnel to tap the ore vein. Witter & Dudley's Dexter mine is yielding first-class ore. Ore from this mine, sampled at the furnace, runs one hundred and fifty ounces in silver to the ton. The mines of Scott & Galagher, consisting of the Woolley, Tilden and Florida, show a large amount of ore developed and awaiting extraction—a sufficient quantity to feed a furnace constantly. Smith Ball has moved to Argenta and resumed work on his mines. Many other mines in the district will be worked in the near future, such as the recent discoveries of free-milling gold ore between Bannack and Elkhorn, and the rich discoveries north of Bismarck.

In January, 1881, the Hecla company made an entire change in its management. The directors, at the reorganization, tendered the position of general manager to H. Knippenberg, of Indianapolis, who formally accepted the position March 1, 1881, with the understanding that he was to have full and entire charge of the business, both in the Territory and States. The new manager sold out his interests in the manufacturing business east, and established his headquarters at Glendale, arriving there in April, 1881. In the Territory the entire business was reorganized, placing the large enterprise in three departments, and appointing the three following able men as superintendents: Mining department, James Parfet, with headquarters at Hecla; reduction department, George G. Earle, Glendale; iron mine department, John M. Parfet, Norwood. Mr. Knippenberg brought with him from Indianapolis his old book-keeper, George B. Conway, whom he appointed cashier. At Glendale is located the company's smelter, containing two furnaces, one round and one square, where about 90 tons of mixture is smelted every twenty-four hours, consuming 3,200 bushels of charcoal, and giving a product of some ten of bullion daily. Besides the smelter, the company owns a large roaster, blacksmith shop, warehouse, sack-house, iron-house, stable, two powder houses, and three coal-sheds, office, brick assay office, and some five dwelling houses. The Hecla hospital is also located here, where the sick are taken care of without asking any aid from the county. This is in charge of Dr. Schmalhausen, is cared for and conducted by Mr. and Mrs. E. N. Reed in a model manner. The institution is kept scrupulously clean, and the patients receive kind attention and considerate treatment.

Greenwood was named by Mr. Knippenberg, and is located between Glendale and Hecla, some seven miles from Glendale. Here is located the big concentrator of the Hecla Company. No one can have any conception of the magnitude of this building without seeing it. Strength, convenience and economy seem to be the prominent features of the improvement. The capacity of the concentrator is 100 tons for every twenty-four hours, which will be reduced to about thirty-five tons. The company has now mined and stored about 50,000 tons of second-class ore. The narrow-gauge railroad runs from Hecla to the concentrator. The power is furnished by a water flume from Trapper, a half mile long and having a vertical fall of 200 feet. The machinery was furnished by the Fort Scott Machine Company, of Fort Scott, Kansas. The company here owns one boarding house, four dwellings, office, stable, and blacksmith shop.

DILLON.

The county seat of Beaverhead is situated at the confluence of Blacktail Deer and Red Rock creeks, on the headwaters of the Beaverhead river. Its existence dates back to the fall of 1879, when the U. & N. R. R. was completed to this point (September 16), and a canvas town erected. Within a few weeks after the first locomotive steamed into the railroaders' camp, the town of Dillon was surveyed, the canvas tents gave place to frame structures of a most humble character, and the beginnings of a prosperous little city were accomplished. The progress of the village for the last two years is reviewed in Mr. Willson's Wayside Gleanings. He describes the village as it was in the fall of 1883 thus: "No one had an idea that the town would be permanent, the prevailing opinion being that while the railroad remained, while the place continued a shipping point for Helena, Bozeman, Butte and Virginia City, some business would be done, but as soon as the road moved on the town would move with it. The road was constructed to Butte, but to the surprise of many, and despite the popular verdict, Dillon still remained at her original anchorage. Bozeman and Virginia City freighters still rolled in their trains, however, and it was then predicted that when the Northern Pacific reached the former city, Dillon must evaporate into thin air. Bozeman at length found herself in direct railroad communication with the East, but still this obstinate town refused to diminish or grow beautifully less. I confess to have been numbered among those of little faith concerning Dillon's future, for why a town should spring up in a locality which had been settled many years and never supported a mercantile house carrying a $50,000 stock was not easily understood. After an absence of two years I again found myself within its limits, and with infinite surprise discovered that business had steadily increased; that the streets were full of bustle, and the people well charged with energy, snap and ambition. A large percentage of the flimsy structures originally in use have disappeared and in their stead many costly blocks, both brick and frame, have risen. Handsome dwellings, surrounded by spacious door yards, in which green lawns and fragrant flower beds attract the eye and delight the senses, give to the place an air of age and stability, despite its tender years. The first immigrants of the territory passed by where Dillon now stands, crossed the Beaverhead at a ford between Robert and James Selway's—an old landmark yet remains—a cottonwood tree with three trunks called the Three Devils. The Selways built a bridge and gave it to the county after a few years. The population of Dillon is now estimated at 1,600.

Societies.—Dillon Lodge No. 6, I. O. G. T., was organized November 22, 1882, with thirteen members, named as follows: Thomas Longenger, Charles Shively, H. C. Wallard, H. Snyder, John Shively, E. Caffin, E. H. Brundage, B. Peacock, J. P. Longenger, H. Brundage, J. R. Wilson, C. P. Slayton and W. J. Sears.

Occidental Lodge, No. 8, K. of P., Dillon, was organized in August, 1883, with seventeen charter members.

School, College and Churches.—The school-house erected in 1883, the Methodist College, the Court House, the Presbyterian and Protestant Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal and Baptist Church buildings form the public buildings of the town. The first religious service held in the town was that by Rev. W. W. Van Orsdale and F. A. Rickett, in a tent belonging to Sebree, Ferris & White, Mr. Rickett preaching the first sermon.—(Vide General History.)

The location of the Methodist Episcopal College at Dillon was decided upon in April, 1885, when the College Committee—Rev. F. A. Riggin, Rev. G. Comfort, Rev. Hugh Duncan, Rev. W. W. Van Orsdale and Rev. H. J. Norris—discussed the subject fully. At this meeting the following named members were elected trustees of the new college: P. H. Poindexter, B. F. White, J. R. Selway, William Smith, N. L. Andrews, of Salmon City, Idaho; Hugh Duncan, of Sheridan; F. A. Riggin, of Fish creek; David Lamont and H. J. Norris. Dillon contributed $15,000 towards this project.

The proposed new Baptist church, the ground for which has been purchased, will be small but comfortable place of worship, costing about $1,500. This was commenced in June, 1885.

Organization of Dillon.—The act of the legislature, approved March 12, 1885, authorized organization as the town of Dillon within the following boundaries: "Beginning at the point of intersection of the center of Bannack street with the center of the main track of the Utah and Northern Railroad, and running thence with said railroad south-westerly one-half of a mile to a point in the center of said railroad track; thence at right angle with the main railroad track, and in a south-easterly direction, one-half mile; thence on a line parallel with the Utah and Northern Railroad, in a north-easterly direction, one mile; thence north-westerly, and at right angle with said railroad, one mile; thence south-westerly, and parallel with said road where it passes through the city of Dillon, one mile; thence south-easterly, and at right angle with said railroad, one-half a mile, to the center of said railroad, the place of commencing of said boundary." The commissioners named in the act were Joseph B. Crow, Benjamin F. White, L. C. Fyhrie, G. W. Dart, C. L. Thomsen. Those commissioners called a meeting of the people for June 1, 1885, to elect officers, and made the following appointments: "Polls will be opened and closed as in other elections, and will be held in the First Ward at the Court House; judges of election, Phil. D. McGough, W. C. Orr, Henry Burfeind; clerks, Frank Conyne, A. D. Drummond. Second Ward, at the Pavilion; judges of election, Adolph Eliel, Richard Deacon, Ed. Marlow; clerks, Chas. Hirschman, L. M. Todd. Third Ward, at Smith & Melton's office: judges of election, H. J. Sweet, J. G. Metlen, Christian Mead; clerks, I. Cashmore, Tom Poindexter, Jr." The election was duly held, when the following-named officers were chosen: B. F. White, mayor; J. R. Holden, police magistrate; A. C. Hill, marshal; H. R. Melton, city attorney; Phil. D. McGough, city clerk; Adolph Eliel, treasurer and assessor; W. T. Holcomb, street commissioner. Councilmen: First Ward, Henry Burfeind and David Lamont; Second Ward, G. W. Dart and Richard Deacon; Third Ward, A. S. Rife and T. W. Poindexter.

Banks and Business.—The First National Bank of Dillon, referred to in the history of Gallatin county, is controlled by the following-named board of directors: Howard Sebree, president; Henry Burfeind, vice-president; B. F. White, cashier; Otho Klemm, assistant cashier; Geo. L. Shoup, Leonard Eliel, Henry Knippenberg, John C. Brenner, E. F. Ferris, directors. The authorized capital is $200,000, of which a sum of $50,000 is paid in, with surplus and profits amounting to $15,000.

The business circle of the town in 1884–5 is made up as follows: W. S. Barbour, W. F. Kirkwood, R. B. Smith, lawyers; S. D. Beebe, telegraph and express agent; H. D. Pickman and J. E. Clutter, physicians; S. R. Wagoner, dentist; R. J. Boddys, Murry & Readicker, Kline & Callahan, meat markets; Flynn Bros., Poindexter & Orr, and J. S. Wilson, live stock growers and dealers; H. Cushing, oil warehouse; Brainerd & Parke, Dunham & Deacon, B. F. Froman, C. Hirschman, E. J. Nelson, N. A. Stiles, saloonkeepers; E. W. Butts, H. Stuart, furniture and carpentry; Green & Walters, lumber; H. Brundage, job printer; F. E. Foote, editor Dillon Tribune; Mrs. T. Colson, restaurant; D. Leyson, Corinne Hotel;

H. M. Cushing, barber; Lee Quong, laundry; G. W. Dart, L. C. Fyhrie & Co., Sebree, Ferris & White, hardware; Mrs. Dingley, Mrs. L. E. Hanson, millinery and dress; E. Leonard, dry-goods; McCunes, brick factory; C. Holcomb, painter; Kirkpatrick Bros., L. C. Fyhrie & Co., T. W. Poindexter, general stores; Mrs. L. Kupfer, jewelry; Ed. Marlow, livery; C. L. Miller, W. J. Sear, J. C. Orne, blacksmith; Montana Lum. & Pro. Co.; C. Norton, J. P. Galsman, bakers; G. H. Savage, wagonmaker; Thomsen & Blevin, fruits and groceries, and C. L. Thomsen, grocer; Halliday & Co., general store; Ditmer & Morrison, liquors. A. D. Drummond was then Protestant Episcopal minister, N. Norris, M.E. Church, John T. Yoe, postmaster.

BANNACK CITY.

This village of the present day was the leading city of eastern Idaho in 1862, the capital of the territory from its organization to the removal of the seat of government to Virginia in 1865, and the seat of justice for the old county of Beaverhead down to a recent day. Willard or Grasshopper creek, though a few miles below Bannack, may be credited with the honor of being the beginning of the first city of the territory. The Grasshopper mines were discovered July 28, 1862, by John White; the Grasshopper Creek District was organized a few days later, and the record of John White's claim was made August 30, 1862, by Recorder R. T. Harris in the following words: "John White has recorded one discovery claim, known as the First Discovery on Grasshopper creek; said claim is situated at a point known as the Cedar Tree point."

During the fall months of 1862 rich mines were discovered and claims recorded ten miles farther up Upper Grasshopper creek, and the town of Bannack located. The new town attracted numbers of miners, and with those sons of industry came many of those hard characters whose names are surrounded with all the infamy which belongs to robbers and murderers, and whose crimes roused to action the true men of pioneer days. Good, bad and indifferent men and women formed the population of the magic city of 1862; but, withal, from it went forth the new discoverers, who opened new gold fields, built new towns, and effected the first true development of the wonderful country in which they found themselves. Who in the West has not heard or read of the Yellowstone expedition of 1863? Those prospectors from Bannack City had been to the Yellowstone river and Big Horn mountains, where they met with hostile Indians, who finally drove them back. The party divided, some going south toward Salt Lake City, and the remainder returning to Bannack. On reaching Alder creek the latter stopped for dinner, and, while the remainder were preparing the meal, William Fairweather panned out a little of the gravel. The first panful yielded thirty cents, and subsequent ones two dollars. As soon as this discovery became known there was an immediate stampede to Alder gulch from all parts of the Territory, and a little later from all parts of the country. Bannack was deserted for the newer gold fields of Madison, and fell as suddenly as it rose.

According to Colonel Sanders, Willard's creek, which runs through Bannack, was named after Alexander Willard. In 1862 Charles Rumley, not knowing the stream had before then received a name, christened it Grasshopper creek, from the large numbers of that insect found upon its banks. When it had been identified as the Willard creek of Lewis and Clarke, the vanity and effrontery of J. S. Willard, then living at Bannack, so offended the denizens of that town that the stream is known as "the Grasshopper" to this day. (Vide Reminiscences of L. P. Smith, W. B. Dance, Silver Bow Hist.)

Read in the general history tragedy after tragedy, see record of first settlers of this county, the names of miscreants and their victims, and then consider what true citizenship had to contend against. Organized villiany for a time ruled here, and ruffians, who held human life in the same estimation as the hunter does that of the mountain lion, were the actual administrators of Idaho laws. It was a terrible regime, and terrible and just was the revolution which ended the reign of those citizen tyrants. Here the Secret Tribunal was conceived, and from this village went forth the avengers to free the country of the sanguinary road agents. Succeeding the conquest of Sheriff Plummer's agents, enterprise revived and a determined effort was made to win back the commercial importance of Bannack. The effort, though successful, was only temporary in its effects. Sidney Edgerton made the place his home September 17, 1863; here the seat of government was established in 1864, the courts organized October 20, and the first legislature convened December 12, that year. A saw mill, the first in the mining regions, was erected in December, 1862, and was now in full operation; in 1863, other mills for the reduction of ore were constructed, but with all its enterprise—all the efforts made for retaining its commercial and its political ascendancy, the Capital of 1864–5 could not withstand the assaults made upon it by the citizens of the new gold-diggings. James Kirkpatrick, himself an old settler, says: "Several new mining camps were in 1863 added to the list, and one in Alder gulch, for richness and extent, eclipsed the Grasshopper mines. These new discoveries attracted many of the gold-hunters, and diverted travel so that Bannack, in the fall of that year, took a second rank among the important mining camps of the Territory, although still yielding gold in large paying quantities. During the fall and winter of 1863 gold-bearing quartz was found in large bodies among the hills near Bannack, and a small stamp mill, run by water power, gave results that led to the introduction, at an enormous expense, of larger and improved machinery run by steam. Prospecting for quartz received much attention, and a goodly number of defined ledges gave assurance of a permanent future to the young town. Many of these rich finds were made by experienced miners, or 'pilgrims,' as the first settlers called them, the quartz being of a character so new to Colorado and California miners that their experience seemed to avail nothing."

Business.—The population of Bannack District, in 1879, was estimated at 700. According to the census returns of 1880, the number of citizens in the village was 232. Business and the professions were represented as follows: C. Bowman, carpenter; J. Carhailt, quartz mill; Dempsey & Co., general merchandise; George Dart, hardware; Mrs. K. C. Dunlap, druggist; Misses Mary and Maggie Dowling, dress making; James Ferster, carpenter; F. L. Graves and James Harby, brewery and saloon; * C. Mead, attorney-at-law; Isaac Paitras, blacksmith; Isaac Ross & Bro., bankers; * H Renois, carpenter; Steger & Russell, hotel and saloon; Geo. Savage, wagon maker; Phil. Shenon, milling and mining; * C. W. Turner, attorney-at-law; Trask & Graves, general merchandise; A. F. Wright, general merchandise; Thomas Watson, postmaster; * Wright & Gray, meat and liquors; * Dr. J. S. Meade, assayer.*

It is claimed that Woods (colored), who came with Hugh O'Neil's train, and arrived at Bannack April 20, 1863, preached the first sermon there. The village now boasts of Protestant Episcopal and Methodist Episcopal churches. (Vide Church History).

Societies.—The first meeting of Masons held in the jurisdiction of Montana for the purpose of organizing a lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, was held in Bannack in the winter of 1862–3. They met in a little old log cabin on Grasshopper creek just back of Jack Oliver's old express office. There were present C. L. Payne, of Illinois; Dr. Hoyt, of Red Wing, Minn.; A. Fall, of Kansas; N. P. Langford, of Minnesota; and Brothers Copley, Geary and Bostick, whose initials, and whose previous residence are unknown to the writer; and one or two others whose names cannot be recalled. They applied to the Grand Lodge of A. F. and A. M., of Nebraska, for a charter or dispensation. It was not granted. C. L. Payne is at present a member of Morning Star Lodge, No. 5, of Helena, Montana. Dr. Hoyt returned to Red Wing, Minn. Copley, while acting as deputy sheriff, was killed in Bannack in the spring of 1863 by a Spaniard, whom he was attempting to arrest for murder. The miners of Grasshopper creek put a rope around the Spaniard's neck and dragged him up and down the streets of Bannack until he was dead. Brother Copley was buried near Bannack. Geary was shot by the Indians while on a prospecting trip near the head waters of Wind river, in company with Jim Stuart, Brother Bostick, and others. Knowing that he could not live long, shot and killed himself, in order that his companions might escape from the Indians with their lives. He was buried on a small stream, tributary Snake river, near where he was shot. A. Fall was afterwards a member of Helena Lodge, No. 3, of Helena, Montana. He died at Lyons City, October 29, 1881, and was buried at Glendale, Beaverhead county, Montana. Bostick was shot and killed by Indians in the summer of 1864, while on a "revenge trip," as they termed it, through the Wind river mountains, in company with James Stuart and others—his companions fleeing for their lives.

Bannack Lodge, No. 16, A. F. & A. M., was chartered October 3, 1871. The Past Masters are Christian Mead, George M. Brown, P. J. Kelly, G. W. Dart, A. F. Graster, E. M. Trask, F. L. Graves, P. J. G. W., A. H. Odell.

* Signifies names of business men at Bannack in 1864-5.

The Master Masons in 1882 were Geo. L. Batchelder, Charles L. Bishop, John Carhart, I. W. Crary, J. B. Crow, Jacob B. Crum, James S. Ferster, Al. E. Graeter, Michael S. Herr, James Harby, E. D. Leavitt, Rufus Matthews, D. E. Metlin, Tom Merritt, Phil. Lovell, William C. Orr, Isaac Paitras, P. H. Poindexter, J. Shineberger, J. C. Steger, Nat. H. Wood.

Bannack Chief Lodge, I. O. G. T., was founded January 3, 1870, with thirty-nine members. J. B. Crow was elected Lodge Deputy. Charter forfeited 1874.

Hope Lodge, No. 19, I. O. G. T., was organized by Clark Wright, November 12, 1877, with Joseph Longbridge, L. D. Ceased work in 1879.

is a modern town, although as a mining camp it is cotemporary with the Trapper mining camps. Up to the summer of 1879 there was not a plat of the village on record, so that the owners of lots had to rely on possessory rather than legal rights. During the year 1878 the Hecla company made the improvements named in the following list: One ten-stamp mill in old building; leaching works and building, the latter being 38x62 feet: cupel furnace; two chloriding furnaces; one copper refinery building, 32x48 feet; one blacksmith shop with two forges; one carpenter shop with three benches, and one warehouse, 16x32 feet. Improvements made at mines: 1,100 feet snow sheds to Atlantis and True Fissure mines; Fraser & Chalmers hoisting works at Atlantis mine; large two-story boarding-house at foot of tramways; the men can come down from either of the above mines to foot of tramway under shelter. One engine and boiler house; ore house; steam pipe laid 1,100 feet; one powder magazine; 800 feet air pipe laid to compressor; one mile water pipe, laid to supply boiler, concentrator and boarding-house. The business circle of the village was made up as follows, from 1878 to 1884–5 (names of persons in business now are marked by an asterisk, thus ): Physicians—Schmalhausen & Noble. Lawyer—C. W. Turner. Jeweler—Jas. C. Keppler. Preachers—M. T. Lamb, Baptist; and O. W. Mentzer, Methodist. Hotels—Burnett House, John J. Burnett, proprietor; Glendale House, John Cannovan, proprietor; Hash House, Ah Boon; Avery House, H. H. Avery, G. C. King.* Livery and Feed Stables—John B. Reynolds,* Elzy Murry.* Meat Markets—Rote & Germanson, Stanley & Taylor, Levi Cartier.* Wagon Shops—H. Stewart, Fred Dawson. Bankers—N. Armstrong & Co. Blacksmith Shops—T. J. Weller & Co., Hecla Con. Mining Co.,* E. Murry,* Avary & French.* Saloons—J. C. Metlin, A. H. Foster,* Littlefield & Co., Peck & Fairfield, Grotevant & Forry. Bateman & Wells,* N. Ladoux,* W. J. Parkenson,* T. Rhodes,* Peter Wagner.* Brewery—Frank Gilg. Restaurant—John Manneheim. Laundry—Sam Woo, Fung Kee. General Merchandise—Thomas & Armstrong, John Wells,* G. W. Perkins, H. S. Pond, H. J. Kinney, Armstrong & Losee,* Pond & Generaux,* R. Wilson & Co.* Tin and hardware—James Evans. Shoemakers—James Hamilton, Benjamin Scott. Stage Line—J. T. Murphy & Co. Drugs and Medicines—Parchen & Coughenour, E. R. Alward.* Wholesale whiskies—Thomas & Armstrong, B. M. DuRell & Co. Between September, 1878, and April, 1879, the list of business houses received many additions, and the village gave evidences of permanency.

Societies.—Bannack Lodge, No. 3, I. O. O. F., Glendale, was founded June 2, 1871. The members of the lodge in June, 1883, were E. N. Reed, N. G.; Wm. Parkinson, V. G.; Albert Starr, secretary; J. B. Loose, treasurer; J. B. Crow, F. Gilg, John Graham, P. Grotevant, Geo. Howard, L. Hembockel, Ch. W. Hardisty, A. L. Kellogg, J. M. Kellogg, H. L. Libby, G. C. Metlin, G. G. Maddux, Thos. Martin, A. C. Moe, B. F. Mahan, Jas. McIntire, P. S. O'Brien, Wash. Northrup, J. T. Ross, E. N. Reed, Erick Lolberg, Albert Starr, Geo. E. Tarbell, A. F. Wright, Wm. Russell, Wm. Parkinson, Arch Hardesty, and J. W. Finit.

the name now given to the center of the old Trapper district, owes its existence to the revival of mining enterprises, rather than to the decline of the old town of Trapper. The discovery of the Trapper lode was made in 1872 by William Spurr and named by him the Forest Queen. "At the time the discovery was made," says an old settler, "William Spurr and James Bryant were partners. Afterward Bryant discovered that Spurr had made the location in his own name. No work had been done on the lode, and when open for re-location the following season, Bryant organized a party to go out on a trapping expedition, but concluded first to come up into the gulch and re-locate the claim. This was in the summer of 1873. The party came up to the spring, a short distance above what is now known as the Trapper mine, camped there for several days and made their location. After this was accomplished they concluded to "pull" out, and started to look for their horses, but found they had gone. After looking for some time, Jerry Grotevant, tired out and discouraged, started to return to camp, and when on top of what is now known as Trapper hill, sat down on a log to rest. Accidentally he kicked over a small boulder, saw something shining on the underside, picked it up to examine, and found it covered with what he thought was native silver. On looking around further, he found the outcrop of the famous Trapper lode. Picking up several pieces, he returned to camp and convinced his partners that they were now bonanza kings. The horses were forgotten. Picking up the tools, all hands pitched into work with a will. The news soon spread. A party from Bannack followed the man back, who went to have it recorded, and created quite an excitement. Noah Armstrong at this time had a party prospecting in Madison County, and at once sent them over. They located the Cleve and Avon during their first day in camp.

The town soon built up and for a time was fast enough to suit the ideas of a '49'er. Taking it on the Trapper side, the next claim located was the Minnie Gaffney, by miners Moffat and Maynard. The next discovered was the Hecla, by Harvey and Day. The Elm Orlu was discovered by the Trapper Company, but they, not thinking it worth their while to prospect, made it over to Messrs. Sod and Hays. The next discovery was the noted Keokuk, by Wash Stapleton and James Cameron. Attention was then called to the celebrated Lion Mountain, where Armstrong's party discovered the Altai and Atlantis. A Bismarck company, represented by Mulligan and Sloss, discovered the Fissure group. The Marc Antony and Ariadne were discovered by Dewey, McComb and Brubaker, who afterward sold it to Messrs. Taylor and Pease, who finally sold it to the Hecla Company. The Franklin mine, situated directly back of the old Trapper town, was discovered by Frank Giley and Ed. Stevens, who finally sold it to the Hecla Company. At this time the Trapper mine was the only mine shipping ore. The ore ran away up; all mine owners imagined themselves bonanza kings and lived high. After the first excitement was over the town began to die out. Mr. Armstrong started to open up the Atlantis and ship ore to Salt Lake City. The new town of Lion City was then started. The Trapper mine was shut down, and in the summer of 1878 the last citizen, Mose Morrison, packed up his traps and came over to Lion. Trapper City is dead, and all that is left are empty cabins and buried hopes.

In the spring of 1877 the Hecla Company bought the Cleopatra, and shortly after bought the Fissure claim, thus securing the entire face of the mountain. Work was at once begun, and the second stack was built in Glendale. The mines proved to be constant producers, and have added over one million ounces of silver annually to the wealth of the territory, besides thousands of tons of lead and copper. It is the intention of the owners to erect concentrators in the spring of 100 tons per diem capacity. It is estimated by men competent to judge that they now have on hand 50,000 tons of second class ore which will pay handsomely for concentration. With the mines now being worked the Hecla Company have the Hecla, Trapper, Franklin, Cleve, Avon, Marc Antony and Ariadne, all full size and patented claims. Outside of the Hecla Company, the Monroe Mining Company own the Pride of the West, Wall Street, Condor, Minnie Gaffey, Moffat and Maynard. Joe Young & Co. own the Keokuk, which has proved beyond a doubt to be a good mine. Joe Kepler & Co. own the Oneida mine, being situated in Lion mountain, and in the center of the Hecla group. There can be no doubt as to its being one of the resources of the camp. The Elm Orlu, owned by Messrs. Driscoll and Lord, is one of the big mines of the camp and has every appearance of being a true fissure vein. With the Tip Top of Sun Hill, Napoleon, Chloride, Gopher, Alps and Paymaster, all valuable prospects, as reserves, the future of the camp is assured, and there is no doubt it will continue to improve for many years to come.

The population of Lion City in 1880 was 250, and of the district outside 228. The mercantile interests are represented by the stores of W. Armstrong & Co. and Thomas & Armstrong, three saloons, two hotels, the Hecla Company's boarding houses and post-office.

ARGENTA.

The Town of Montana was chartered January 6, 1865. Under that act Samuel McLean, Samuel W. Batchelder, Edwin R. Purple, Walter C. Hopkins, William H. Miller, Thomas Pitt, George W. Stapleton, Darius Hawkins, James Tufts, and their associates, were empowered to lay out the town of Montana, within the following described boundaries: "Commencing at the northwest corner of the filed survey, running westerly to Point of Rocks on the south side of Rattlesnake creek about twelve hundred feet; thence southerly on a line parallel with the west line of said survey forty chains; thence easterly to the southeast corner of said survey; then commencing at the northeast corner of said survey, running southerly along east line of said survey forty chains; thence easterly on an extension of the south line of said survey sixty-five chains; thence northerly on a line parallel with the east line of said survey forty chains; thence westerly sixty-five chains, to point of beginning." Under the act approved December 30, 1868, the name was changed to Argenta and the following named persons added to the original corporators: I. A. Brown, C. Bray, C. S. Ream, A. K. Eaton, George Brown, D. H. Hopkins, E. D. Leavitt, A. J. Smith, E. F. Phelps, B. S. Peabody and W. W. De Lacy.

The location is thirteen miles northeast of Bannack, near the silver quartz mountains and gold placers, and at one time was the property of 3,000 claimants. The product of both mines and placers is nominal.

Argenta Lodge, No. 29, I. O. G. T., was established June 7, 1871, with twenty-two members. A. B. Davis organized this lodge. William Smith was its first deputy. Charter forfeited 1874. The business circle of Argenta is made up as follows: E. French, general store, post-office and hotel; E. S. Ball, smelting works; J. W. Seligman & Co., smelting works, and Thomas E. Tootle, smelting works.

SMALL SETTLEMENTS.

Birch Creek is twelve miles distant from Dillon. A company was formed for the purpose of developing a property of great value at this point, and has located several large veins of pure magnetic iron, inexhaustible in quantity and easily extracted. The Omaha Refining Works Company and other parties controlling abundant capital are heavily interested. In 1883 the sales of crude ores, which are used for fluxing purposes at the mines of Glendale and Butte, amounted to $1,800 a month. It is the intention of the company to erect an extensive plant for the manufacture of pig-iron and various kinds of machinery during the year 1885.

Red Rock Creek is one of the head branches of the Jefferson and has its source in the divide. From the outcrop of cretaceous clays and brick-red sandstone along its banks its name is derived. Red Rock settlement takes its name from the Creek. Here Martin Barrett was married Aug. 6, 1867, in the house of Sim Estes, being the first marriage, and here Harry Shineberger died, being the first death. The first settlement was made in 1864. The village is 25 miles southwest of Dillon, where Joseph Shineberger is postmaster.

Horse Prairie. The first settler was Charles Fortier, a French Canadian, who resided here in 1862 for a short period. Barrett and Stineberger were the first permanent settlers, and to them is credited the commencement of agriculture here. Here, in 1877, the Nez Perces killed Smith, Farnsworth, Montague, Flynn and Cooper. It appears they had two scouts, who wandered away from the regular Indian trail and permitted the savages to surprise the place. The stockade in Beaverhead Valley was 150 feet square, the outer palisades being 12 feet and the inner 8 feet in height, the intervening space being filled with clay. Bastions, port-holes, etc., gave to the fort a military air. The first child born on Horse Prairie was Ida May Brown; the first deaths were those of Samuel Jagger's two children, in 1879. The first sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Van Gorp, at the residence of Martin Barrett, and the first post office was established in 1877, with Mrs. Hamilton in charge. This settlement is 58 miles southwest of Dillon and 12 southwest of Bannack. Its population is estimated at 60.

Horse Prairie Creek, thirty-six miles distant from Dillon is the source of the fuel supply. Since the establishment of Dillon, the coal consumed there has been mined from the deep veins along the creek. The Keystone is a clear vein, averaging nine feet in width, while the Red Cliff averages fifteen feet. The entire neighborhood is a coal field, the development of which remains for the near future.

Dewey's Flat. Distance from Deer Lodge, 56 miles, and from Glendale, 15; population, 40. Its business consists of a hotel, by E. S. Bryant, formerly by Miss Lawrence; C. R. Hay is postmaster; saloon, by Mr. Madison, with the three following mills in operation: One 15-stamp mill, known as the Monroe Co.'s; one 5-stamp mill, known as the Legatt; one 2-stamp mill, owned by Allen Hay. This is a good grazing district, but not a farming one.

Hecla, one mile above old Lion City, is the property of the Hecla Mining Company. Early in 1882 the Burnt Pine post office was disestablished and one ordered to be opened at this point. The warehouse, office, stable, magazine, boarding houses, and a number of dwellings were erected at this point, by the company. The first settlement was made here in 1873, since which time the population has increased to 800. The business circle is made up as follows: Joseph Arbor, hotel; Armstrong & Loser, Wilson, Rate & Co., and A. M. Morrison, merchants; Mrs. Brooks, hotel; C. Augustien, meat market; D. Cloud, Pat. Magee, blacksmiths; G. W. Thomas, carpenter; G. E. Tarbell, billiards; John T. Murray, miner; James Parfet, Hecla Con. Mining Co.; J. C. Croston, physician.

Marysville, near Bannack, was among the first districts organized in the county. W. H. Emerick was the first president of this district. He it was who performed the marriage ceremony in the case of George Pratt and Miss Wadhams, claimed by many to be the first marriage in the county.

Allerdice, 46 miles on the U. & N. R. R., south of Dillon, claims a population of 50. Bailey Bros. conduct a general store at this place, while John H. Stinger conducts a saloon.

Vipond, 6 miles northwest of Glendale, claims a church and school, supported by a population of about 50 souls.

Willis, a hamlet on the U. & N. R. R., may be said to have been founded in 1870, when the first settlements were made there. The population is about 60. William Reichle is postmaster.

Ryan's Station was at one time a center of settlement, in fact, the capital of Horse Prairie. Cañon Lodge, No. 30, I. O. G. T., was organized here June 12, 1871, with 17 members; Isaac Van Camp was its first deputy. The first school was attended by John Selway's two sons, Mr. Bartel's two sons, Mr. Van Camp's two sons, and Miss Axe, the only female attendant. Mrs. John Selway is said to be the first white woman who settled in Beaverhead Valley. She organized the first Sunday school. The first school was established by Capt. Rogers, Samuel Ward and Joseph Millard, and organized by Mr. Herndon, husband of Miss Raymond, its first teacher. Mrs. Farley and Miss Jennie Bell were among the first teachers.

Dogtown, now owned by Robt. Riddle, was named by Mrs. Waterman, in 1866, on account of the number of dogs it contained. At that time the village consisted of a blacksmith's shop, one saloon, a grocery store, kept by John Robinson & Brothers, and a total population of about 20. This village belongs to the past, and its name is never heard of except when the old residents speak of those early days.

Missoula Town Company was incorporated under the act approved January 24, 1865

which provided: That F. H. Burr, G. G. Bissell, A. Young, E. F. Phelps, W. M. Barnum, F. H. Angevine, S. T. Hauser, G. B. Parker, and others who are and may be associated with them for that purpose, be incorporated the Missoula Town Company. The said corporation shall have power to hold, manage, and control six hundred and forty acres of land now owned by said company at or near where Virginia City and Deer Lodge wagon road crosses the Big Hole river, and to sell, improve, or convey the lots, or any property, or any part of said tract, not incompatible with the laws of the United States, the Organic Act of the Territory of Montana, or any of the acts of the legislative assembly of this Territory. This location was on the Wisdom or Big Hole river, where John Fraser, James Reed and William Johnson constructed the Senne bridge.

Gibbons Battle Ground: The history of the Nez Perces war contains many references to this county. In 1883, a monument of granite, similar to that placed upon the Custer battle-field, was erected on the scene of Gen. Gibbon's desperate fight with Chief Joseph on the Big Hole. Upon it is an inscription stating the event commemorated, and the names of all who fell. The monument was placed in position on the designated spot under the direction of Maj. A. G. Robinson, quartermaster. (Vide Ch. on Indian wars.)

This old county, so full of the early history of Montana, necessarily claims many references in the general history; while in the chapters devoted to personal history and reminiscences, much of all that is interesting in the history of its settlement and progress has full mention.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CHOTEAU COUNTY.

THE area of this county is estimated at 27,380 square miles. The population increased from 517 in 1870 and 3,058 in 1880, to about 6,000 in 1884. The name was conferred in honor of Pierre Choteau, jun., the president of the American Fur Company, and the commodore of early steamboating on the upper Missouri, who brought the first steamer to Fort Benton in 1860. Mr. Collins, in his review of the resources of this great county, states that it contains more valuable grazing lands than any county in the United States, while the valleys of its numerous great rivers and their tributaries afford ample field for the husbandman. That portion of the county north and east of the Marias river, a section of unlimited resources, is yet an Indian reservation, but it is confidently hoped that Congress will throw open to actual settlement a large portion of it. It is no longer required by the Indians, and the rapid development of this section of Montana makes imperative the demand that it be opened to the stockman, ranchman and miner, as the Bear Paw mountains are known to be rich in the precious minerals. The great falls of the Missouri are twenty-five miles above Benton. Here the river is three hundred yards wide, and plunges over a precipice perpendicularly ninety feet. Above the great falls, in a distance of ten miles, are twelve distinct falls, and the total descent of the river in that distance is about four hundred feet. They probably constitute the greatest available water power in the world. Hundreds visit them annually, and for grandeur and beauty they are only excelled by the Great Falls of the Yellowstone. (See chapter on Topography.)

The new settlers hail in the main from the Eastern states and Canada, who, understanding that they cannot expect any returns from their lands until next year, have brought with them household goods and sufficient cash to carry them through the first year. While they are necessarily economical in their expenses, merchants report an excellent trade in all lines of merchandise, more than two-thirds of which is cash and the balance on short time, amply secured. Competition is active, and while goods are sold on close margins traders are assured a good living and meet their obligations with a promptness not always characteristic of frontier towns. The banks are very conservative, and rates of discount are high—a fact explainable in part from the fact that comparatively few of their customers have as yet proved up on their lands, and that personal property is the only tangible basis of estimate of a man's solvency. The fertility of the soil has been fully tested, not a few of the earlier settlers having made large crops of oats and wheat, while vegetables have attained prodigious growth. The soil being somewhat lighter and dryer and the elevation greater, the season here is about two weeks earlier than in the great grain-belt of the Red river valley.

The principal industries of Choteau county are stock-raising and agriculture. The entire county is one grand pasture field on which there now ranges not less than 100,000 head of cattle, 60,000 sheep, and 10,000 horses, with a capacity of sustaining ten times the number. The numerous valleys are well adapted to agriculture, growing crops of grain and vegetables that in the matter of yield cannot be excelled elsewhere in the world. With the opening of the reservation, a certain result in the near future, the mining interests of the county (in the Bear Paw region) will come into decided prominence. The most extensive coal fields west of the Mississippi river are situated just south of Benton in this county and Meagher, extending over a district of several hundred square miles, almost from the base of the Little Belt mountains to the Missouri river. Several good mines have been opened in this district—whence, in a large part, comes Benton's supply of fuel. The Benton branch of the Northern Pacific will in all probability pass through this district, which has been thoroughly examined by experts sent out by that company, and coal in abundance can be secured to supply the whole line and all its branches if required. The principal agricultural districts of Choteau county are the Missouri, Milk River, Marais, Teton, Sun River, Highwood, Shonkin—and their numerous tributaries. The Marais empties into the Missouri about twelve miles below Benton. It is the boundary line of the reservation, and is already settled to a slight extent (on the Benton side of the stream), but there is room for thousands more along its valley. There is some timber on this stream, and toward its head abundance of it. The Teton is a tributary of the Marais, and its valley one of the finest and most productive in the territory. This valley is well settled, both with farmers and stockmen, but there are thousands of acres yet subject to entry, and which are as free as the water of the stream to settlers. The Highwood and Shonkin valleys are south of Benton but a few miles, and both have become famous for the production of grain and vegetables. Nearly all the land along these streams has been taken, and a great many fine ranches are already to be found there. Ranches of 160 acres that two years ago were entered under the homestead act, costing the locator but a few dollars in land office fees, could not now be purchased for $2,000 over and above the cost of the improvement, a fact calculated to show how desirable farming lands are increasing in value in the vicinity of Benton. As in the case of Sun river, the Shonkin and Highwood are also peopled to some extent with "cattle kings," whose stock roam upon the thousand hills of the Shonkin range. The Milk River valley is a portion of the Indian reservation, and is acknowledged to be the best agricultural and grazing region in the territory. When Congress has done its duty by throwing this "garden spot" of the Northwest open to settlement it is bound to become a thickly settled and wealthy valley, and will pay rich tribute to the river metropolis. The St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railroad, as well as other projected lines, will pass through this valley en route to Benton.

Sun river is a stream of moderate size during the greater part of the year, and runs on a succession of short curves in a shallow channel. It is a clear stream gliding over a bed of rounded stones and gravel; the descent is considerable and the current strong. It is scarcely more than 60 feet wide, and is fordable anywhere except toward its mouth. This river forks several times near the head of the valley; some forks are of considerable length, and the whole system drains the eastern slopes of the mountainous country to the west and north. During the spring and early summer the snow melting in the mountains, and the rains which prevail at this season, swell the river to many times its usual volume. Many kinds of fish are found, while game may be said to be still abundant. The valley is 50 miles long, and from two to five miles wide.

Sweet Grass Hills Mines. These mines were discovered in the fall of 1884, near the boundary line, probably eighty miles from Fort Benton, in a northwesterly direction. Captain Twining made a road there in 1874 to a point near these diggings, while connected with the boundary survey. Some prospecting was done at that time by parties in the permanent supply camp at the Sweet Grass Hills, which resulted in finding quartz but no placers—in fact, the prospecting was of the most superficial kind, being conducted by officers and others not familiar with mining matters. It appears that in the fall of 1884, Marion Carey, Fred Derwent, George Walters, and John Des Champ, went into camp there; wintered in the mountains, and in the spring prospected on the east side of Middle Butte. In April, 1885, Joe Kipp, Charley Thomas, Hi. Upham, and about ten others, came into camp, when they formed a district, all locating claims, and appointed Hi. Upham recorder. The Cary party have taken out this spring, in their desultory prospecting, eleven and one-half ounces of gold. In the work that has thus far been done, they have not struck bed-rock in the main gulch, but find good pay in the dirt. As high as $1.50 has been taken from one pan. Carey is confident that the diggings will pay from $5 to $7 a day to the man. In the Little Rockies, at the head of the Little Horn, on People's creek, Rock creek and Little Alder creek mining enterprises are being pushed forward.

Organic. The county was established by the Legislature in the act approved February 2, 1865, which provided "That all that portion of the Territory of Montana embraced in the following boundaries be, and the same is hereby, created a county, to be known as Choteau County, to wit: commencing at the intersection of the one hundred and eighth meridian of longitude with the forty-ninth parallel of latitude; thence south along said meridian of longitude to the forty-seventh parallel of latitude; thence west on said parallel of latitude to the Missouri river; thence down said Missouri river to the mouth of Sun river; thence up Sun river to the one hundredth meridian of longitude; thence north along said meridian of longitude to the forty-ninth parallel of latitude; thence east along said parallel of latitude to the place of beginning. And the county seat of the said Choteau county is hereby located at Fort Benton." By reading 113th instead of one hundredth meridian, the original western boundary of the county will be better understood. The extension of the western limits was subsequently effected; so that the thirty mile strip west of longitude 36 degrees or 113 degrees was taken from the old county of western Montana, and added to the new one on the east side of the main range. The twenty-five mile strip north of latitude 47 degrees, extending west to the Upper Missouri, from longitude 31 degrees west, was attached to Meagher county in 1874. Up to the close of 1866 the county remained unorganized, so that the Legislature passed the Act of December 14, 1866, providing for the appointment of an assessor who would enter upon the duties of that office April 1, 1867, in case the people of Choteau had not effected a county organization. The old court house was destroyed by fire January 5, 1883. At a meeting of the County Commissioners and citizens, held subsequently, it was decided to erect a $50,000 structure and the Legislature was asked to pass an enabling act, so that seven per cent. bonds to that amount might be issued. Work upon the building was commenced in 1883 and completed early in 1884. The action of the commissioners was confirmed by an act approved February 5, 1885, of which the following is an abstract: "All those certain coupon bonds issued and sold by the Board of Commissioners of Choteau county, by virtue of and pursuant to the authority conferred in that certain act entitled 'An Act to enable the county of Choteau to erect a court house,' approved March 3, 1883, and in that certain act entitled 'An Act supplemental to an Act entitled 'An Act to enable the county of Choteau to erect a jail,' approved February 22, A. D. 1881,' approved March 2, 1883, shall not be invalid by reason of any neglect, failure, or omission to advertise and give notice of the time and place of sale of any such bonds, as required by law, and all such bonds are hereby ratified and declared valid." This act was approved March 5, 1885, and on March 10, 1885, another act authorizing the commissioners to issue bonds for $8,500 to pay balance due on court house.

The officials of this county in 1879 were: Sheriff and Assessor, J. J. Healy; Clerk and Recorder and Probate Judge, J. J. Donnelly; Treasurer, John Hunsberger; County Commissioners, Jos. S. Hill, W. S. Conway, Richard Mee. The officers of the county, elected in 1882, are named as follows: Sheriff, James McDevitt; Probate Judge, John W. Tattan; Clerk and Recorder, John F. Murphy; Treasurer, John Hunsberger; Assessor, Henry Kennerly; Superintendent of Schools, Dr. J. W. Wheelock; Coroner, Moses Solomon: Commissioners, Jos. S. Hill, W. S. Wetzel and Jas. M. Arnoux. The officers for 1885-86 are: Sheriff, James McDevitt; Assessor, J. F. Murphy; Treasurer, John Hunsberger; W. J. Miner, Treasurer from March 2, 1885; Clerk and Recorder, A. E. Rogers; Probate Judge, C. S. Spencer; Superintendent of Schools, Miss M. E. Johnson; Public Administrator, E. Ingersol; Coroner, J. H. Fairfield; Surveyor, C. G. Griffith; County Commissioners, R. S. Ford, W. S. Wetzel and J. M. Arnoux. The total vote for Congressional delegate was 1,054, of which Jos. K. Toole received 606, and Judge Knowles 448. H. R. Buck, Republican, represents the county in the Territorial Council, and J. F. Taylor, Democrat, in the House of Representatives.

It is only in the last three years that the resources of Choteau county have been developed to any great extent, and it can be justly claimed that the era of progression has but fairly set it. The value of the assessable property of the county for 1882 was $2,309,761, or an increase over that of 1881 of $551,206. The increase for 1883 is not less than a million, or about $3,085,537, and the assessment for 1884 about the same figure. Under the act approved January 15, 1869, the commissioners of the county were empowered to collect from every steamboat, landing at Benton, a wharfage fee not exceeding ten dollars per day. The wharves acknowledged were those between Benton and Old Fort La Barge, or the point opposite the site of the old Fort. The fund arising from such collections was to be devoted to the construction of boat landings at such places as the County Commissioners might deem proper.

Schools.—The condition of the public schools of the county at the beginning of 1883 is shown in the following extract from the report of Superintendent J. W. Wheelock. Miss Johnson, the present superintendent, has not reported for this year at the date of writing: Number of organized districts, 4; number of white persons between 4 and 21 years, 594; number of African descent, 4 to 21, 9; number of pupils attending school during the year, 176; number attending private schools, 30; number not attending school, 397; number of male teachers employed, 1; number of female teachers employed, 2; total number of teachers, 3; average length of school in days, 160; number of brick school houses, 1; number of log schools, 2; number of graded schools, 1; number of ungraded schools, 2; total number of schools, 3; rate of county tax for school purposes, in mills, 4; amount per capita for school census children, $11.01; amount raised by county tax for schools, $6,638.38; total amount from all sources apportioned during year, $6,807.34. The number of houses devoted to education has been increased by the new school buildings at Benton and district houses erected throughout the county, together with denominational and Indian schools.

Little Tex was killed by Bloods, at the Blackfoot farm, Sun river, in April, 1866; the buildings were burned.

The murder of Fitzgerald by Bloods, occurred at St. Peter's Mission early in 1866.

Lagree and Hunicke were murdered by Blackfeet and Bloods at Three Tree Coulee Jan. 9, 1866.

The murder of the builders of the town of Ophir, occurred in May, 1865.

Six men were killed by Bloods on Old Man's river, early in 1865. The victims came from Fort Garry, now Winnipeg, and were reputed to possess a large amount of money. Their leader was an old, white-haired man, William Berry, killed by Bloods, on Elbow river, in 1874.

Joe Munroe, killed by Bloods, on Old Man's river, in 1874.

Miller, killed by Bloods, on Old Man's river, in 1872.

McMullen, wounded by Assinaboines, near Bow river, in 1874.

Two unknown men killed by Assinaboines, near Milk river, in 1874. The bodies were found tied to trees and filled with bullet holes.

Ed. Grace, killed by Assinaboines, in 1873.

A party of men, women and children, killed by Bloods, near Porcupine mountains, in 1865.

A soldier, name unknown, killed by Piegans, on Marias Hill, 1873.

Joe Day and Howard, killed by Piegans, near the Marias river, 1875.

John Rock, killed by Blackfeet, mouth of Sun river, 1870.

One man, name unknown, found dead near the Marias, in 1875.

Jack Gorman and Frank Keiser, killed by Assinaboines, in 1875.

Frank Robinson, killed by Gros Ventres, near Cow creek, in 1877.

Joseph Spearson, killed by Bloods, on Belly river, in 1870.

Neise Kyse, George Huber, and one man, name unknown, killed by Sioux, on Squaw creek, near the mouth of Muscleshell river, August, 1836.

Andy Harris, killed by Assinaboines, on Milk river, in 1867.

One soldier, killed by Piegans, at Camp Cook, in the spring of 1867.

Boxell A. Bair, wounded by Piegans, on Eagle creek, in 1867.

Paul Vermette, killed by Indians, on the Teton river, in 1866.

Champion, killed by Arrapahoes, at Fort Hawley, in 1867.

Malcolm Clark, killed by Piegans, in 1869.

Charles Carson, killed by Piegans, on Dearborn river, in 1866.

Jennie Smith, scalped alive by Sioux, at mouth of Muscleshell river, in 1869. The unfortunate woman recovered and is still alive. (1879).

Jake Leader, killed by Sioux, at mouth of Muscleshell river, in 1869.

McGregor, Taber, and two other men, names unknown, were killed, and one man wounded, by Sioux, near Fort Peck, in 1868.

Ross and McKnight, killed by Sioux, at mouth of Muscleshell river, in 1871.

Nat Crabtree, killed by Piegans, near Camp Cook, in 1868.

Old Man Lee, killed and Charley Williams and Drew Denton wounded, by Sioux, near Carroll, in 1870.

McArdle and comrade, killed by Crows, near Benton, 1869.

Tom Ross, killed by Sioux, near Fort Peck, in 1873.

Michael Thebault, killed by Piegans, on the Teton, in 1868.

James Quail, killed by Piegans, near Silver creek, in 1869.

One man, name unknown, killed by Piegans, on Sun river, in 1868.

Clark, killed by Piegans, on Sun river, in 1868

Dauphant, killed by Sioux, near the mouth of Milk river, in 1865.

Charley Dearonin, killed by Indians near the Bear Paw, in 1870.

Little Frenchie, killed by Assinaboines, on Milk river, in 1869.

One man, herder for Carroll and Steel, name unknown, killed by Indians on Milk river, in 1869.

Sam Rax, killed by Bloods, on Eagle creek, in 1869.

Jim Watkins, wounded by Piegans, near Benton, in 1868.

Old Man Long, Foster and Jorden, killed by Sioux, near mouth of Pouchette.

Seven unknown travelers, killed by Sioux, on the Missouri river, above Fort Peck, in 1868.

Two men, names unknown, killed by Sioux, at mouth of Muscleshell, in 1868

Four men, names unknown, killed by Sioux, at mouth of Muscleshell, in 1873

George Horn, killed by Assinaboines, on Cow creek, in 1874

Bill Morrison and John Hughes, killed by River Crows, on Arrow creek, in 1877.

Antelope Charley and Cook, killed by Piegans, at mouth of Eagle creek, in 1873.

Little Rock, killed by Sioux, on Judith mountain, in 1874

One man, name unknown, killed by Piegans, on Warm Spring creek, near the Judith river, in 1874.

Buckshot and Poulett, killed by Assinaboines, at Rocky Spring, in 1871.

Joseph Gipperich was killed by Bloods, on St. Mary's river, in 1872

Edward Bradley, Charles Steel, James Downey, Charles Buck, J. J. Barker and an African were killed by the Nez Perces, in October, 1877, during the tour of that tribe through the county.

Pioneers of Choteau County.—The inhabitants of Fort Benton, and of the settlements along Sun river during the winter of 1862–3, are named in the following list, taken from the Historical Society's contributions:

The inhabitants of Sun river were: J. A. Vail and wife, farmer at Blackfoot reservation; Miss O'Brien, sister-in-law of Vail, afterward Mrs. Plummer. Reid was the Indian agent, but did not remain during the winter. James M. Arnoux was in this section also. Chouquette, Kipp and Wren, with a few others, referred to in the general history and biography, were here at a very early date. Charles Chouquette, whose personal history is given in this work, came to Benton in 1844, served twenty-eight years in the American Fur Co's. service, and has resided in Montana Territory almost continuously. Joseph Kipp and parents came to St. Union, in 1857. (Vide History). John Wrenn, now a resident of Choteau, was here in 1857, and in 1858 he, with six others, walked from St. Paul to the Upper Missouri, in Montana Territory, as employes of the American Fur Co., Ducharme, Fournais and others named in general history were here long years ago.

Canadian Refugees.—After the Red River troubles of 1871 a small number of half-breeds moved from the Canadian side to Montana, and made their settlement on Milk river. Here they entered on an industrial career, and were soon joined by others. Among the newcomers were a few desperadoes, who merely sought a home on Milk river while engaged in plundering stores and ranches along the boundary line. The authorities of Choteau county sent Sheriff Healy and his two deputies to arrest them; but the law was not vindicated by the officers, all three of whom were captured and kept as prisoners for a full week. By way of breaking the monotony the officers were daily marched to a tree in close proximity to the encampment, and the mock ceremony of lynching carried out amid the jeers of the outlaws. They were finally rescued by the United States troops, who recaptured the stores and drove most of the half-breeds back to British territory. This was in 1880, and among those who returned were Albert Dumont, the leader of the Duck Lake battle in the Canadian rebellion of 1885, Nolin, the two Bernards, two Roys, and two Delormes. At the close of this justifiable uprising Dumont and some others returned to Choteau, while Louis Reil, one of the chiefs of the rebellion, surrendered voluntarily to the Canadian authorities, deeming it below dignity to flee from the successful party.

BENTON CITY.

So much has been said in the general history in connection with this old center of northwestern commerce, that the absence of detailed accounts here cannot be credited to a desire to be industrious at the beginning or to be negligent at the end of the compiler's work. Rather is it due to the peculiar connection which existed between old Fort Benton and the entire Upper Missouri region in its pre-mining days, which necessitated the relation of facts in the General History that pertain directly to this initial point in the commercial history of Montana. For this reason the reader is referred to the chapters on Military Posts, Fur Traders, Indians, Navigation, Personal History and Reminiscences.

The town of Benton was incorporated in 1865. The original act bears numerous amendments, one of which raised it to the rank of city. The act approved March 10, 1885, provided for the addition of the following described property: The east half of south-west quarter, in section No. 23, in township 24 north, of range 8 east.

In 1870 there were four Indian trading houses, one brewery, one bakery, two blacksmith shops, one carpenter shop, one tailor shop, one shoemaker shop, one butcher shop and twelve saloons. The court house, jail and school were there in 1870. The population was 180. Mails were received tri-weekly, and the time required for a letter to reach department headquarters was from fourteen to sixteen days. The adobe fort was 120 feet from the river, twelve feet above low water. The store house and commandant's office were built of hewn logs and shingle roofed. The buildings were of unhewn pine logs, with mortar fillings and the floors of pine boards. The business houses of Benton in 1878 are named in the first paragraph:

I. G. Baker & Co., freighters, contractors, dealers in general merchandise, and proprietors of the Baker Line of steamers, bankers.*
T. C. Power & Bro., freighters, contractors, agricultural implements, and proprietors of the Benton Line of steamers.*
Kleinschmidt & Bro., general merchandise, forwarding and commission house.*
W. S. Wetzel & Co., general merchandise, traders and forwarders.*
Murphy, Neel & Co., general merchandise, forwarders and freighters.
M. A. Flanagan, druggist.*

Glassman, harness maker; Dr. Goodrich, dentist; Harris & Lewis, livery; B. L. Powers, Helena and Benton Stage Co.: Hignis & Ayres, hardware; Kee Fun, hash house; John Kleber, Arcade restaurant; Kennedy & Kelly, T. McClure, meat market; Cash Lanning, jeweler; Lee Quong, laundry; M. J. Lanning, lawyer; M. J. Minor, W. R. Turner, druggists; B. L. Power, lawyer; H. P. Rolf, lawyer; Gus Senieur, architect; Joseph Sullivan, saddlery and harness manufacturer; T. J. Todd & Co., wholesale liquors and cigars; Waterman & McIntyre, lawyers; W. S. Wetzell, dry goods and groceries; J. R. Wilton, builder; Settle & Settle, lawyers; Pratt Bros., Frank Lepper, blacksmiths; B. Tierney, liquors; Kelly & Ginnis, fruits; John Keenan, painter; C. G. Griffith, surveyor; D. Dutro, artist; D. Dutrielle, J. M. Rosier, C. Briar, barbers; J. W. Dewey, mineral surveyor; W. H. Hunt, Jr., collector of customs; Jones Bros., carpenters; L. P. Rogoon, S. A. Robertson, bakers; F. C. Roosevelt, furniture; Bullet & Martin, restaurant; H. R. Buck, city clerk; W. H. Buck, publisher Benton Record; Jerry Collins, editor River Press. The total assessment of Benton for the year 1884 is $1,098,718, which represents $7,128.68 in taxes.

Building in 1882.—What the advance of Benton was during the year 1882 is shown in the following statistics of building operations: Wilton & Werrick, contractors—Wackerlin & Co.'s store, $12,000; Gans & Klein, $8,000; Pacific Hotel, $8,000; Masonic building, $13,000; Building Association, four dwellings, $8,000; James Werick, dwelling, $1,800; Charles Sheridan, dwelling, $800; Peter McDonald, dwelling, $1,800; R. A. Luke, dwelling, $1,400; I. G. Baker & Co., improvement, $250; T. J. Todd, improvements, $150; William Rowe, improvements, $500; Frank Coombs, dwelling, $2,000; total, $57,700. Gus. Senieur, contractor—W. S. Wetzel, dwelling, $10,000; Oddfellows' hall, $10,000; J. H. Rice, dwelling, $2,500; addition to Crawford's stable, $1,000; total, $23,500. W. G. Jones, contractor

—T. A. Cummings, brick, $5,000; T. A. Cummings, two frames, $4,500; T. A. Cummings, improvements, $700; W. S. Wetzel, law office, $900; Milo Rosencrans, house, $1,500; Charles Rowe, house, $900; John Green, improvements, $1,000; Charles Conrad, $600; Crane & Green, $500; W. J. Minar, $1,000; Gans & Klein, $900; W. S. Stocking, $800; C. M. Lanning, $250; M. Morrow, $800; W. G. Jones, $1,000; Jerry Collins, $500; total, $29,550. Peter Smith, contractor—Charles Becknell, $1,000; James McDevitt, $500; George W. Crane, $700; Finnigan, $300; Peter Smith, $200; Ed. Flint, $150; T. Hale, $200; Methodist parsonage, $1,400; total, $4,450.

In addition to these are the Grand Union hotel, built by Tweedy & Coombs at a cost of $50,000, and a number of residences on the new reservation which were built by day work. The prices given in the above list are for the naked building, without fixtures in most of the stores and hotels, and the grand total will foot up beyond $200,000, which is a pretty good showing for a town of 2,000 inhabitants. Some idea of the amount of brick laid can be gained by the following list of the number of brick laid by Frank Coombs alone: Grand Union hotel, 550,000; Masonic hall, 350,000; Wackerlin & Co., 325,000; Gans & Klein, 225,000; Pacific hotel, 125,000; Building Association, 75,000; Hepler, 35,000; Werick, 30,000; Coombs, 30,000; McDonald, 20,000; Rowe, 10,000; C. Sheridan, 15,000; three foundations, 10,000; total, 1,840,500. Together with these buildings, some of the other principal ones would be the Oddfellows' hall, 300,000; Wetzel's residence, 300,000; T. A. Cummings, 50,000, making 650,000. With the other buildings erected last year the grand total will run up to over 3,000,000 brick laid in Benton during the year.

Reminiscences of Fort Benton.—In the year 1850 a party assembled on Christmas evening, in a recently constructed adobe building at the trading post of the American Fur Company, on the Upper Missouri river, known as Fort Lewis. In the gathering there was a two-fold object—to celebrate the advent of Christmas by suitable rejoicings, and to dedicate to ultimate uses the first adobe building erected within the present limits of the territory of Montana. Major Culbertson, then in the prime of life, was there as the chief of the establishment, and gathered round him were his sixty or seventy subordinates, who constituted the garrison of the fort, with their wives and children; and the reader needs only to be told that a great majority of the former were Canadian and Louisiana French, of the class called voyageurs, to know that merriment and jollity reigned supreme. Several violins were in active operation, and to the flow of sweet sounds scores of nimble feet tripped merrily, and joyous voices mingled in the bursts of jovial song. At last in the midst of this rousing carnival, Major Culbertson recounted the noble qualities of one of America's distinguished sons, dwelt particularly upon his services a few years before in behalf of the Fur Company, when he rescued it from a ruinous litigation that threatened its complete overthrow, and proposed that in his honor the post, then in course of construction in adobe, should from that time forward be known as Fort Benton. With loud cheers his audience signified their approbation, the violins struck up a lively air, the dancing was renewed with increased vigor, and passing from lip to lip of the hilarious assembly, the name of Fort Benton went forth to the world, and is now recorded in millions of maps from one end of civilization to the other. Old Fort Benton has gone to wreck and ruin, and is now deserted, but the town of Benton has been gradually increasing in size. The place was first surveyed in 1859 by Colonel DeLacy. Since then other surveys have taken place, and the title of the town site is perfected according to law. The town is beautifully situated in one of the low bottoms bordering the Missouri. There is much room for expansion left, and should immigration do its proper duty toward the place, according to its deserts, Benton will be at no far off day one of the largest cities of the territory. Benton has seen very prosperous days in the past, but being brought about by artificial means, they were of short duration. Whenever the territory at large did well, whenever rich diggings were struck and the miners were "flush," Benton could be seen engaged in reaping a rich harvest. To this place every one on his way to the States had to come, and as only the prosperous miner or business man could undertake the journey, the population of Benton, though but a floating one, was of a prosperous kind, and somewhat given to lavish liberality. A person who has not visited the place since its earlier days will be astonished at the change which has been wrought there within so short a time. A wonderful change, indeed! A population of uncertain character, with doubtful means of support, has changed into a well-to-do community of solid business men, with a legitimate trade. Excellent schools are established, churches are built and building, and but few of the landmarks of old times remain to remind one of Benton as it was.

In the year 1844 a party of men, mostly whites, settled at the mouth of the Marias. They were under the leadership of Mr. Kipp, the father of Joe, the noted guide to Colonel Baker in his famous raid upon the Piegans. Here Mr. Kipp remained until the fall of the following year, when the hostility of the Indians and other adverse circumstances compelled him to pull up his stakes and move to a point opposite the mouth of the Judith, on the north side of the Missouri river. This place was called Fort Chadron. Later in the season, when this enterprising and brave little party found itself in an unprofitable and untenable position, Mr. Kipp decided upon another move, up the river, to one of the bottoms north of and along the Missouri river, called the Brule bottom, where to-day the ruins of an adobe fort and rock chimneys testify to the enterprise of our early pioneers, and to the relentless cruelty of the red man. The spring of 1846 found Kipp and his followers putting up houses opposite the present site of Fort Benton in the first bend above. This was called Fort Clay, and its existence was of short duration. During the summer months of 1846 the American Fur Company, then under the management of Pierre Choteau, jr. & Co., sent out its agent, Major Culbertson, with a corps of laborers, to establish a trading post on the upper Missouri. This party landed at the bottom at present occupied by the town of Benton, and was soon after joined by the pioneers of Fort Clay from across the river. Culbertson had with him two well known citizens of Benton, Messrs. Roundeaut and Lorian, the former being employed as butcher, the latter as carpenter. Mr. Mercure, who met with such a sad death in 1877, was the other carpenter attached to the outfit. The old fort and trading post of the American Fur Company was then erected, and called Fort Benton, in honor of the distinguished senator from Missouri. Andrew Dawson, who superseded Major Culbertson in charge of the business, continued building the fort, and the same was finally finished in its present shape by Matt. Carroll, who arrived in the country in 1858. In the same year this latter gentleman, who had in the meantime formed a copartnership with George Steell, built the first house in the town of Benton. This building was occupied in 1879 by the military as a barrack room, and it is situated in the center of the town. (Walker.)

Church History—The third mission established in Montana was among the Blackfeet Indians on the Teton river, in Choteau county, established in 1856 by Father Hoecken, and called St. Peter's. This mission has been moved to near the Missouri river, below the mouth of the Dearborn, and is under the charge of Fathers Imoda and Damiani, from which a missionary priest is for most of the time among the Blackfeet, Bloods, Piegans and Assiniboines.

The first regular services of the Catholic church at Benton were held by Father Imoda in 1878, and the Church of the Immaculate Conception, erected in 1879, being the first building for religious purposes at this post. The stations attended are Fort Assiniboine, Indian Reservation and Shonkin once a month; Upper Seton and Highwoods, Choteau Co., are attended at intervals by Rev. J. H. Camp, S. J., and by the present pastor, Rev. F. Ebersville. The Sisters hospital and school are in connection with this church.

The Protestant Episcopal society was founded here in 1879 by Rev. Mr. Blackiston. Rev. C. S. Fackenthal attends this church and outlying missions. In 1882 the Congregational and Methodist societies were organized, and in 1883 held union services, pending the erection of their proposed church buildings. Reverends J. Mills and J. D. Finney attend the Methodist missions in the vicinity of Benton. The Baptist and Presbyterian societies were organized in 1883–4 (Vide Ch. on Churches.)

Schools.—The Union School building was commenced in 1883. The estimated cost was $30,000. The school fund to build the house, which has in the main accrued from the sale of lots in the new addition to the town site, warranted the action of the trustees in undertaking this great improvement. The Catholic schools claim a large enrollment, and like the union schools, are well conducted.

Benton Hospital.—The Sisters Hospital building was commenced in July, 1883, by Wilton & Coombs, contractors. The estimated cost of the house was $12,000, of which sum $6,000 were subscribed. The building as designed is 68 x 40 feet, three stories in height, including basement. This institution, like the other hospitals and orphanages in charge of the Sisters of Charity, holds a high place in public estimation.

Fire Department.—This department was organized in July, 1883, by Messrs. Sullivan, Collins and Cummings—a commission appointed by the city council for that purpose. The Hose Company was organized in July by T. A. Cummings, with the following members:—T. A. Cummings, C. E. Conrad, C. G. Griffith, Ed. Ingersoll, A. C. Johnson, John W. Power, S. C. Edgerton, R. A. Luke, C. L. Spencer, H. B. Hill, W. L. Kneidler, F. S. Caldwell, Geo. P. Fiske, W. H. Hunt, H. R. Buck, Jos. A. Baker, A. B. Keeler, A. E. Rogers, D. G. Browne, W. S. Baker, W. H. Kelly, F. W. Bucksen, C. C. Hackle, J. H. Gamble, Chas. Downey, Chas. Houston, Chas. Kendall, Jno. C. Tutt, Joe Ethier, Cuthbert Pratt, Wm. Archer, John F. Murphy, C. W. Merrill, Wm. Roberts, Harry Stanford, S. D. Heuston, F. C. Reynolds, Lawrence House, Peter Macdonald, Geo. Fahrquahr; John F. Murphy, foreman; C. L. Spencer, secretary, and R. A. Luke, treasurer. The Engine Company was organized by Mr. Sullivan, and the Hook and Ladder Company by Mr. Collins.

Secret Societies.—The first society established at Benton was Northern Star Lodge, No. 41, I. O. G. T., organized by W. P. Burcher, August 13, 1873. Albert Agossy was its first deputy. Charter surrendered in 1874.

Benton Lodge, No. 25, A. F. & A. M., was organized under a dispensation of the Grand Lodge of Montana, June 15, 1880. A charter was granted by the Grand Lodge September 16, 1880. The following were the charter members: F. C. Roosevelt, Rufus Payne, L. H. Rosencrans, N. McIntire, M. Wright, J. B. Smith, J. S. Hill, W. H. Kanouse, H. P. Rolfe, Iowa Cathers, R. McClatchey and William Rowe. The Lodge organized with the following officers: F. C. Roosevelt, W. M.; Rufus Payne, S. W.; L. H. Rosencrans, J. W.; Jos. S. Hill, treasurer; H. P. Rolfe, secretary; John B. Smith, Sr. D.; Niel McIntyre, Jr. D.; M. Wright, Tyler, who held office until December 27, 1880. Rufus Payne was then elected W. M., and has filled that position until the present time. R. Payne, J. B. Smith and Niel McIntyre have each filled the office of S. W. L. H. Rosencrans, N. McIntyre and John Hezekiah have each filled the office of J. W. Jos. S. Hill has been treasurer, and H. P. Rolfe secretary of the Lodge since its organization. The officers and members of this Lodge in 1883 were Rufus Payne, W. M.; Neal McIntyre, S. W.; John Hezekiah, J. W.; Joseph S. Hill, treasurer; Herbert P. Rolfe, secretary; Ferdinand C. Roosevelt, P. M.; James W. Werrick, S. D.; George W. Crane, J. D.; Charles Rowe, S. S.; August Wahlstede, J. S.; Maitland Wright, Tyler; Rufus Payne, P. M; Slater C. Blackiston, Robert Blankenbaker, Iowa Cathes, Geo. W. Crane, Wheeler O. Dexter, Cornelius Hackshaw, Patrick H. Hughes, William Kanouse, O. W. Kelley, Chas. E. Conrad, John J. Kennedy, Geo. W. Samples, S. L. Kelley, V. K. Goss, John Killilay, Samuel L. Kohlberg, Robert McClatchey, George D. Patterson, L. H. Rosencrans, William Rowe, John B. Smith, Pierce Thecker, W. S. Wetzel, James C. Adams, Julius Stone, R. H. Clendennin, W. D. Cameron. The project of building a hall was started in 1881, but meeting with some obstacles it was postponed until the summer of 1882, when the Lodge purchased thirty feet of ground of the Rowe brothers, situated on Front street, at $125 per front foot, and a contract was awarded to Wilton and Werrick to erect a brick building, to be completed by the first day of January, 1883. The building is 30x100 feet, two stories high, with an eight-foot basement; the lower floor consists of one store, which, together with the basement, has been leased by W. H. Burgess for five years, to be occupied as a grocery house. The upper story is divided into a hall, 28x70 feet, three ante-rooms and a closet. The brick work was done by Frank Coombs, the plastering by Jos. Jedlica, and the whole work was under the superintendence of O. W. Kelley, chairman of the Building Committee. The cost of the building was about $16,000. The Lodge has now about thirty members. There has been but one death since its organization—that of Maitland Wright, which occurred October 6, 1882. (Press.)

Montana Lodge, No. 9, A. O. U. W., was organized November 9, 1882, with the following charter members: W. S. Wetzel, Max Waterman, S. Genzberger, S. A. Robertson, W. J. Minar, Richard Mee, Jas. DeWolff, Charles O. Kendall, Jno. F. Keilhauer, Mike Lynch, Charles K. Bucknam, Chas. Crawford, A. B. Keeler, M. J. Meehan, Charles Rowe, W. J. Eastman, Jos. Hirshberg, C. P. Downing, Frank Coombs and Geo. W. Payne. The Lodge has thirty-two members at the present time, and is gradually increasing. The following are the officers in order from P. M. W. to O. W.: Max Waterman, Charles Crawford, Joseph Hirshberg, Frank Coombs, S. Genzberger, W. S. Wetzel, A. B. Keeler, Geo. W. Payne, James DeWolff, Charles O. Kendall, with the following named trustees: Charles Rowe, W. J. Minar and Richard Mee.

Crescent Lodge, No. 4, K. of P., Fort Benton, was organized June 22, 1882. The Past Chancellors are E. R. Clingan, Geo. W. Crane, T. E. Collins, W. C. Riddle, H. G. McIntire, D. G. Browne, W. H. Todd, C. Crawford, D. C. Blackiston and Jas. E. Stevens. The number of members is 34, and the reserve fund is $300. The principal officers at date of writing, are J. E. Stevens, C. C.; W. C. Riddle, V. C.; M. J. Keith, K. of S. & R.; J. L. Stuart, M. of E.

Choteau Lodge, No. 11, I. O. O. F., was established February 18, 1880. The roll of members contains the names of John F. Murphy, N. G.; P. McCabe, V. G.; D. G. Browne, secretary; A. Beckman, H. Brinkman, Charles Crawford, James Gillette, J. Hezekiah, J. Harris, J. Hackshaw, H. Harris, S. L. Keeley, R. Nice, Jas. McDevitt, C. Peterson, Ben Phillips, G. B. Parker, Wm. Rowe, W. W. Scott, Gus Senicus, J. W. Wheelock, J. W. Ackerlin, Geo. Woods and W. H. Wright. The first officers were Richard Mee, N. G.; Henry Murray, V. G., and J. W. Wheelock, secretary. They rented a hall on Main street, now occupied by Roosevelt's furniture store, and remained there two years, after which time they moved to a hall above Kennedy's butcher shop. The Lodge was incorporated in 1882, and the trustees bought a lot adjoining Roosevelt's furniture store and erected a hall thereon at a cost of $10,000. The hall was completed and the Lodge held its first meeting there on the 27th of December, 1882. The Odd Fellows' temple is one of the best buildings in the Territory, and stands as a monument to the enterprise of the Lodge. The old Odd Fellows' hall was erected by Richard Mee and Dr. J. Wheelock, for the use and behoof of the Masonic and I. O. O. F. lodges, and was the first hall of any consequence ever built in Benton. Golden Rule Encampment No. 7 was established a few years ago.

Business Associations.—The Wool-growers' Association of Choteau was formed January 12, 1883, with Paris Gibson, president; T. E. Collins, vice-president; L. W. Peck, secretary, and J. H. Rice, treasurer.

Missouri River Boom Company: The principal stock-holders in the company organized to boom the Missouri river at Benton, and engage in the lumber and wood business are T. C. Power & Bro., Murphy, Neel & Co., the Bank of Northern Montana, the First National Bank, W. S. Wetzel and I. G. Baker & Co. The necessary stock was subscribed.

Banks.—The First National Bank was organized with a paid-up capital of $100,000. The officers and directors are W. G. Conrad, president; Jos. S. Hill, vice-president; T. C. Power, cashier; E. G. Maclay, S. T. Hauser, John Hunsberger, R. A. Luke, directors. Collins, Duer & Co's bank of Northern Montana is among the first financial houses in the Territory.

SMALL SETTLEMENTS.

Choteau Town.—Old Agency is the name given to the location of an Indian trading post on the head-waters of the Teton, south of Muddy creek, seventy-five miles west of Benton. Here Hamilton and Hazlett have carried on a general business for years. During the summer of 1883 a tract of seventy acres in the vicinity of the store was platted, and the town named Choteau. Town lots were sold in July and August, and the beginnings of an agricultural center made. The business men of the town are Hamilton and Hazlett, general store; George Richards, hotel; Pete Bertrand, blacksmith; Wren and Burnett, saw mill; Chas. Bolanger and R. Lindsey, carpenters; L. Bras, S. C. Burd, O. G. Cooper, F. Farmer, C. P. Higgins, Main & Dennis and F. Truchot, live stock; Hunt & Cram, dairy; H. Emerson, meats; Sands & Co., live stock; J. M. Marsh, surveyor. Garrett & Gibson, of Sun river, and others, proposed adding new buildings during the year. The first Fourth of July celebration was held here in 1883. C. Bolanger delivered the oration, Baptiste Champigne read the Declaration, and H. Fellows feasted the school children of the settlement.

During the summer and fall of 1883 the Eldorado Ditch Company constructed a ditch from the Teton, to carry 4,000 inches of water, for the purpose of irrigating the bench lands lying between the Teton and Muddy. This ditch made available for cultivation thousands of acres of as good land as can be found in Montana.

In July, 1883, the stampede to the northwestern gold mines was participated in by the following citizens from Old Agency: A. B. Hamilton, J. J. Healy, of Benton, Andy O'Connell, of Helena, Paul Travers, of New York, and O. G. Dennis and brother.

Shonkin.—This settlement was credited with a population of 170 in June, 1880. Since that time the progress made in agriculture and stock raising has won for the neighborhood a larger number of inhabitants, and placed it in the foremost rank of the new towns springing up throughout the Territory. The statistics for the year ending December 31, 1882, credit the settlement with locations, 46; buildings, 97; acres of ground cultivated in 1882, 968; miles of fence, 41; irrigating ditches, miles 15; dairy cows, milked last year, 197. During the past year George Wareham built a saw-mill on the upper Shonkin, and has run it constantly ever since. A school district was set off from district No. 1, of which Joe Cobell, Pat Conley and Frank Bain are the trustees, and a school of fifteen pupils was inaugurated. Thomas Simpson started a fine fruit garden, and expects to supply the market with berries of all kinds soon. During the past year there were eleven births, two deaths and one marriage. In the history of the settlement but four deaths have occurred—one violent, one accidental and two by sickness. There are twenty-four families on the Shonkin; also twenty-nine bachelors.

Highwood.—This settlement, eighteen miles southwest of Benton, had a population of 94 in 1880. Here are many fertile farms, well-kept gardens, stock and horse ranches. Each ranch is a little village in itself—a residence, barns, granary, blacksmith shop, forming a quadrangle or a street filled with busy life. The first permanent settlers of this neighborhood were J. M. Arnoux, Buckland, Horace Clark, Jos. A. Baker, John Harris, Jared Smith (Yank), McCord, Boyle, Fish, Woods, Bright, Watkins, Stoner, Brinkman and a few others. Geo. Croff was the first settler between Benton and Highwood, he having established a station at the forks of the belt, Sand Coulee and Highwood roads in 1882. This place, known as Nine Mile, was the meadow of the Benton Post, and here years ago Croff cut hay for the use of the cattle and horses at the post, and watered his stock at the Croff spring. This spring was tramped out by buffalo, but reopened in 1882 by the first settlers.

Piegan, one hundred and forty miles northwest of Benton, is the name given to the postoffice village of the Blackfeet agency. At Piegan there are about 5,000 Indians; at Belknap, 4,000. The names of the tribes are: Piegans, Bloods, Blackfeet, Gros Ventres, River Crows, Assiniboines. A church and school are maintained at this point, and a large general store, conducted by Bristol & Horr. The white population is about 100.

The Ophir Town Co. was incorporated February 2, 1865, with Franklin More, Moses Clark, N. W. Burris, E. P. Lewis, Capt. F. Davidson, James H. Kiskadden, Geo. B. Parker, Geo. Hill, and others. The second section of the act provided

"That the said company shall have power to hold, manage and control the land now owned by them as hereinafter described, to wit:—Commencing at the mouth of the Marias river, or junction of said river with the Missouri river; thence running up and along the south bank of said Marias river, to the mouth of the Teton river; thence south six hundred yards; thence east to the Missouri river; thence down the bank of said river to the place of beginning, the same containing three hundred and twenty acres more or less; said company shall have power to survey and erect said tract of land into a town site, to be known as Ophir, and to sell or dispose of for the benefit of said company any portion thereof, and in such manner as they may deem expedient."

East Ophir.—An act to incorporate the East Ophir Town Company was approved February 6, 1865. It provided that, Fred. Root, Frank Moore, Ed. House, Alfred Nichols, J. B. Cavin, C. E. Irvin, J. W. Creighton, Jesse Armitage, N. W. Burris, J. R. Malone, W. W. DeLacy, H. J. Oliver, Robert Hereford, George A. Haynes, John Ryan and Thos. Hosford, and their legal associates for that purpose, and their successors, should be constituted a body politic and corporate, by the name and style of the East Ophir Town Company. The location was on the Missouri, opposite the mouth of the Marias river.

North Ophir.—The town of North Ophir was built up in May, 1865, by the Angevine and Burris parties. During that month eleven white men and one negro were attacked by Blood Indians. The act, incorporating the North Ophir Town Co., was approved February 6, 1865, giving to J. S. Glick, Frank Angevine, A. Young, Robert Hereford, B. B. Burchet, C. E. Irvine, Horace Annis, George Hill, Oliver Loutzenheiser, N. W. Burris, and others, power to lay out this town at the mouth of the Marias river, on its north bank.

Dupuyer, 100 miles northwest of Ft. Benton, on Dupuyer Creek, was first settled by whites in 1877. The number of white settlers there now is about 70. Julian F. Burd is postmaster, hotelkeeper, general merchant and stock grower. Daniel Sullivan is the village blacksmith.

Fort Assinaboine is a military post on Beaver creek, 60 miles northeast of Fort Benton, on the Belknap stage route. The establishment and history of this post is related in the general history. The 18th U. S. Infantry, which has garrisoned the post since May, 1879, was ordered to Ft. Leavenworth in April, 1885. The post of Fort Assinaboine was built for them, and is one of the largest posts in the United States. Great improvements have been made since the contractors completed their work, and it is now a beautiful soldiers' home. The 20th U. S. Infantry is ordered to garrison this post.

Belknap, on Milk river, 95 miles northeast of Ft. Benton, dates back for settlement to 1871. There are about 2,000 Indians at this point, while near the agency are the stores of Thomas O'Hanlon, Indian trader, and T. C. Power & Co.'s branch store. The former is postmaster.

Great Falls.—The town of Great Falls, Montana, was located and surveyed in July, 1883, by James J. Hill, of St. Paul, president of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Co., and Paris Gibson, of Ft. Benton. It is situated at the confluence of the Sun and Missouri rivers, and embraces within its limits the upper or Black Eagle Falls. The plain upon which it is located descends gradually to the river, and commands a magnificent view of the broad and fertile Sun river valley and the Rocky mountains. It would be impossible to find in picturesque Montana another location so beautiful and commanding as this. Lewis & Clarke, in their narrative of Explorations up the Missouri, dwell at length upon the beauties of this spot, where the waters of the Sun or Medicine and the Missouri unite. The river at this point, being somewhat obstructed by the rock formation at the head of the falls, becomes very broad, and resembles a great lake. This town site was selected because of its great natural attractions, its splendid water power, its rich surroundings of farming, grazing and mineral lands, and its available position for an eastern outlet by railroad through northern Montana and the Milk river valley, or by the Northern Pacific and its branches through the Judith basin, and by way of Helena. As stated, the Black Eagle Falls are within the limits of the town site, and consequently will be improved for manufacturing purposes. These falls are eleven hundred and fifty feet wide, and have an available fall of forty feet. Nowhere in the United States can there be found a great water power that is as safe and as easily controlled as this. It is the intention of the company to improve this water power at once, so that mill building can be commenced at an early day. The manufacture of flour and woolen goods, the grading, scouring and compressing of wool for eastern markets, machine shops and mills for the crushing and reduction of ores, are industries that can now be profitably established at this place. The close proximity to the water power of the great coal fields of Montana, from which excellent coke can be made, renders it certain that this will be the place for the treatment of ores from the adjacent mountains. Two miles below the Black Eagle Falls are the Fountain or Mammoth Spring and the Rainbow Falls, with a perpendicular pitch of fifty feet, and four miles below are the lower or Big Falls, with a pitch of ninety-three feet. These wonderful natural attractions cannot fail to make the town of Great Falls second only to the National Park, as a place of interest for tourists and pleasure seekers in Montana.

Great Falls Coal Co. was incorporated in 1884, and early that year begun work in the mines. In May, 1884, a 125 feet tunnel was completed, and a vein of fine coal tapped. The following gentlemen are directors: W. J. Miner, H. G. McIntire, E. G. Maclay, T. E. Collins, J. H. Rice, J. P. Dyas, and George Steell. Officers of the board were elected as follows: T. E. Collins, president; George Steell, vice-president; J. H. Rice, Secretary; W. J. Miner, treasurer.

Sun River District.—The number of persons in this district in 1880 (Choteau Co.) was 128. The development of this portion of the Territory is due to the manifold advantages its immense, well-watered grass fields offer to the stock grower. So early as 1877 stock raising was carried on on a grand scale in this and its tributary districts, as shown in the following list of herd owners and number of cattle: Jake Smith & Bro., 200; Samuel Ford, 400; Frank Goss, 200; Clark & Elen (2 herds), 10,000; Con. Kohrs, 6,000; Flowerree & Cox,

Among the first settlers were J. A. Vail, Mrs. Vail, Miss O'Brien (Mrs. Plummer), Indian Agent Reid, and James M. Arnoux.

A few hundred Blackfeet, Bloods, Piegans and Assiniboines are now holding from settlement all that tract of country from the eastern line of Montana to the Rocky Mountains lying north of the Missouri and Marias rivers. This tract is larger than all New England, and contains the most valuable portion of Montana for agriculture. As long as they are allowed to roam over this vast tract, and from its borders make predatory excursions into the adjoining settlements, efforts for their civilization are worse than useless. The existence of this extensive reservation, and the game found within it, have a powerful effect to retard the civilization of the Indians at Standing Rock and other agencies below, for the restless spirits there are constantly seeking some excuse to get away to their relatives at Poplar Creek or Wolf Point instead of remaining at home to cultivate their ground, as they should do. There is plenty of room for these Indians at Standing Rock, and under able management they would soon be on the road to civilization. The opening of this immense region of country from Fort Buford to the Rocky Mountains, would bring in a vast tide of immigration, new villages and cities would spring up along the Missouri, and Montana would receive some benefit from the westward wave of settlers. The Milk river flows through this tract from west to east for a distance of about 300 miles, with a wide and fertile valley nearly the whole distance. The Bear's Paw and Little Rocky mountains, known to be rich in the precious metals, are securely locked up in this reservation, and will remain so until the Indian title is extinguished. With these Indians located at one of the lower agencies, the military posts, now kept up at great expense to the country, could be safely dispensed with.

CHAPTER XIX.

CUSTER COUNTY.

THIS county was erected in 1877 by the Territorial Legislature, and named in honor of General Custer, who fell in the battle of the Little Big Horn, June 25, 1876. The county as defined in the act was 330x137 miles, containing an area of 45,210 square miles, being larger than the States of Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Delaware, and Rhode Island combined. The establishment of Dawson and Yellowstone counties has reduced the area to 32,000 square miles, still leaving the central county of the Yellowstone Valley much larger than many of the little kingdoms and principalities of the old world. According to the census returns, made in 1880 by Lt. O. F. Long, 5th U. S. Inf., the population of the Valley from Benson's Landing to Fort Keogh aggregated 588. Of these 215 were males, proprietors of ranches, etc., 73 women, 142 children, and 158 hired laborers. There were 429 buildings, 1,713 acres under cultivation, 23,435 head of cattle on pasture ranges, 645 horses and 8,201 sheep. There were in April, 1880, 54 settlers between Miles City and the mouth of the Yellowstone, making the total population of the Valley 642.

In Major McElrath's paper of July, 1883, there is found a topographical and hydrographical sketch of the county, compiled from information given by Colonel W. B. Gaw, county surveyor, who has made a special study of the topography of this section. The county is situated in the southeastern part of Montana. It lies wholly in the valley of the Yellowstone, except a small portion of its extreme southeastern part, which part is traversed by the Little Missouri river. With this single exception, every river, creek and stream in the county flows into the Yellowstone river.

The principal rivers are, in the order of their size, the Powder, Big Horn, Tongue, Rosebud and O'Fallon. All these streams take their rise in the Big Horn mountains, excepting the latter, which flows out of the high lands known as the Powder river "divide," a broken ridge lying between the Powder and Little Missouri rivers. These are the principal tributaries of the Yellowstone, and they vary from 200 miles to 75 miles in length. They all flow on nearly parallel lines and in a northerly direction across the county. This average descent is about four feet to the mile, river distance. The topographical features are somewhat peculiar as to the distance between the rivers and their principal tributaries, the Box Elder flowing into the Little Missouri, the Little Powder flowing into the Powder, the Little Big Horn flowing into the Big Horn, starting from the Little Missouri, thence northwesterly across the county to Box Elder 18 miles, thence to Little Powder river 30 miles, thence to the Powder river 12 miles, thence to the Tongue 36 miles, thence to the Rosebud 12 miles, thence to the Little Big Horn 30 miles, thence to the Big Horn, the western boundary line of the county, 12 miles. The parallelism of the rivers is one of the most significant features in the topographical structure of this county; and the same may be said of all the table lands or divides. From the rivers, on either side, the land rises from gently undulating surfaces into extended rolling plains, and finally becomes more broken and elevated about midway between the rivers. These central broken ridges are called "divides." "Across the county," from east to west, is a phrase invested with deep meaning, as the traveler discovers whose route lies in that direction. On the other hand, up or down the county, is generally significant of good level roads. All the river valleys in this county are what are technically known as "valleys of denudation"; that is they have been cut out by the action of rapid currents descending from the mountains in which they have their sources. Innumerable creeks and streams flow down from the "divides," ranging from 10 to 20 miles in length. In the southern part of the county many of the creeks have their sources in beautiful lakes situated on the top of extended table lands. And thousands of living springs abound both along the base of the "divides" and in the lowlands, and the numerous creeks to which these springs give rise flow with such velocity as to furnish mill sites at various points in their course. The elevation of these springs is so favorable, the rapidity of flow so great in the creeks, that it will be easy to supply abundant water on the bottom lands for irrigating the soil, if so required.

Pine and cedar timber upon the "divides" in almost every part of the county, and of an excellent quality, is found in great abundance. Large amounts of this timber, on lands adjacent to the Tongue river, are within easy floating distance to a ready market. On lands in close proximity to the larger creeks, cedar-wood of superior merchantable quality abounds in large quantity. Before long the pine and cedar wood of this county will become of commercial importance, and will find a ready market in Miles City.

The soil of the river and creek valleys is of excellent quality, and produces wheat, rye, oats, potatoes, all kinds of vegetables, and the usual fruits of the temperate region in abundance. Situated as this county has hitherto been, with limited intercourse with the world, there has been little inducement for tilling the ground, and therefore scientific farming is almost unknown. With proper attention, however, as will be given in the future, the valleys and much of the up-lands in this county will be made exceedingly productive. But it is not upon its agricultural value alone.

The first systematic effort at coal mining in this region was made by W. E. Schmalsle, in September, 1880. His mine is about four miles east of Miles City in the range of buttes made conspicuous by its most prominent peak the Tongue Butte, whence the river derives its name. A horizontal excavation was made that winter to a depth of about 150 feet and between 600 and 700 tons of coal were obtained. It found a ready and immediate sale in town at seven dollars per ton. The following year the mine was leased to Messrs. Gaw, Strader and Cook, who reported a product during the season of 1,000 tons. The price that winter was five dollars per ton. During the winter of 1882–3 the mine was worked by John Gibbs, an expert miner from Illinois, who sold during the season about 1,500 at an average price of four dollars and fifty cents. The mine is dry and readily accessible by good roads, and the coal has been found excellently adapted for working steam engines, being used exclusively in Bullard's brewery. The new Cheyenne Reservation in Custer county is thirty miles long and twenty miles wide. It is large enough to give each buck, squaw and pappoose in the tribe a square mile of land. The Crow Reservation is also another extravagance.

Organic.—The territory now known as Custer county may be said to be without organization until 1877. There was little there to organize previous to that year, except the unruly Sioux, the government of whom cost so many valuable lives and entailed so much expense on the country. A few trading posts and taverns were established within the present boundaries of the county; but nothing like a settlement was effected until 1877, after the establishment of Cantonment Keogh. The village of Miles (rich in her prospects), and the development of the grazing and agricultural wealth of the valley, drew to the Lower Yellowstone a small population, and to those first permanent settlers the credit of seeking for the establishment of a county government is due. The county commissioners appointed by Gov. B. F. Potts, in 1877, were Newman Borchardt, D. W. Ringer, and D. Harris. J. W. Smith was appointed vice D. Harris. The first county officers appointed by the board were: Alex. Carmichael, judge of probate; John McCormick, county clerk and recorder; Matthew Carroll, treasurer and collector; Hugh J. Hoppy, sheriff; Charles A. Johnson, assessor; Russell Briggs, justice of the peace; M. T. Hall, constable. Those appointments were made June 14, 1877, and on the same day Miles City was declared to be the county seat. In July, 1878, A. P. Flanigan was appointed assessor, vice Johnson, resigned. The board in session September 1, 1877, instructed the county clerk to advertise for proposals for the erection of county buildings. The buildings were completed in 1883, at a cost of about $50,000. As a souvenir of the county's early days, the following notice from the Independent is given: "The county seat of Custer county has been removed from Custer City to a point two miles below Fort Pease, opposite the new military supply post." Those changes were effected in 1877.

Elections 1878.—Delegate to Congress—Sample Orr, R., 10; Martin Maginnis, D., 342. Legislative Assembly—P. W. McAdow, D., 89; Paul McCormick, R., 258. District Attorney—R. P. Vivion, D., 54; James E. Callaway, R., 29. County Officers—Thomas H. Irvine, sheriff; Alexander Carmichael, probate judge; T. B. Wilson, clerk and recorder; Charles W. Savage, treasurer; A. P. Flanagan, assessor; James M. Turner, superintendent of schools.

Elections 1880.—County Commissioners—Josiah Nichols, D., 675; Edward Fawkes, D., 420; Alonzo McNeil, P., 74. Sheriff and Assessor—John W. Smith, D., 497; Thomas H. Irvine, D., 566; A. P. Flanagan, P., 120. Clerk and Probate Judge—Charles G. Cox, D., 394; Charles Walker, R., 567; W. H. Ross, P., 214. Treasurer and Superintendent of Schools—Louis Payette, D., 398; Charles W. Savage, R., 507; Edward Flynn, P., 274. County Surveyor—Martin Kelly, D., 675; H. A. Coombs, R., 225. Coroner—F. A. Davie, D., 597; A. H. Hersey, R., 467; J. B. Price, P., 112. Delegate to Congress—Martin Maginnis, D., 763; W. F. Sanders, R., 433. Councilmen—J. B. Hubbell, D., 616; Edward Cardwell, — 665; W. O. P. Hays, R., 669; W. W. Morris, D., 674; Paul McCormick, R., 548; P. V. Jackson, — 180; L. M. Black, R. 347; W. W. Alderson, R., 338. Representatives—James H. Garlock, D., 740; W. D. O'Toole, R., 429; A. N. Ball, P., 96. District Attorney—James E. Callaway, R., 408; F. K. Armstrong, D., 12. W. B. Towne was appointed clerk of probate court December 18, 1882, vice Samuel M. LeRoy, resigned.

The board appointed by the legislature in the act of March 8, 1883, appointed James H. Garlock county clerk and recorder, and R. E. Stower treasurer, vice the former officers removed, while the other county officers were continued in their positions. In September, 1878, James W. Allen was appointed commissioner vice John W. Smith, resigned; Stephen Taylor, county clerk, vice John McCormick, resigned; John McCormick, treasurer, vice Matthew Carroll, resigned.

Elections, 1882.—Congress—Maginnis, D., 1937; Botkin, R., 953. Council—Cox, 1430; Burleigh, 1,323. Representative—McAdow, 1,784; Alderson, 1,322; Erwin, 1,443; Foster, 1,082. Sheriff—Brady, 1,040; Johnson, 1,828. Treasurer—Curry, 1,005; Garland, 1,854. Clerk—O'Connell, 1,019; Taylor, 1,853. Assessor—Chennick, 285; Flanagan, 805; Wood, 782; Gates, 1,470. Judge of Probate—Staehle, 810; O'Connor, 463; Walker, 1,553. Commissioners—Leighton, 1,233; Hubbell, 1,357; Robertson, 1,390; Tinker, 1,270; McNeil, 1,224; Rich, 1,435; Bullard, 427. Surveyor—Gaw, 2,482. Coroner—Redd, 2,844; Superintendent—Logan, 1,744; Towers, 1,040.

The vote for county commissioners as canvassed May 2, 1883, was as follows: Alonzo McNeil, R., 149; T. J. Bryan, R., 830; W. H. Bullard, R., 745; C. W. Anderson, R., 845.

The act approved March 8, 1883, declared the offices of the county commissioners vacant, and ordered an election to be held in April, 1883, to fill these offices. Section 3 of the act provided that William Van Gaskin, Geo. M. Miles and Thomas J. Bryan be appointed to discharge the duties of commissioners, and they acted until the commissioners elected qualified.

The grand jury present at the April term of the district court, held at Miles City, in April, 1883, comprised—C. LeSeur, L. A. Huffman, A. P. Flannagan, W. B. S. Higgins, F. A. Routhier, G. P. Comstock, Wm. H. Guthrie, W. L. Lansing, Geo. A. Carpenter, C. C. Howes, J. M. Sharp, R. E. Campbell, C. W. Anderson, Addison Meyers, Thomas Alexander and T. J. Thompson. This jury arraigned the old county commissioners, and found indictments against them; Chief Justice Wade found it necessary to continue the cases.

The elections of 1884 resulted in the choice of the following named officers: W. H. Cotant, R., territorial council; W. B. S. Higgins and W. A. Burleigh, R., representatives; C. W. Savage, sheriff; S. O'Connell, assessor; B. W. Ladd, treasurer; M. Brandenburg, treasurer, 1885; L. C. Dear, recorder; W. C. Staehle, probate judge; A. C. Logan, superintendent of schools; W. H. Ross, public administrator; H. G. Redd, coroner; Chas. Tabor, surveyor; L. J. Whitney, T. J. Bryan and C. W. Anderson, commissioners. The vote recorded for congressional delegate was, for Joseph K. Toole, D., 720; for Hiram Knowles R., 686.

The indebtedness of the county, referred to in the general history, was funded in 1883, under authority granted by the legislature in the act approved March 6, 1883, empowering the commissioners to sell county bonds to the amount of $225,000.

Schools.—The condition of the schools of the county at the beginning of 1883 is shown in the following report of Superintendent A. C. Logan: School census ending December 1, 1882: Whole number census scholars, 4 to 21 years of age, 633; whole number under 4 years of age, 188; total number under 21 years of age, 821. Collections for fiscal year ending December 1, 1882: Amount of county tax collected, $2,846.49; amount of special district tax collected, $1,276.79; total amount from all sources, $4,559.28. There were five teachers employed. The advances made from 1883 to 1885 are phenomenal.

Road Supervisors.—The number of road districts in the county in July, 1883, was twenty-two, the supervisors of which are named in the following list: 1, R. E. Campbell; 2, John Woodliff; 3, Alonzo McNeil; 4, B. A. Bowen; 5, James Turner; 6, H. C. Howard; 7, E. P. Rowe; 8, Jas. M. Sharp; 9, S. G. Hotchkiss; 10, Ben. Mason; 11, Chas. Daly; 12, P. W. information at hand. He says: "I have been counting up only what herds I know of, and they are as follows:

Name of Owners and Location.	No. of Head.	Name of Owners and Location.	No. of Head.
Meyers Bros., Powder River	3,500	Carpenter & Robinson, Rosebud River	11,000
E. C. Dugg & Bros., Powder River	5,000	Hubbard Thompson Cattle Company, Rosebud	6,000
Brown, Hallett & Co., Powder River	30,000	L. De Hart, Rosebud	2,000
Pratt, Ferris & Co., Powder River	12,000	Charles Lesueur, Rosebud	500
H. A. Blair, Powder River	6,000	Charles Whitman, Rosebud	500
New York Cattle Company, Powder River	14,000	Capt. Harman, O'Fallon Creek	2,500
H. W. Davis, Powder River	1,000	B. L. Ferris, O'Fallon Creek	1,500
Peters & Alston, Powder River	4,000	Yellowstone Cattle Company, Buffalo Rapids	1,000
Hackney & Co., Clear Fork of Powder	5,000	Fish & Stewart, Sweeney Creek	1,000
Stoddart & Co., Clear Fork of Powder	20,000	Ryan & Levy, Little Porcupine	13,000
Heiland & Pfeifer, Clear Fork of Powder	2,000	John Parker, Little Porcupine	10,000
Plunkett, Roach & Co., North Powder River	6,000	Zoak & Alderson, Lame Deer Creek	700
Hank & Scott, Powder and Tongue Rivers	20,000	Grinnell Live Stock Company of Iowa, Goose Creek	12,000
Niobrara Cattle Company, Powder and Tongue Rivers	13,000	Cross & Dundick, Goose Creek	600
Howes & Strevelle, Tongue River	2,000	Carpenter & Robinson, Running Water	500
Hardin, Campbell & Co., Tongue River	7,000	E P. Furguson, Soldier's Creek	700
J. H. Conrad, Tongue River	14,000	M. H. & W. A. Murphy, Piney Creek	8,000
Frewen Cattle Company, Tongue River	60,000	Barrett & Clark, Crazy Woman's Fork	600
Concord Cattle Company, Tongue River	6,000	T. J. Bryan & Van Gaskin, Otter Creek	3,000

Besides these there are many other smaller herds of 100, 200 and 300 head of which no account is taken, and likely these if counted would foot up 8,000 to 9,000 more. P. L. Ware, of Chicago, has 10,000 head of cattle somewhere on the head of Tongue or Powder river, but I do not know where. Marshall Field also has a herd of 8,000 to 10,000 up there, but I think it is owned jointly with two or three other Chicago gentlemen. The above herds are nearly all tributary to Miles City, Mont., from which point they draw their supplies, and it is at Miles they ship their cattle east. The number of cattle now tributary to Miles City is about 400,000 head. The capacity of the grazing grounds tributary to Miles is probably 1,000,000 head, so that the ground is not yet more than half taken."

Sheep Farming.—General Brisbin, referring to the sheep industry, says: "At first I was disposed to think sheep would not do well in Montana. I remember very well in 1877, while in command at Fort Ellis, near Bozeman, a man from California came there with 3,000 sheep bound for the Yellowstone valley. I thought he would lose every one of them the first winter, and so told him, but he came down the valley and made a ranche on Tongue River. I waited to see his sheep die, but they did not die. Next year several herds were driven in and all did well. Now we have more than 50,000 head of sheep on the Yellowstone—so I guess I was mistaken. The herds about Miles City are as follows:

Names of Owners and Location.	No. of Head.	Names of Owners and Location.	No. of Head.
Geo. Meyers & Bro., Powder River	10,000	Bay City Stock Company, Tongue River	2,000
Perkins Russell, Mizpah	4,000	John Clarke, Sand Creek	1,500
S. R. Douglas, Mizpah	2,000	Howe & Strevelle, Tongue River	1,400
Newman Bros., O'Fallon	2,500	Crane & Headley & Co., Tongue River	5,000
J. R. Goodfellow, O'Fallon	500	N. R. Miller, Tongue River	500
Loyd Selway, Pumpkin Creek	1,800	Whitney & Grimwett, Tongue River	1,000
C. Daly, Pumpkin Creek	2,500	W. Wolfe, Tongue River	300
C. Bracken, Yellowstone	2,500	O. Johnson, Tongue River	1,000
Guy & Sons, Yellowstone	2,000	J. J. Graham, Tongue River	1,000
I. Nichols, Yellowstone	1,500	J. D. Howard, Tongue River	1,000
Poindexter & Orr, Pumpkin Creek	4,000	Oscar Brackett, Terry	400
Talbot, Pumpkin Creek	800	George M. Miles, Tongue River	1,600
Conover & Edwards, Powder River	2,500	McClintock & Dowd, Tongue River	6,000
J. M. Sharpe, Tongue River	5,000

All these herds are doing well, and this winter hardly a death has occurred so far. It is only ten years since the first sheep were brought into Montana, and last year the wool-clip was over 3,000,000 pounds. The climate gives the finest fibre to the wool, and the sheep seem hardy and healthy. Sheep require less capital than cattle, the returns are quicker and the profits larger. Last year the deaths were only two per cent. in the flocks. Many of the ewes have twins, and the herds increase rapidly. The experiment of sheep-raising having been tried in Montana and proved successful, large numbers of sheep are now being driven into the Territory."

Land Office.—The Miles City U. S. Land District embraces Custer, Dawson, parts of Meagher, Choteau and Yellowstone counties, or from R. 27 E. to Dakota, and from Wyoming to the Canadian line. The business of the office for the year ending June 30, 1883:—Homesteads, 17,217.03 acres; coal filings, 740.86; coal cash entries, 20.96; preëmption filings, 6,836.81; timber culture, 5,278.20; soldiers' D. S., 432.73; desert lands, none; cash sales, 988.59; final homesteads, 1,689.15; R. R. selections, 196,234.21. There are open for settlement, outside Indian and military reservations, and railroad lands in this district, 5,119,200 acres. When the Crow and other reservations are declared open to entry, some of the best lands in the Territory will be at the disposal of this office. Register E. A. Kriedler was appointed when the office was opened, October 9, 1880. Major McElrath was appointed Recorder at this time. He was succeeded by Charles H. Gould, who resigned in April, 1885. The "homestead" farms on the Yellowstone above Miles City on the first of March, 1880, were 74 in number. Of these 27 were entered in 1879; 19 in 1878, and 3 in 1880.

The Custer Battle Monument, which was placed in position in 1883, is an excellent work of art. Its base is five feet six inches square and twelve inches in height, with beveled edges, the sides and top dressed in style known as "cut work," leaving the stone in the same color as it appears in the ledge. The die is four feet and six inches square at the base, and inclines slightly to within a few inches of the top, where it slopes abruptly, terminating in a point. The whole monument is five feet six inches. Each side of the die is highly polished, while the top is "cut work." On one side of the monument is the following inscription: "To the officers and soldiers killed or who died of wounds received in action in the Territory of Montana, while clearing the district of the Yellowstone of hostile Indians." On the other three sides are the names of the thirty-nine officers and privates, with the regiment and company to which each belonged, and the place and date of the action resulting in their death. The inscription and names embrace some 1,400 letters and characters, cut in the Egyptian style of letter. The monument weighs 16,000 pounds of Monticello granite, and cost $1,800. MILES CITY.

This city is located on the Tongue river, near the confluence of that stream with the Yellowstone. No town on the line of the Northern Pacific railroad west of the Missouri river, says Major McElrath, has such a combination of geographical advantages. Following the large valleys of the Yellowstone's confluents from the south, a vast area will be found to be tributary, reaching from the Black Hills in Dakota, and almost from the valley of the Platte, in Wyoming. As a matter of fact, ranchmen and stockraisers from both directions travel from 150 to 300 miles with their wagon trains to Miles to procure their supplies, and much of the Wyoming traffic, which heretofore has found an outlet over the Union Pacific railroad, finds its way now to the northern Pacific at this point. On the north, Sunday creek and numerous other streams open through Miles City the most accessible outlet for a vast area extending through rich mining, agricultural and grazing districts, far beyond the northern boundary of the Territory. Although young, as a town, the location it occupies is invested with historical association. Scarce eight years ago the site upon which it stands was a favorite camping ground for the savage Sioux. That tribe had then been for many years engaged in waging relentless war against the whites. The sheltered position of the region among the hills, and the advantage of its location at the confluence of the Yellowstone and Tongue rivers, made it a valuable strategic point, in addition to the advantages it offered as a constant resort for game of all kinds. From the earliest discovery of the Tongue valley by adventurous trappers, prior to the famous trans-continental exploration by Lewis and Clarke in 1805, all of the eastern Montana wilderness had been in the exclusive possession of the red man. But in the centennial year of our national history a change was initiated, which was destined to transform the character of the entire region, and to substitute, almost as if by magic, civilization in the place of primeval barbarism. After the melancholy massacre of Custer's command, on the Little Big Horn in 1876, it was decided to establish a strong permanent military post at the mouth of the Tongue river, where the approaches from Dakota and Wyoming through the valleys of the Yellowstone, the Tongue, the Powder and the Rosebud rivers could be simultaneously guarded. The 5th U. S. Infantry, under Colonel N. A. Miles, was left to occupy the frontier. In December, 1876, while a large part of the command was chasing Sitting Bull among the snow-covered Bad Lands, the balance built a cantonment of log huts on the west branch of the Tongue, near its mouth. The following year Fort Keogh was built. The original reservation of the post extended a couple of miles eastward and included the present site of Miles City. A town was begun on the banks of the Yellowstone, which, fostered by the proximity of a fourteen company post, began at once to thrive, but the reservation was reduced in April, 1878, and a more advantageous site for a town was selected on the east bank of the Tongue river, two miles nearer Fort Keogh. The "Old Town," as it is still named, was abandoned for business purposes, and in the fall of 1878 Miles City entered at once upon the brilliant career, which will sustain it permanently as the most important town, and probably the only important one, in Montana, east of the Rocky Mountains. Seventy-two years before that date the Lewis & Clarke expedition descending the Yellowstone, were detained in July, 1806, at the mouth of the Tongue river for an hour, to allow a herd of buffalo to cross the former stream. They were the first white men who are known to have been in this vicinity. The wilderness they discovered and described endured in its primitive condition for three quarters of a century, and then suddenly disappeared before the overwhelming wave of civilization and progress.

The business houses of the village from 1879 to 1884–5, are named as follows: Matthew Carroll & Co., general merchants; Broadwater, Hubble & Co., general merchants; Oliver & Leland, whisky dealers; Paul McCormick & Co., general merchants; John Chemick, saloon; Savage & Ninninger, merchandise and fire-arms; George Silverberg, tobacco dealer; J. J. Graham, groceries, liquors, cigars; W. A. Peterson, first hotel and restaurant; Roberts & Hoppy, large saloon; M. Cahn, liquors, etc.; James H. Brewer, merchant; J. M. Gilman, hardware; Charles Johnson, merchant; Phillip Zimmerman, tailor; John Meany, bakery; Mr. Keogh, tailor; W. H. Tracy, merchant; Ringer & McMillan, livery; Louis Sperling, merchant; Mr. Basinski, stationery, books, etc.; Wm. Reece & Fitzsimmons, saloon; Chris. Hehli, barber shop; Taylor & Bernard, restaurant; P. H. Trudell, saloon; A. R. Pratt, saloon; B. F. Cline, saloon; A. D. Moorehead, barber shop. The population in 1879 was 450. To-day the number of inhabitants is given at 2,200, and the number of public and private buildings at 500. The growth of the town during the four and a half years of its existence has been remarkable. From a little frontier settlement, located in the heart of a wilderness occupied by hostile savages, it has developed into a handsome town, the center of an extended and steadily growing civilization. Log cabins have been replaced with tasteful frame and brick structures; and neighboring ranches which, even five years ago, were occupied by men alone, seeking protection with loaded rifles always close at hand, are now the thrifty homes of families from every part of the United States. Among the public and business buildings of the city in July, 1883, were the county court-house, post-office, First National Bank, Catholic, Presbyterian, Episcopal, Baptist and Methodist churches, theatre, Masonic hall, city brewery, Grand Central hotel, Merchants' hotel, Commercial hotel, Metropolitan hotel, the offices of the Press and Journal, C. W. Savage & Sons, Basinski Bros.' book-store, W. C. Savage & Co.'s drug store, Leighton, Jordan & Co.'s grocery store, T. J. Bryan's lumber yard, Miles and Strevell's hardware store, stock yards, saw-mill, Brandenburg & Van Gaskin's meat-market, Charles Brown's auction rooms, Wm. Courtenay's real-estate office, Stebbins, Mund & Co.'s bank, and the school house. The wholesale and retail liquor trade is well represented, while many houses are devoted to miscellaneous trading. The professions are represented by Strevell & Garlock, Wm. H. Ross, Arthur H. O'Connor, lawyers; R. G. Redd, A. C. Girard, U. S. A., J. Jay Wood, physicians; H. D. Dodge, surgeon dentist, and W. B. Gaw, civil engineer.

Societies—Custer Lodge, No. 13, I. O. O. F., Miles City, was organized with a large membership. The list of members is as follows: J. W. Johnson, N. G.; F. H. Irvin, V. G.; L. C. Dear, S.; M. Brandenburg, treasurer; Charles Anderson, W. Baehr, D. Bishop, A. Brile, E. F. Bumps, J. H. Bohling, Simon Basiniski, G. H. Cahon, E. K. Davis, L. C. Dear, P. Fox, T. Fisher, E. Goettlich, John Honis, H. A. Holst, S. T. Johnson, J. Long, Jacob Levi, W. Land, S R. McGowan, A. J. Maxwell, John O'Sullivan, F. Orshell, O. F. Robbas, James Rosebrough, L. B. Shornfield, C. W. Savage, G. W. Savage, C. St. Clair, C. Taushir, J. F. Unger, Wm. Van Gasken, H. E. Wolf and Robert Wyatt.

Miles City Typographical Union, No. 204, was duly chartered and organized in 1883. The membership was never large.

Crusader Lodge, No. 7, K. of P., Miles City, organized April 22, 1883, with the following named officers: Geo. E. Cole, P. C.; J. Johnson, C. C.; M. M. Russell, V. C; Joseph Swerdfinger, P.; L. C. Dear, M. of E.; J. Leroy, M. of F.; C. E. Littell, K. of R. & S.; A. E. Baird, M. at A., and John Unger, I. G. This Lodge is in the jurisdiction of Montana.

Knights of Honor: A meeting of the charter members of the new lodge of Knights of Honor was held at the office of Cahn & Schoenfeld in August, 1883. A. Schoenfeld was elected chairman and Chas. Douglass, secretary. There are twenty-eight charter members, and the papers having been all perfected were forwarded to the Grand Lodge. The name of the new organization is Miles City Lodge, K. of H. A charter was granted September 23, 1883, when John Sherlock was elected Dictator, B. S. Schoenfeld, P. D.; G. Waples, V. D.; W. B. Towne, assistant; C. F. M. Tingling, reporter; Chas. Douglass, Financial Reporter; W. E. Savage, treasurer; Dr. J. J. Wood, G.; Patrick Dowdall, I. G.; James Kehoe, O. G.; Wm. Horsfall, chaplain.

Yellowstone Lodge, No. 26, A. F. & A. M., was chartered October 4, 1882, with the following members: Edward A. Kreidler, W. M.; Thomas A. Davis, S. W.; Julius Bauman, J. W.; Charles A. Archer, J. D.; Morris Cahn, J. S.; Ferdinand A. Ruthier, Treasurer; A. K. Yerkes, Secretary; Kenneth Brice, S. D.; George A. Merrit, S. S.; Louis King, Tyler; George A. Carpenter, Sigismund M. Ritter, C. W. Savage, George B. Silverberg, Jacob H. Finley, Wallace E. Beaman, Daniel Robinson, Sam. O'Connell, George B. Whited, Donald P. McMillan.

The Custer County Wool Growers' Association was organized March 19, 1883, with Perkins Russell, president; Addison Meyers, vice-president; George M. Miles, recording and corresponding secretary.

New England Society, the first organization of this kind in Montana Territory, was effected at Miles City, December, 1883, with the following officers: W. J. Fish, M. A., president; C. B. Towers, vice-president; Dr. C. S. Whitney, secretary and treasurer; George M. Miles, Captain C. C. Howes, J. J. Wood, M. D.; Lieutenant Fred Perkins, Paris Fletcher, executive committee. A large membership was at once secured, and the society celebrated the memory of the Pilgrims, December 24, at the Presbyterian Church. A full orchestra was in attendance, and the national ensign conspicuous among the decorations.

Miles City Club, organized in October, 1884, has now a membership of fifty. The present officers are S. F. B. Biddle, president; A. C. Logan, vice-president; H. F. Bachelor, treasurer, and S. Gordon, secretary. The object of this club is to provide a visitors' room, where members and strangers might pass their leisure hours.

Board of Trade.—This association of business men was instituted March 5, 1883. At a meeting held in the metropolitan hotel that day a temporary organization was effected by calling John J. Graham to the chair, and naming George Miles, secretary. A committee consisting of Messrs. Graham, Dr. Burleigh, C. W. Savage, Van Gasken, McClintock, McElrath and Gordon were appointed to prepare a scheme for permanent organization and draft by-laws. At the same meeting a permanent organization was effected by the election of John J. Graham, president; William Van Gasken, vice-president; Sam Gordon, secretary; and C. W. Savage, treasurer. This list was subsequently supplemented by the election of Messrs. McClintock and W. H. Oxley, second and third vice-presidents respectively. On the 8th of May, scarce two months from its organization, the members of the board were called upon to mourn the loss of their first president, John J. Graham. William Van Gasken was unanimously elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Graham, and Mr. James Basinski was named as vice-president. For the first six weeks of its existence the board met by courtesy of Mr. Charles H. Gould in his hall, and about the 15th of April they took possession of their present quarters over Savage & Sons' store, where meetings are held every Tuesday evening at eight o'clock.

Banks.—The First National Bank of Miles City was organized under the general law, June 12, 1882, with Joseph Leighton, president; Richard E. Stower, secretary and cashier; Alfred Myers, James S. Brisbin, W. H. Guthrie, John J. Graham, George M. Miles, directors; Charles N. Strevell, John Carter and Walter A. Burleigh, jr., original members of the company, are now among its directors. The United States comptroller granted a permit to begin business July 7, 1882, and on August 1, 1882, the First National was opened. The paid up capital is $50,000, surplus $25,000, and authorized capital $250,000. The bank building was erected in 1882 at a cost of about $14,000. The present officers of the First National are named as follows: Joseph Leighton, president; George M. Miles, vice-president; H. F. Batchelor, cashier; E. B. Weirick, assistant cashier; Joseph Leighton, Thomas J. Bryan, J. W. Watson, Charles N. Strevell, Richard E Stower, George M. Miles, Walter B. Jordan, J. C. Carter.

Stebbins, Mund & Co.'s bank was established December 12, 1882, by W. R. Stebbins, H. H. Mund and John J. Coleman, who carried on the business of banking at Miles, Billings and Livingstone, until the summer of 1883, when the company withdrew from the latter towns, and consentrated their business at Miles City. The bank is associated with Stebbins, Post & Co., Cheyenne, Wyo.; Stebbins, Post & Co., Silver Cliff, Col.; Stebbins Post & Mund, Billings, M.T.; Stebbins, Mund & Co., Livingston, M.T.; Merchants' National Bank, Deadwood, D. T.; Stebbins, Mund & Fox, Central City, Dak.; Stebbins, Fox & Co., Spearfish, Dak.; Stebbins, Conrad & Co., Buffalo, Wyo.

Stockgrowers' National Banking Co., successors to Stebbins, Mund & Co., was incorporated with capital stock placed at $100,000. The officers of the bank are: W. R. Stebbins, president; Wm. Harmon, vice-president; F. E. Hammond, cashier; H. B. Wiley, assistant cashier.

The corresponding banks are the National Bank of the Republic, New York; First National Bank, Chicago; First National Bank, St. Paul; First National Bank, Bismarck; First National Bank, Billings; First National Bank, Helena; Merchants' National Bank, Deadwood, Dak.; M. E. Post & Co., Cheyenne, Wyo.

Artesian Well.—The Yellowstone Artesian Well Company is the name of an enterprise formed in July, 1883. The officers were elected as follows: President, T. H. Irvine; vice-president, W. F. Schmalsle; treasurer, W. H. Bullard; secretary, W. L. Lansing; superintendent, Berthold Ullman. The capital stock is $20,000. In April, 1884, the workmen struck flowing water at a depth of 341 feet. An analysis of the water proves it to contain more than sixty grains of carbonate of soda to the gallon. A second well has reached the depth of 321 feet, without a flow of water.

Churches.—The religious organizations of Miles City comprise, St. John Baptist's Catholic congregation, the Protestant Episcopal, the Presbyterian, the Methodist Episcopal and the Baptist societies. The church of St. John Baptist is attended from Fort Keogh by Rev. E. W. J. Lindesmith, U. S. A., who is also pastor of the Catholic congregations on the Crow Reservation, and at Fort Buford, Dakota Territory. Rev. G. C. Stull is pastor of the M. E. Society; Rev. G. D. Downey, of the Baptist; Rev. Mr. Horsfall, of the Protestant Episcopal; and Rev. E. P. Linnell, of the Presbyterian. In the following review of church organizations at Miles City, Rev. J. R. Hewitt deals with the subject:

"The first public religious service held at Miles City was that by Rev. J. R. Hewitt, January 12, 1879, in the hall over the store. I remained all the following week and preached at Fort Keogh to a few officers and their wives, and to a few soldiers. In the afternoon we held our Sabbath school in the probate judge's office, or 'court house,' as it was called by courtesy. In the evening I preached in the probate court room, and this closed my work at Miles. I forgot to say that Geo. M. Miles was made superintendent of the Sabbath school, and Mrs. C. W. Savage assistant. On my return I sent supplies to the school. I am told that the unfinished hall referred to was the room in Maj. Borchardt's building, over the post office. There the first service was held in the morn of January 12, 1879, and the first Sabbath school organized in the afternoon of that day in the old log school-house on Main street, opposite the store of the late J. J. Graham. On the following Sabbath the school met in the old court house, and there public service was held in the evening. The school there organized has been maintained since, with the exception of a short interval in the spring of 1882, when the small-pox was epidemic here. It has held its sessions sometimes in the old log school-house, sometimes in the house now occupied by Dr. J. J. Wood; then in the old log court house; in the room over the store of the late J. J. Graham; in the unoccupied store of C. H. Gould until April 15 last, when it entered its comfortable home in this building. After the Rev. Mr. Hewitt I cannot find that any clergyman held service here for more than a year and a half until July, 1880, when the Rev. C. L. Richards, then presiding pastor at Bozeman, spent some time here. His visit was soon followed by the arrival of Rev. W. L. Austin, who came under the care of the Board of Home Missions, and reached here September 14, 1880. In a letter, lately received from him, he says: 'At that time there was no church organization. After visiting from house to house I found twelve Christians, belonging to four different denominations, who were willing to unite and form a Presbyterian church. The date of the organization was October 20, 1880. There had been a Sabbath school organization before I came to the place, but soon it came under the care of the church. My average congregation numbered about thirty or forty.' The original officers of the church were elders J. W. Strevell and M. G. Maples, and trustees L. K. Wescott, C. A. Winchester, and E. M. Miles. Elder Strevell and trustee Miles still remain in the service of the church. The Rev. Mr. Austin remained less than a year, being called away late in the spring of 1881 by sickness in the family. Then there followed an interval of more than a year, during which this church was severely tried. Failure to get a pastor was all the more discouraging because these efforts seemed promising at first. For example, in one instance a minister accepted the call of the Board, made his arrangements to leave his former charge, and the church here anxiously awaited his arrival, but his presbytery thought him too useful a man to leave the east, and hence declined to release him from his former charge. Another instance was equally discouraging. Early in June, 1882, brother E. J. Thompson, of Casselton, D. T., was sent here by the Board to look over the field and consider the duty of moving here from Casselton. Mr. Thompson went back to Casselton, I believe fully intending to return to this church, but circumstances there were such that it did not seem best that he should leave his people. Still a third effort to secure a pastor failed, until it was not strange that the few who had the interests of this little church at heart became disheartened. The present church was dedicated June 17, 1873, by Rev. Mr. Linnell."

These incidents sketch the history of this organization down to the middle of June, 1882. In the meantime three of the other Protestant denominations had begun work here. The Methodist Episcopal was the second to enter the field, brother Van Orsdale, general missionary for this territory, coming here soon after brother Austin left in 1880. He remained only a few weeks. Then in September, 1881, more permanent work was undertaken by brother McNiff. He remained seven months, or until April, 1881, when he was compelled by ill health to leave. Next in order of denominational work was a short visitation by the missionary Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church early in the winter of 1880–81. After him the rector of Bozeman spent a few days here in July, 1882. Yet but little work was done by this denomination until early in the fall of 1882. In April, 1882, the Baptist denomination began work here under direction of their present pastor. Although the last to enter the field, they were the first to make their work appear in the tangible form of a church edifice, using their new church in about eight weeks after the arrival of the minister.

The Catholic church was founded at Miles City in the fall of 1881, and on Christmas day of that year the church building was opened. Rev. Father Veneman, S. J., was the projector of this building, and he it was who collected the greater part of the building fund. Father Linderman, chaplain at Fort Keogh, held services in the homes of the people previous to the completion of the church, and now officiates as priest of that mission.

The Fire of 1883.—A fire broke out in the Cosmopolitan theatre, on Main street, July 22, 1883, and in a few moments the flames had gained such headway that it was impossible to extinguish them. The theatre in a short time was a mass of flames. Next the flames fell upon a row of three small buildings, occupied by Merritt as a lunch counter, Brown's tobacco store and Bishop's Side-Board saloon. These were quickly consumed. The fire quickly spread to the next building, which was known as "Flick's" gambling hall, owned by Charles Bishop. This building, being of pine logs, gave out a great heat, and the fire here gained so much strength that the block at one time was given up as lost. From this building it spread to the large and handsome store of Basinski & Bros., stationery and general dealers, and in a few moments what was a magnificent store was a total wreck. The next building to succumb to the flames was the drug store of W. E. Savage & Co., a large two-story frame building adjoining the First National Bank. It was also quickly destroyed, and, by the frantic efforts of the citizens, the fire was here stopped. The bank building being of brick interposed as a barrier to the further advance of the fire. The loss is estimated at various figures, by some as high as $100,000. The insurance is considerable and may amount to about $50,000, mostly in the Phœnix, Liverpool, London and Globe and Ætna companies. The Cosmopolitan theatre, where the fire originated, was situated on the northeast corner of Main and Sixth streets, and was a handsome and well appointed theatre, said to be the best one of its kind in the Territory, and cost $8,000. It was owned by H. E. Wolf, leased by John Chinnick, and was doing a good business. All the performers employed there lost their wardrobes, and everything connected with the theatre was burned. Three attempts had been made at various times to burn it down, but were discovered in time to prevent the desired purpose. The building next was owned by Charles Bishop and rented by "Flick," was not insured. Basinski Bros. lost $40,000, as they had a very large and costly stock of goods in the building. They were partially insured. The drug store of W. E. Savage & Co., in which Dr. Read was a partner, was well insured, and the loss not heavy, although a large assortment of fancy goods and drugs were always kept in stock. The fire department was promptly on hand, but the fire had gained such headway that their efforts were useless.

Hanging of Rigney.—After the excitement attending the fire of July 22 subsided a party of masked and determined men proceeded to the county jail and took therefrom Bill Rigney, who had been incarcerated a few days before, and after some trouble was taken out, a rope put round his neck and taken to the railroad bridge over Tongue river, distant about half a mile, and there launched into the dim and uncertain future. The act meets with the approbation of all who are good citizens, and the verdict is that he got his just dues.

Fires of May, 1885.—The fire of May 4, 1885, destroyed a block in the older part of the town. The heaviest sufferers were T. B. Burleigh, $12,000; Basinski Bros., $10,000; Brandenburgh & Van Gasken, $10,000; E. Butler, $3,000; Breback, $2,000; Strevell & Garlock $1,600; A. Smith, $1,500; K. Schmid, $1,200; N. Brochardt, Moran Bros., Dr. Davie, Hanauer & Martindale, each $1,000. The total losses are placed at $60,000, covered by an insurance of $38,050. Among the buildings burned was the postoffice.

The fire of May 22, 1885, is said to have begun in the kitchen of the Merchants' Hotel. A detailed list of the losses, with the insurance, is given below: Commercial Hotel, A. Burgrad, loss $4,000, no insurance; Merchants' Hotel and furniture, loss $5,500, no insurance; Judge Brown's building, loss $4,000, no insurance; Joseph Leighton, eight buildings, loss $10,000, insurance $8,000; John Carter's restaurant, loss $5,000, insurance $3,000; I. Orschel & Bro., loss $25,000, insurance $15,000; King & Ward, saloon, loss $1,500, no insurance; R. C. Richmond, jeweler, loss $1,000, insurance $1,000; Dr. C. B. Lebcher, building, loss $2,500, no insurance; C. K. Sherburne, general store, damage $300, insurance $300; First National Bank, damage $3,000, insurance $3,000; Stockgrowers' National Bank, damage $1,000, insurance $1,000; James Coleman, saloon, loss $1,500, insurance $1,000; Captain J. W. Smith, loss $1,000, insurance $1,000; Ed. Jones, loss $1,000, no insurance; Chas. Bishop, boots and shoes, $500, no insurance; A. Gumpel, tailor, $250, no insurance; A. W. Sleeper, building, loss $5,000, insurance $2,000; J. Basinski & Bro., fancy goods, loss $1,000, insurance $500; Wright & Bro., druggists, loss $2,500, insurance $4,000; I. Silverman, clothing, loss $100, insurance $5,000; Custer Lodge, I. O. O. F., loss $500, insurance $1,000; Dr. R. G. Redd, building, loss $1,000, insurance $1,000; A. J. Kennedy, saloon, loss $600, no insurance; E. Goetthck, saddlery, loss $3,500, insurance $3,000; Mrs. Zahl, hotel, loss $800, insurance $800; J. W. Watson, dry goods, loss $1,200, insurance $1,200; Guy Durkee, saloon, $1,000, insurance $600; Miles & Strevell, hardware, loss $7,500, insurance $8,500; Dr. Davies, building, loss $200, no insurance; M. Mitchell, building, loss $1,200, no insurance; Sam Pepper, loss slight, no insurance; H. S. Daniels, tobacconist, loss $2,000, insurance $1,000; J. H. Conrad & Co., grocers, damage $100, insured; N. Nathan, ladies' fancy goods, slightly damaged, insured; C. B. Towers, boots and shoes, damaged slightly, insured; Will Savage, druggist, damage $500, insured; Miles City Club, slightly damaged, insured; Louis Haineman, loss $500, no insurance.

SMALL SETTLEMENTS.

The Crow Agency.—The present Crow agency buildings are situated about fourteen miles south of Fort Custer, near to the Custer battle-field, on the north of said field and on the west bank of the Little Big Horn, ninety miles east of the old agency. Twenty-five buildings for the use of the Indians were put up under the supervision of Col. Melborn, of Washington, D. C., an inspector in the Indian Bureau who had been detailed to superintend the work. The history of the old Crow reservation is given in the Indian chapter of the general history. There are about one hundred white residents in and around the agency. Dunn, Lee and Babcock are post traders. Mission Lodge, No. 45, I. O. G. T., Crow agency, was organized by Joseph Mason April 15, 1874. The original members numbered thirty-six. James Wright was elected First Lodge Deputy. Speaking of the Agency school, the Billings Gazette of June, 1885, says: "It seems desirable that a searching investigation should be made in the management of the Indian boarding school at the Crow agency. One man removed his daughter from that institution rather than have her contaminated by the evils alleged to abound there."

Forsythe.—Opposite this point in 1879, a few residents, travelers and soldiers, had an engagement with the Sioux and Crows, killing five and wounding many. The Sioux were pursued twenty five miles up the Little Porcupine, and many of the horses which they had stolen were recaptured. The business circle in 1884–5 comprised the following named members: T. Alexander, general store and postmaster; Alexander & Lyman, H. R. Marcy, Geo. Taylor, general store; C. W. Anderson, meats; Bosworth & Campbell, Duffy & Ruddy, Nels Gunderson, saloons; T. J. Bryan, lumber; C. A. Duffy, blacksmith; R. M. J. Glynn, railroad and express agent; J. Harber, telegraph agent; A. J. Kimball, hotel.

Terry.—This location was entered May 7, 1883, and before the close of June over two hundred building lots were purchased. In July, 1883, there were several business houses in active operation there, including Flanigan's boarding house, Cole & Kelly's restaurant, Sam Hilburn's store, Williams' saloon and Cole's saloon, besides other stores, a blacksmith shop, etc., etc. The ferry at that point is the only means of crossing the Yellowstone between Glendive and Miles City. North and south of Terry there are fine stock ranges and splendid farms open to settlement, a large tract being surveyed and not yet wholly located upon. The stock industry is likely to be the basis of Terry's future prosperity, as the town is in the very center of an extensive grazing and pasture region, and is likewise a convenient point of railroad shipment for stockmen located on Powder river, Beaver creek, Box Elder creek, the Little Missouri and O'Fallon creek on the south, and on the north side of the Yellowstone for the ranges along Cedar creek, the Sheep mountains, Custer creek, the Dry Fork and the Redwater. It is also accepted as the best and shortest route of travel between points in Eastern Montana and the Black Hills. About twenty-five miles south from Terry there is a large belt of pine timber, and a sawmill will be promptly located there to furnish a supply of lumber for the town. The first settlers came to this vicinity in 1881, since which time the number has increased to one hundred and fifty. B. A. Bowen is postmaster, justice, and agent for the Northern Pacific railroad, Western Union telegraph, and Northern Pacific Express Company. Samuel Hilburn, sen., store; Cartwright Bros., grocers; Cole & Kelley, and N. Williams, liquors; Martin Malloy, blacksmith; N. Williams, livery stable, A. L. Griffith, carpenter.

The Town of Big Horn.—Under authority of an act of the first legislature, approved January 19, 1865, S. T. Hauser, H. A. Bell, J. N. York, John Vanderbilt, Drew Underwood, James Hauxhurst, A. S. Blake, were created a body politic, by the name and style of the Big Horn Town Association, to hold, for the purpose of a town, the premises situated in Big Horn county and described as follows: Commencing at a dead cottonwood tree, or stump, three thousand one hundred feet below the junction of the Yellowstone and Big Horn rivers, thence at right angles to the Yellowstone river two thousand six hundred and forty feet, thence parallel with said river three thousand one hundred feet to a cottonwood tree, thence south ten degrees, west three thousand three hundred feet to northeast banks of the Big Horn river, thence down Big Horn river to its junction with the Yellowstone river, thence down the Yellowstone river to place of beginning.

Beeman—Thirty-five miles northeast of Brandenberg, and about the same distance southwest of Miles City, claims a population of about seventy-five. J. H. Hay is general merchant and postmaster; Chas. Whitman, W. A. Bowls and C. Luen, stock growers; J. S. Elliott, Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph agent, and E. S. Beeman, hotel proprietor and express agent.

Crow Creek Valley—In the fall of 1864, Broadhead erected a cabin for King & Gillette, south of Clarke & Huntley's ranch. Here in 1868 Miss Gilman taught the first school, and in 1871 the first school house was erected. In 1865, King & Gillette raised the first crop. Broadhead, who came from St. Charles, Mo., was the first settler in 1864.

Brandenberg—A modern settlement on Tongue river, seventy miles southwest of Miles City, claims a population of thirty.

Buell—Forty-five miles northeast of Brandenberg, is a small settlement with a population of nine persons.

Ainslee—Nineteen miles northeast of Miles City, was settled in 1877. It is referred to in the chapters on personal history and reminiscences.

Etchetah—North of the north bank of the Yellowstone, west of the east line of Yellowstone county, is one of the old settlements of Custer county, settlers coming in here so early as 1877. Business is now represented there by John C. Guy & Son, general store and postoffice; Geo. Hyde, hotel; Sam Kappel, restaurant, and Williams & McLean, liquor dealers.

Cutler—Thirteen miles south of Miles City, on Tongue river, is one of the new settlements of this district, now numbering about one hundred inhabitants. G. E. Cutler is postmaster; S. E. Cutler, general store and hotel; E. R. Cutler, taxidermist; H. Winge, shoemaker; A. B. Wolf, gardener; A. A. Bearup, dentist.

Sherman Valley is very level, and about ten miles long by one or two wide. Twenty-six ranches were taken up in this valley, and 1879 was the first year attempts were made to raise grain, when the following crops of oats were raised: J. C. Guy & Sons, four thousand bushels on ninety acres; Thomas Cotter, two hundred bushels; Nichols & Ortman, seven hundred bushels on twenty-five acres; A. S. Lanneau, four hundred bushels on twelve acres. Onions, potatoes, cabbages, tomatoes, watermelons, squashes, and other vegetables, are raised here in large quantities and shipped to forts Custer and Keogh. The surplus oats raised here, as well as those at Coulson and Huntley, found ready market at Fort Custer. Wild grapes, plums, gooseberries, currants, etc., abound, and tame strawberries, blackberries and raspberries do well under proper cultivation.

Porcupine Valley received its first settlers in 1879. Eugene Coates died in this settlement in September, 1881, and there Philip Lynch was killed by the Indians some years ago. The first settler was James Murphy, who was joined shortly after (1877) by Gaffney and McCune. The first birth was that of a child of Daniel Boyle, born in August, 1878; and the first house built by Gaffney on Boyle's ranch.

Fort Custer, to which reference is made in the general history, was not without its social features. Here Hayes Lodge, No. 8, I. O. G. T., was organized February 22, 1881, by J. C. Budds. The lodge numbers 110 members, including the following named officers: Orlando Elliott, Anne E. Budds, Rob. Fallon, W. G. French, J. C. Budds, J. M. Jones, Adam Baer, John McCoy, D. C. Starr and H. B. Birsh. There is a school and house of worship in connection with this military post.

Fort Keogh, the history of which is given in the general history, is one of the leading military posts in the country. Geo. A. Way is postmaster.

Froze-to-Death.—It is supposed that this name is derived from the fact that a war party of Crows corraled a couple of Sioux near the upper end of Froze-to-Death Creek, and kept them there until they were frozen to death. Another theory is, that Indians had several hundred horses drowned in the river at the time of a big hail storm. The first ranch was taken up by Wm. Talbert, or he squatted on it, but Mr. Hyde made an entry of this land. Talbert came here in the fall of 1876. Wm. Roach, at the lower end of the bottom, settled also in the fall. The first death was that of C. K. Thurber, Gilmer & Salisbury's local agent of stage line. This occurred on September 11, 1882. He was buried under Cottonwood tree, north of Hyde's ranch.

Etna, eighteen miles south of Miles City, on the Tongue river, claims a population of thirty. E. M. Adams is postmaster.

Sadie, or Wilson settlement, near Horton station, was established in 1883. The place now has a population of 100, with C. W. Wilson postmaster.

Stoneville, 135 miles southeast of Miles City, is a small farming hamlet, with a population of thirty-five.

Howard, one of the settlements of 1883, has now a population bordering on 300. Samuel Newman is postmaster. Among the farmers and stock-growers of this section are: H. P. Anderson, Michael Barrett, C. G. French, A. W. Gibson, Kangar & Anderson, John Lindquist, Fred. Newman, Aug. Welander and F. W. Byant. This village is fifty miles southwest of Miles City.

Hyde, twenty miles southwest of Howard, is the nucleus of a settlement. Here a church and school are supported by a population of twenty-five.

Putnam is a settlement of about forty people, twenty-two miles southwest of Miles City.

Rosebud, forty miles southwest of Miles City, was established in 1880. W. H. Albright is postmaster. He, with Brady & Co., W. B. Skinner and Williams & Hay, conduct four large stores.

Birney, seventy-five miles southwest of Miles City, was established in 1878. John W. Twohey is postmaster and general trader, with John W. Bagley assistant postmaster. Thomas Cook also keeps a general store, and C. M. Gennison a saloon. The stock and sheep owners in the vicinity are Samuel Bertewell, M. Bourne, Cook & Alderson, S. Greyder, Cornelius Howe, Scott & Hunk, James Sharp and Frank Westerfelt. The total population is about 125. Dickson, ten miles northeast of Miles City, has a small population. A church and a school house were erected here recently. The post-office, which was established at this point for a short time, was disestablished last year.

Young's Point is situated five miles from Clark's Fork, eighty from Fort Custer and 120 from Bozeman. This point is quite new and mostly unsettled. Good specimens of gold have been found on Clark's Fork. As a stock country it is of the very best, and the "bottom" is a perfect paradise. In extent it is about forty miles long by from two to twelve miles in width, and is bounded on the north by a chain of mountains, and on the south by the beautiful Yellowstone river. Cottonwood, box-elder, ash, cedar and pine are found in abundance. The ravines on the north side are deep, and would afford good shelter for thousands of stock, besides having timber and table shelter. Water for irrigating purposes can be taken from the Yellowstone river at a small expense, though most of the farmers deem this unnecessary. A. J. Young says he has never seen finer vegetables in Ohio than are raised in this bottom. During this season connection will be made with this point by steamer up the Yellowstone. Freight for Bozeman and vicinity can easily be landed here, and no doubt much of it will be. Captain Marsh and others have promised to deliver the same for $3 from St. Louis, while freighting from this point to Bozeman can be done for $1 per hundred pounds. Hunting is most excellent, such as buffalo, elk, deer, and thousands of antelope, sufficient to meet the wants of any sportsman, while the rivers abound in trout. It is indeed surprising that so good a locality should be overlooked, as at this time but 1,000 acres are under cultivation.

Messrs. Courrier and Hare carry a general stock of merchandise, while P. W. McAdow has a twenty-horse power steam saw mill in constant operation. The latter party will shortly erect a flour mill, and thus make use of the quantities of water power. A. J. Young keeps the hotel.

CONCLUSION.

So much has been written in the history of Indian wars, relating particularly to this division of the Territory and in the chapters devoted to exploration and occupation, mines and mining, aboriginal settlers, and in personal history and remininscences, the writer has omitted much of its early history in this chapter.

CHAPTER XX.

DAWSON COUNTY.

FROM what has been written in the history of the fur traders, Indian wars, expeditions and military posts relating to this portion of the Territory, little remains to be said here beyond giving the history of its modern settlement, organization and progress. The white population in June, 1880, as recorded in the census returns, was 180, a number only thirty in excess of the number of houses which was erected at Glendive within the five months ending November 30, 1881. The area of the county is 18,100 square miles, which offered to each settler in June, 1880, a little over 100 square miles of territory. These great unsettled tracts are fast filling up with an industrious people, and the time is already at hand when men may be counted in every section of this eastern county. Dawson county derives its name from Andrew Dawson, one time clerk for the American Fur Company, again owner of Fort Benton, and subsequently a partner in the firm of Pierre, Choteau, jr., & Co. The account given of this man by the leading paper of the county, the Glendive Times, under date June 15, 1882, creates some surprise at the fact of his name being given to a county of Montana. The vocabulary of proper names must indeed be very limited at the date when this portion of the Territory was set off and named by the Legislature. Delegate Maginnis, in a bill which he introduced in May, 1882, asked that a new county, to be named Yellowstone, be established out of the unorganized district named Dawson, but the subsequent action of the Local Legislature retained the name Dawson.

Organization.—The organic act, approved February 2, 1865, created the county of Big Horn, then embracing the present county of Dawson, and attached it for judicial purposes to Gallatin county. The act approved January 15, 1869, established Dawson county, located the Seat of Justice at Fort Peck, and authorised the appointment of commissioners to act until the general elections of that year. The original boundaries were:

"Commencing at the intersecting point of parallel of latitude forty-seven degrees, with meridian of longitude one hundred and eight degrees, and thence along said parallel forty seven degrees to meridian of longitude one hundred and four degrees, and from thence along said meridian north to forty-ninth parallel of latitude, and from thence along said parallel forty-nine degrees to meridian of longitude one hundred and eight degrees, and thence south along said meridian to place of beginning."

This new district was attached to Choteau for council and representative purposes. From this described territory the southwest corner, west of the Muscleshell, was set off as a portion of Meagher county.

The act approved February 18, 1881, attaching Dawson county to Custer county for judicial and other purposes, increased rather than relieved the political disabilities under which the citizens of Dawson county labored. On September 9, 1881, a meeting was held at the Pacific hotel, presided over by Joseph Allen, with James McCormick, secretary, for the purpose of organizing a county. On motion of Mr. Malony for committee of three to be appointed, who should choose nine names among the property holders to be voted upon, the three receiving the highest number of votes to be declared the choice of the meeting for county commissioners. Motion carried: Mr. Malony, Mr. Comford and Mr. Lonergan were appointed to act as committee on selection and reported the following named gentlemen to be voted upon, and from the number the three following received the highest number of votes, viz.: N. W. Comford, 68; H. F. Douglas, 45; Hope Davis, 43, and Robert Pontet, 43. Mr. Pontet having withdrawn his name, Mr. N. W. Comford, H. F. Douglas and Hope Davis were declared the choice of the meeting for county commissioners. On motion of E. C. Culver, a committee of three, consisting of Mr. Malony, Mr. Lonergan and E. C. Culver were appointed to draft resolutions to be presented to Governor B. F. Potts. Such resolutions were compiled in the following form and presented to the Governor:

We, the undersigned citizens of Glendive, Dawson county, Montana Territory, would respectfully present to the Governor the following resolutions, made and adopted at a meeting of the property holders and citizens at large of Glendive on September 9, 1881.

Resolved—That owing to the rapid growth of our town and county in wealth and population, we feel it incumbent upon us to take measures for the organization of Dawson county and its severance from the county of Custer. Resolved—That the immediate organization of Dawson county is an imperative necessity to its welfare. Resolved—That the dignity of the law cannot be maintained and the rights of its citizens fully protected, owing to its non-organization. Resolved—That we are subject to much unnecessary expense and trouble which could and would be avoided if Dawson county was organized. Resolved—That the names of N. W. Comford, H. S. Davis and H. F. Douglas be presented to Benjamin F. Potts, Governor of Montana, for confirmation as commissioners of Dawson county. Resolved—That the citizens of Dawson county are greatly inconvenienced and put to great expense by being compelled to attend court at so great a distance as Miles City.

Your petitioners respectfully present the above resolutions with the earnest desire and firm conviction that they shall command your early attention and receive your consideration.

The officers appointed under the organic act of September 25, 1882, were Edward K. Weeks, Ebenezer Slowson, Robert Pontet, county commissioners; Henry Dion, Sheriff; George R. Tingle, county clerk and recorder; J. F. Malony, probate judge; D. R. Mead, treasurer; John P. Nolan, assessor. The passage of the act was telegraphed to George R. Tingle, Glendive, by Secretary McCutcheon, September 27, 1882, with an instruction to have the officers named above to qualify at once and to give notice of election of permanent officers as provided for in the act.

The precincts of Dawson county, as laid out September 30, 1882, were Glendive, No. 1; Burns, No. 2; Newlons, No. 3, and Keith's, No. 4.

The election held May 26, 1883, on the question of issuing bounty bonds to the amount of $25,000, for the purpose of building a county court house at Glendive, was carried by a vote of 301 contents. The non-contents, if any, did not express themselves by voting. The records of Precincts Nos. 2 and 3 were rejected on account of being improper in form, while the returns of Precinct No. 4 were not before the Board of Canvassers, explained subsequently by the fact that there was no election held in that precinct.

Court House.—At a meeting of the Board held April 16, 1883, Mr. Raymond was instructed to order bonds printed, to be used in refunding the $20,000 indebtedness of Dawson county. W. F. Hurst, of the Bank of Glendive, took the contract for building the court house and jail. He also purchased the $20,000 bonds, turned the cash into the county treasury, and draws from this fund such moneys as are to be applied on the contract of June 23, 1883. This building was completed November 1, 1883. The house is almost similar in style to the pretentious building at Bismarck.

Schools.—Up to August, 1883, the county boasted of one small frame school house at Glendive, erected by subscription in 1881, and one log building at Newlon, which is now used as a school house. On May 26, 1883, elections were held, to approve of bonding the Glendive school district for $10,000. The question was approved, and contracts for building one large school building on Belknap square, to be completed in the fall of 1883, were made.

Assessment.—The equalized assessment of Dawson in 1881 was $543,728, and the tax thereon $465.80. The figures for 1882 were $239,158 and $1,228.06 respectively, the decrease in the assessment being due to changes from the supposed to a proportion of the real value of property. The debt of the county, March 1, 1883, was $20,104.40 (Vide General Statistics).

GLENDIVE.

The seat of justice of Dawson county was partially laid off in October and December, 1880, the N. P. R. R. entered the camp July 5, the first carload of lumber arrived July 20, and the first shingle-roofed house erected on the site of the present town was completed September 1, 1881. During the winter of 1880–1 a temporary settlement was effected. No sooner had the railroad been completed to Glendive creek than signs of permanency were apparent, and from this date the progress of the village has been of a marked character. On November 25, 1881, the first school house was completed, and the following professions and trades established:—Two physicians, one lawyer, one druggist, four general merchandise establishments, two hotels, one lodging house, four restaurants, two grocery stores, one dry goods store, one livery stable, two butchers, two blacksmiths, one baker, one watchmaker and one shoemaker. From July 20 to November 30, 1881, no less than 150 houses were erected on the town site. It is now a town of about 1,200 inhabitants.

The town is in latitude 47 degrees 3 minutes north, longitude 27 degrees 45 minutes west, at an altitude of 2,070 feet above the ocean level. It is situated on the south bank of the Yellowstone, at the point where the Northern Pacific R. R. first reaches the Yellowstone Valley, and at the foot of the last steep grade which the road makes in coming down to connect with the steamboat navigation of the Yellowstone and Upper Missouri rivers. To the mouth of the Yellowstone is eighty-five miles by water, eighty-one miles by the stage-road. To the eastern boundary of Montana is about fifty miles, the location of the boundary line never having been accurately determined. From Bismarck, where the railroad crosses the Missouri river and leaves it, it is two hundred and twenty miles. This part of the road constitutes the Missouri Division of the Northern Pacific R. R., terminating at Glendive, where the Yellowstone Division begins. Aside from the fact that it is about a convenient distance from Bismarck to make it the terminus of a division, there are physical causes which determined the selection of this point for the terminal one. From the Missouri to the Yellowstone the maximum gradient of the road is 66 feet to the mile; from Glendive westward to the base of the Rocky mountains the maximum gradient is 26 feet to the mile.

The site of the town is a beautiful plain, gently rising by an easy slope from the river bank to the foot of the bluffs, which lie about half a mile back from the river, and rise abruptly to a height of nearly three hundred feet above the level of the river. At the steamboat landing, which extends along the river front for about a quarter of a mile, the bank is about twelve feet above high water mark—the difference between the highest and lowest water at this point being about ten feet, making the height above low water about twenty-two feet. At the foot of the bluff the ground is about forty feet higher than at the river bank, making a slope perfect for drainage, yet hardly distinguishable by the eye from level ground. Down the river the land rises gently to the level of an extensive plateau, varying from eighty to one hundred feet above water level. The ground is wholly unbroken, so that the streets are natural roadways. The lay of the ground may be better understood when it is stated that the railroad runs through the town perfectly straight and on a dead level for three thousand feet, and then descends by a very easy grade to the point where the river tracks switch off to the steamboat landing and warehouses, along which again it is carried in a straight line and on a level for a quarter of a mile. The ownership of the town site is about equally divided between the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and the Yellowstone Land and Colonization Company, between whom amicable contracts have been made by which their common interests are adjusted.

On the south and southeast the bluffs enclose the town site. On the west lies the river, and on the north the plateau heretofore noted, which overlooks a lovely prospect of islands and wooded banks in the Yellowstone Valley for many miles up and down the river. Along this part of the town is laid off the Esplanade, a broad street two hundred and fifty feet wide, extending from the steamboat landing to the limits of the town.

The business circle of Glendive in 1884–5 is as follows: Casey & Co., grocers; Comfort & Raymond, farm implements and hardware; H. S. Davis, druggist; Douglass & Mead, general merchants; E. Gassman, jeweler; Hurst & Co., hardware and tin; Neel & McLean, grocers; E. H. Weeks, Lesher & Co, dry goods; E. C. Waters, livery stable; Savignac & Snyder, meat market; Sears & Co., boots and shoes; Klaus & Waters, Merrill House; A. Low, hardware and tin; J. Lyons, barber; G. R. Tingle, real estate and insurance; J. Lee, J. Javes, H. Davis, C. Corbett, J. Butte, Powell & Gallaher, liquor dealers; Merchants' Banking Co.; D. R. Mead & Co's bank, store and lumber yard; J. Kohn, wagon maker; L. O. Brown, coal miner; Glendive Banking Co.; J. Matthews and J. Boyd, constables. The professions are represented by judges Allen and Lannigan, J. F. Malony, J. Trumble, and the resident ministers of the Gospel.

Y. L. & C. C.—At the meeting of the stockholders of the Yellowstone Land and Colonization Company, held at Glendive in November, 1882, the following directors and officers were elected: Directors—Lewis Merrill, J. W. Raymond, H. F. Douglas, Jas. M. Burns, and J. W. Kendrick. Officers—Lewis Merrill, president; James M. Burns, secretary; H. F. Douglas, treasurer.

Stockyards, etc., etc.—The Glendive Stockyards were completed in October, 1882. The yards are five hundred feet square, and fitted up so perfectly that a train may be loaded or unloaded at once. A company for navigating the Yellowstone and carrying freight upon its waters was formed at Glendive in May, 1885, and is called the Yellowstone Packet Company. The stock has all been taken by citizens of that place, and the stockholders will take measures immediately to procure a steamboat and barges to be used for freighting.

Post-offices.—The first post-office at Glendive was established in August, 1881, with N. C. Lawrence, postmaster. In June, 1883, D. R. Mead was commissioned. The old post-office of Knowlton was established on the Buford and Keogh route; but it appears no mails were delivered there. Call. McClellan was postmaster of this office until he moved to Glendive, when Mr. Lawrence took charge.

Banks.—The Bank of Glendive was founded October 12, 1882, by Hurst & Co. The members of the company are A. Henshilwood, A. Rothwell, S. Wallace, and W. S. Hurst, the present cashier. The extensive hardware store next the bank building is the property of the company. The bank building and store were erected in 1882 at a cost of about $5,000.

The Merchants' Bank of Glendive was established April 1, 1883, by H. F. Douglas, G. H. Fairchild and H. R. Porter, with a capital of $10,000.

Northern Pacific Railroad Shops and Offices.—A large passenger station of eighty feet frontage, a freight depot for local freights, a freight depot for steamboat connections, a railroad round-house of forty-four stalls (of which thirteen were completed), built of brick, a machine shop capable of turning out any kind of repairs on cars, engines and railroad machinery, built of brick, 260 feet long by 100 feet wide, with a capacity of three hundred workmen, a blacksmith shop connected with it, 160 by 100 feet, carpenter shop, a paint shop, and other structures needed for one of the most important shop and repair points, mark the progress of this point. These shops were opened in March, 1883, with S. L. Bean, master mechanic. The force employed in the shops during the summer of 1883 was 120 men.

Merrill House may be said to have been opened in June, 1882, when a temporary building was erected and fitted up as a hotel. The Merrill House, subsequently opened by Klaus & Waters, has a frontage of ninety-four feet, extending back seventy-two feet, three stories in height, and contains sixty rooms. The equipment of the hotel is first-class in every particular, and the management good.

Glendive Brickyard was opened May 25, 1882. The works cover an area of five acres, have a capacity of 30,000 brick per day, and afford employment to from twenty to thirty men.

Churches.—The First Methodist-Episcopal Society of Glendive was organized in September, 1882, by Rev. M. O. McNiff (he preached here May 14, 1882), with the following named original members: Wm. Lowe, J. D. Sears, Joshua Allwyn, D. S. Prescott, Mrs. D. S. Prescott and Mrs. Afton. The erection of the present church was begun in 1883, and the building opened for worship April 1, 1883. The cost of this edifice, as completed, was $2,500, of which sum $1,000 remain to be paid by the year 1889. Rev. G. C. Stull succeeded

Mr. McNiff as pastor. The officers of the society are: W. H. Raymond, Wm. Lowe, D. S. Prescott, H. Freeze and J. D. Sears, trustees. The present number of members is about fifteen, and of the Sunday school, fifty-five. The superintendent of the school since its establishment in January, 1882, is D. S. Prescott.

The first Congregational Society of Glendive was founded in December, 1883, by Rev. D. E. Todd. The original members were: W. S. Hurst, A. Henshilwood, Mrs. Hurst, Mrs. Henshilwood, James S. Duncan and wife, O. J. Silvers, J. M. Geiger, C. M. Geiger, J. D. Sears, Mrs. Matthews, Joseph Sharp, Mrs. Ray and Geo. Henshilwood.

The church building was begun in May, 1883, and opened for worship in June, 1883. The cost of this edifice is stated to be about $1,700, of which sum a few hundred dollars remain to be paid. The Sunday school was founded in July, 1883, with W. S. Hurst, superintendent, and thirty-four pupils. Previous to organization services were held in the school room, presided over by Rev. Mr. Pike, and subsequently by Rev. Mr. Todd. In the fall of 1882, Rev. R. H. Simmons, superintendent of missions, arrived and held services in the school house.

The Protestant Episcopal Society of Glendive was organized in the fall of 1882, by Rev. Mr. Horsfell and George R. Tingle, with eleven members. This society has not yet erected a house of worship.

SMALL SETTLEMENTS.

Newlon.—This settlement is like a colony settled in an exceptionally fine portion of the valley. The country here is a fertile plain, sloping gently from the foothills in the distance to the river bank. Through this fine flat runs Fox Creek, a living stream of pure spring water, like a gurgling brook in meadow land. It is a splendid location for a large and prosperous colony. There are now, 1884, over 30 persons in the settlement. The heads of the families are not tenderfeet, but pioneers who have been in the country, traveled over it, and have chosen this particular spot of the garden valley as their future home. Lime of an excellent quality is found and burned here. There is one store, that of John O'Brien. That the settlement is in a prosperous condition, the many new houses erected and under the process of erection bears witness of. Timber is abundant, and among nature's chief endowments is the sparkling spring water found here the year round. A church and school are maintained here.

Poplar River Agency.—This agency is presided over by Major N. S. Porter. The Indians of this agency, in 1882, had over 500 acres of land under cultivation devoted to oats, corn, potatoes, onions, etc., while the agency school pupils and teachers had about 150 acres under oats, corn, potatoes, cabbage, melons, onions and beans. The teachers were Rev. S. E. Snyder, Mrs. Snyder, Miss Hickman, Miss Miller and Miss Shafer, in charge of 35 Indian children. The U. S. telegraph line to the agency was completed in May, 1882, and the military post, known as Camp Poplar River, was constructed in May and June, 1882, by Co. F, 11th U. S. Infantry. Thomas Henderson, resident partner of the firm of Leighton, Jordan & Henderson, post traders, is postmaster. There are general stores here conducted by H. F. Bachelor, G. H. Fairchild and T. C. Power & Co. John J. Carter is Notary Public.

Burns Ranch was located in 1878 by John L. Burns, who brought the first white family into the lower Yellowstone valley. He kept the stage station and hotel at this point for a few years, and has cultivated one of the finest farms in the Territory since his settlement in 1878. The valley, of which this farm is the beginning, and Slawson's Ranch the end, is over eight miles in length. In 1882-3 there were only the farms of Grant and Bonham in the entire valley proper. This whole bottom of eight miles is unsurpassed for fertility and location, having a riverward slope of from ten to twenty feet per mile, furnishing a complete drainage. John L. Burns, of Evans Creek, 28 miles below Glendive, settled there in October, 1876. He says:

"I was the first white man that ever settled in this lower valley with his family, and that, too, when Mr. Sitting Bull and his followers were working at their trade in this immediate neighborhood, and have lived here five years, and intend to stay until they settle up too close around me; and I suppose I know as much about it as anybody can, and I simply say what I can certify to. I don't wish to influence anybody to come here, but if they do they are welcome, and I think they will be pleased; and if they are not, they will have more elbow room to kick than in the country they come from, unless they come from west of here."

Beaver Creek.—In the northwestern portion of the county is the settlement of Beaver Creek. The valley is at least twenty miles in length, and from one to three in width, and is shut in by perpendicular cliffs and high rolling land. The climate, as a whole, is delightful, warm as it is in summer, there is an elasticity in the atmosphere that invites to labor. Through this beautiful valley meanders the stream called the Beaver. During the summer this stream moves majestically with a steady current, and during spring rushes along as a torrent, carrying with it all kinds of debris washed down from the mountains, but still keeping in its own channel, so that there is no danger from an overflow. The material of the soil varies, but the greater part of it is a rich dark loam, while there is no tenacious mud to speak of. There is hardly a section of land in which the settler cannot, with a little labor, develop a coal mine that will last him for a lifetime.

Morgan Ranch, twelve miles from Glendive, the Keith ranch, Carroll, Muscleshell, and other settlements, are all destined to attain important places among the towns and villages of the territory.

Keith, 33 miles southeast of Glendive, was settled in 1881, and a railroad station established here, which was named McClelland. W. R. Fountain is postmaster and general merchant; also railroad, express and telegraph agent. D. Brown conducts a saloon.

Wolf Point, or Fort Peck Agency, was settled in 1878. Here the government saw mill is located. Charles Aubrey is postmaster.

The first train for the Muscleshell left Helena March 16, 1874, for the new town of Carroll, named in honor of Matt Carroll, one of the earliest English-speaking citizens of the Territory. The town is situated on the south bank of the Missouri, northwest of Muscleshell settlement, in Dawson county.

The county is rich in its souvenirs of a past age. From the period of its settlement to the present time every excavation has brought to light some memento of physical change. In May, 1883, H. S. Back found a number of fossils two miles from Glendive, of the antediluvian monsters which flourished here. The country adjacent to the valleys is watered and is covered with a magnificent growth of bunch grass, making the finest stock ranges known. As you leave the mountains and approach the valleys below, the vegetation loses its luxuriant freshness, and the longer growth seen along the highlands settles down into an open growth of grass, as is also the case with the steppe vegetation, for it grows in tufts leaving the ground visible between them. This peculiarity is the reason why it has been denominated "bunch grass." During the months of May and June the grass looks green, but after that season it looks quite yellow and dry, being, in fact, cured as it grows into hay of most nutritious quality. The few streams that rise in these plains are generally absorbed by the thirsty soil after running a few hundred yards. In addition to the natural adaptation of this country to stock-growing, the industry of the husbandman converts these very valleys into fertile fields, and where a few short years ago the wilderness stood, beautiful in its loneliness, hundreds of farms now decorate the landscape.

CHAPTER XXI.

DEER LODGE COUNTY.

THIS COUNTY, which at one time extended from the Big Hole river to the natural boundary, forms one of the most delightful districts in the mountain region. The Deer Lodge and Hellgate rivers and Rock creek traverse the great valley of the county. The Big Blackfoot, in the northern part, is a large stream and runs through one of the finest grazing and agricultural sections of Montana. It is as yet sparsely settled, and hundreds of choice selections of land can now be made. Nevada creek, a tributary of the Blackfoot, is also noted for its fine grazing and agricultural land. Rock creek is a fine, bold, mountain stream, which enters the Hellgate river from the southwest. Its waters flow some sixty or eighty miles in the mountain range between the Deer Lodge and Bitter Root valleys. Deer Lodge valley spreads out from five to ten miles wide, between the Rocky and Deer Lodge ranges for a distance of sixty miles. Besides these a number of lateral valleys open into it, bordering the numerous and beautiful streams which enter the main river from each side. Many fine farms are located in these valleys, while the foot hills and mountain sides are grazing lands. The mountains within the county boundaries possess all that gigantic beauty to be found on the Pacific slope, while natural eccentricities, such as hot springs, etc., make up a scene unexcelled in the entire west. The origin of the name is credited to the poetic imagery of the Indians. Captain Mills, himself an old settler, calls it an "old appellation," and states that it is derived from a large, sugarloaf mound, with a thermal spring on its summit. Situated near the center of the broad upper half of this valley, it is one of the most beautiful and interesting formations in the northwest, growing with the centuries, the waters building their throne slowly, imperceptibly, but steadily as the coral builds the ocean reefs, and in the coming years will attract many thousands to drink of its medicinal waters and find health and pleasure in the picturesque valley, mountain circled and coursed by crystal streams. The mound is over forty feet high. It stands in the midst of a perfectly level valley; and the hot springs on its summit, during the greater portion of the year, send up a heavy volume of vapor, rendering it a conspicuous object for from twenty to twenty-five miles in every direction. It bears, in the distance, a striking resemblance to an Indian lodge with the smoke ascending from it. Through all the traditions of the Indians the valley has been famous for the plenitude and fatness of the white-tailed deer that graze upon its ever-nutritious and almost ever-green grasses; where the snow scarcely ever falls, and, falling, quickly disappears. And so the aborigines, true to these facts, and weaving with them a happy fancy, named it after that it most resembled; and we have it that the Snake hunting parties, approaching the crests of the surrounding mountains, before the pale-face came to the land, would try the fleetness of their steeds to see who would first catch sight of and hail the point of rendezvous—It Sooke en Car-ne—the lodge of the white-tailed deer. The early coming French, appreciating the poetry of the designation, adopted it literally, and among them it was known as La loge du chevreiul. But the laconic, matter-of-fact Yankee pioneer came this way, and without remorse boiled down all its traditions and beauty and poesy into the practical appellation Deer Lodge, by which is now known the valley, the river, the county and town. In 1861–2 the location of Deer Lodge City was called Spanish Fork, in compliment to Thomas Lavatta, Joseph Hill, Alejo Barasta, and other Spaniards then located there.*

The leading quartz mines of Deer Lodge county (the county is also somewhat noted for its placer mines) are the Cable, Algonquin, Hope, Granite Mountain and Princeton. The first of them, the Cable, has produced some of the richest gold rock known, and it has already added several millions of dollars to the gold wealth of the world. As an instance of the wonderful richness of its ores it might be stated that a twenty-one pound block of ore taken from the mine recently and now on exhibition at the New Orleans exposition contained about $4,000 in gold. For several years past the Phillipsburg silver mines—principal among which are the Algonquin, Speckled Trout, Hope, Comanche, Granite Mountain, Pyrenees, and other properties—have been rolling out a steady stream of wealth. The output of the Granite Mountain alone is now some $300,000 per year. The Hope Company is making a good record for itself and is paying regular dividends. They aggregate to date about 170,000, the last being November 1, 1884. Its output the past year has been about $100,000. All the properties mentioned are being worked successfully and with large profit to the owners. Silver lodes also abound in Moosecreek district, and valuable gold-bearing lodes in Highland, Snowshoe, McClellan and Bear gulches. In fact, Deer Lodge county is seamed with gold and silver veins and adds to these deposits of coal, iron, lead and copper. It was in this county the first discovery of placer gold in Montana was made, and these mines have to date yielded a good many millions of dollars in gold nuggets. The nine mines worked in Deer Lodge in 1881, produced 850,000 in gold and silver. The census returns of 1880, made prior to the setting off of Silver Bow, placed the value of gold at $341,930, and that of silver at 2,065,980. In 1882, the value of the gold and silver product was about $720,000. Increased largely in 1883 and 1884.

Organic.—The proclamation of Gov. Edgerton in 1864, setting off Deer Lodge county and appointing County Commissioners, wss the first step taken toward the organization of the southern part of Missoula county. The act of the Legislature, approved February 2, 1865, provided:

"That all that portion of the Territory of Montana embraced in the following boundaries be, and the same is hereby, created a county, to be known as Deer Lodge county, to wit: commencing at the point of the intersection of the parallel of latitude forty-nine degrees with the line of longitude one hundred and thirteen degrees and thirty minutes, thence along the said forty-ninth parallel to meridian of longitude one hundred and twelve degrees, and thence south along said one hundred and twelfth meridian to the Big Hole river, thence up said Big Hole river to the intersection of parallel of latitude forty-five degrees and fifty minutes with meridian of longitude one hundred and twelve degrees and fifty minutes, thence west along the line forty-five degrees and fifty minutes to the boundary line of Missoula county, thence along said boundary line north to the place of beginning; and the county seat of said Deer Lodge county is hereby located at Silver Bow."

The changes which have taken place in the boundaries of this county are numerous, if not perplexing. The latest division of the county resulted in the establishment of the little wealthy county of Silver Bow. The establishment of county boundaries is a matter of importance, and two boundary lines of the county are among those not well defined. One is between this county and Jefferson, for the determination of which no provision has yet been made, and another is between this county and Missoula, from Medicine Tree Hill northward to the summit of the Rocky mountains. For the establishment of this line the Legislature of 1882–3 appointed a commission consisting of Alfred Cave, of Missoula, and O. B. O'Bannon, of Deer Lodge. The act required the survey to be commenced by September 1, 1883. The line is to start at the most northerly point of Medicine Tree Hill (near McCarty's bridge on the Hell Gate river) and run due north. It is to be cut and blazed through timber and defined by monuments in open country.

Political.—Following the organic act of 1865, commissioners were appointed. In September, 1865, the first elections were held and the county was organized.

The elections of 1884 resulted as follows: For Congressional Delegate, Joseph K. Toole, D., 1,462; Hiram Knowles, R., 1,384. The same party vote marked the election of the following named officers: A. H. Mitchell, D., Ter. council; Con. Kohrs, R., and Geo. B. Winston, D., representatives; J. B. McMaster, D., sheriff; Joseph Lodge, assessor; R. G. Humber, D., treasurer; W. F. Shanley, clerk and recorder; O. Emerson, probate judge; T. W. Catlin, supt. of schools; M. J. Fitzpatrick, public administrator; H. P. McFarland, coroner; G. A. Kellogg, surveyor; J. Y. Batterton, Morgan Evans, and J. H. Helm, county commissioners.

The appointment of Robert S. Kelly, of Deer Lodge, in June, 1885, as Marshal of the Territory, seems to give general satisfaction to the people of the Territory.

Schools.—The report of T. W. CATLIN, superintendent of schools, for 1882, is as follows:

Number of organized districts	20	Number of frame school houses	8
Number of white persons between 4 and 21	929	Number of log school houses	11
Number of African descent, 4 to 21	2	Number of graded schools	1
Number of pupils attending school during the year	720	Number of ungraded schools	30
Number attending private schools	20	Total number of schools	31
Number not attending school	191	Rate of county tax for school purposes, in mills	4
Number of male teachers employed	15	Amount per capita of school census children	$9 65
Number of female teachers employed	18	Amount raised by county tax for schools	$8,984 13
Total number of teachers	33	Total amount from all scurces apportioned during year	10,056 56
Average length of school in days	123

Private schools were established throughout the mining centers of the county in 1864–5. The common school system was introduced about the time the county was organized, and has gradually advanced to its present satisfactory condition. The Deer Lodge College and the Catholic School and Convent of the city offer additional facilities for education.

DEER LODGE CITY.

Deer Lodge town site, extending from alley north of First street to alley south of Tenth street, and from a point west of A street to a point east of G street, was platted in 1869, and approved by the County board August 5, 1869. In a letter to Captain Mills, June 17, 1885, Granville Stuart makes the following statement:

"In 1860–1 Deer Lodge was most commonly known as "Spanish Fork," because of most of the first settlers being Mexicans, among whom were Thomas Lavatta, Joe Hill, Alejo Barasta, Joe Pizanthy (killed at Bannack by vigilantes for killing George Copley, in January, 1864), and several others. Tom Lavatta can tell you all about the first settlers. But the place was also frequently called "Cottonwood" until July, 1862, when Captain Joe LaBarge came over from Fort Benton, and, as I was told (for I was then living at Gold creek), announced his intention of starting a big store and living there (he had just started a rival fort at Benton, known as "Fort LaBarge," belonging to LaBarge, Harkness & Co.), upon which the leading citizens of "Cottonwood" met and laid off some two or three streets and formally christened the new town "LaBarge City," and as such it went on to the earliest maps of Idaho and Montana, although it was still frequently called "Cottonwood" until the spring of 1864, when the old residents of the town determined to inaugurate a gentle boom. So they employed Colonel DeLacey to lay off a town one mile square (the land was none of it surveyed as yet, nor for some years afterward), which was owned by the Deer Lodge Town Co., who, so far as I remember, were James Stuart, president; John S. Pemberton, Louis Demers, Leon Quesnelle, L. Deschenaux, John W. Powell, Charles W. Wright, Frank L. Worden, Frank LaMontague, John F. Grant, Fred H. Burr, Frank Truchot, and perhaps one or two others. This company gave most of the lots away to actual residents, and never sold enough to get even on their survey. After the lands were surveyed they tried to get title, but could never do so, and finally Polk Newcomer, as Probate Judge, entered it for the citizens. A plat of the town-site of "Deer Lodge City" was prepared by the writer on the basis of DeLacey's survey (he only platted a small portion of the mile square), and the same is on record in a separate, well-bound book in the county recorder's office. It is to this "Town Co." that the pleasant little town of Deer Lodge owes its wide streets, its Court House square and other agreeable adjuncts, for it was only by their untiring efforts that parties were prevented from building at random everywhere in the town site, as was the case in most of the towns in the territory. * * * Pemberton, Quesnelle, Deschenaux, Powell and Wright, are gone—half of that little Town Company who, twenty-one years ago, dreamed of a future city under the shadow of Mount Powell, have passed away."

So much importance did the settlement attain in 1865 that the first legislature transferred the Seat of Justice of the county from Silver Bow to this point.

In former pages the pioneers of LaBarge are named, in the chapter on the newspaper press the history of newspapers is given, while in the chapter on mines and miners and in the Stuart reminiscences in this chapter, as well as in the pages devoted to the personal history and reminiscences of the leading citizens of Deer Lodge and Silver Bow counties, the minutiæ of history is contained. Therefore nothing is related here which has been dealt with in the chapters referred to.

The business, trade and professional circles of the city are made up as follows (1884–5): Aylesworth & McFarland, Samuel Scott, Charles Rouleau, hotels; James Curn, restaurant; Thomas Aspling, George W. Carlton, Murphy, Higgins & Co., grocers; E. L. Bonner & Co., Kim, Chong, Lung & Co., A. Kleinschmidt & Co., general merchants; C. Bielenberg, meat market: A. P. Winslow, jeweler; William Coleman & Co., cigars, jewelry, sporting goods, etc.; M. Baen, John Thomson, furniture; Clark & Larabie, bankers; James E. Dickey, Philip E. Evans, druggists; Peter Lansing, boots and shoes; Kennon & Zenor, John O'Neil, hardware; Mrs. L. Cary, H. Pulliam, milliners; J. W. Jenks, E. D. Dashiel, carpenters; W. R.

Miller, harness maker; George Barbeare, Moses Menard, H. McDole, F. Terrault, G. Zosell, blacksmiths; James Rickard, gunsmith; A. Anderson, shoemaker; H. Chien, tailor; J. H. Arms, M. C. Leonard, Ed. McMahan, barbers; J. W. Steele, painter; William M. Cairnes, R. M. Telephone Exchange; George B. Smythe, R. R. agent; Edward S. Stackpole, postmaster and express agent; W. H. Botkin, warden of penitentiary; L. Cottrell and J. T. Lynch, Pacific Wagon and Implement Co.; H. L. LeBar, telegraphic operator; C. D. Joslyn, manager Lowell Wagon Co.; Joslyn & Morse, forwarding and commission agents; J. W. Estill and Ward, Lodge & Co., livery and feed stables; R. Boisvert, S. Maturin, Thomas Strong, Edward P. Mills, A. Sauvagnac, George Thatcher, George Varbare, saloons; Joseph Rickard, Augustin Slaughter, planing mills; Z. B. Evans, lumber; Jacob E. Van Gundy, brewery and bottling works; James H. Mills, editor New Northwest; O. B. O'Bannon, A. S. Higgins, A. E. Mayhew, J. C. Robinson, W. H. Trippett, H. R. Whitehill, lawyers; Rev. R. Deryckere, Catholic Church; Rev. E. J. Groenveldt, Presbyterian Church; Rev. Galen Wood, Disciples Church; Rev. D. J. McMillan, college; Sisters of Charity in charge of St. Joseph's hospital and Convent schools; A. H. Mitchell, Edgar Laurin, John H. Owings, physicians; George A. Kellogg, surveyor.

The demolition of the second house built at Deer Lodge was effected in April, 1888. Captain Mills, in his report to his paper, speaks of this souvenir of pioneer days, thus:

Opposite Murphy, Niel & Co.'s store on Main street there has stood, since the memory of but few persons runs to the contrary, a squat-looking, dirt roofed 16x20 log cabin, with its public corner pointing like Captain Marryatt's story, "S. W. and W. by ½ W;" an eyesore to some in later years and by others regarded with a venerable affection similar to that which attaches to an old pair of boots. This was the second house built in Deer Lodge, and if an Italian marble tablet, 20x40 inches in size, and handsomely sculptured, had been placed over its portals bearing the year of its erection it would have been inscribed "1863." (The first house erected still stands on Third street.) But the march of improvement goes on; the new stamps out the old, and the giant revolutions of practical progress ruthlessly overturn our most hallowed antiquities. Lynch, Cottrell & Bennett needed the lot for a wagon shed, and down went the old house. Out of its archæological dust we exhume the facts that it was built in 1863 by Louis Deachneau. In July, '64, Dr. W. W. Higgins, who had been a California Argonaut, and who each successive spring, when the grass started on his lawns at his home in Missouri, had sighed for the mountains, turned up in Deer Lodge "with a pocket full of groceries," as he says, and occupied it as a merchandising establishment in opposition to Frank L. Worden, who had a store close by. In May, 1865, Dr. Higgins left it and went to Blackfoot. It was then used as the office of the Clerk and Recorder of Deer Lodge county, after the removal of the county seat from Silver Bow, and, it is stated, was at one time the "Court House" of the county. It was then successively occupied as a residence by Thomas Stuart and John S. Pemberton, and finally became a wareroom, to which purpose its late years were devoted. James Batterton, who was engaged in its demolition, picked up a little account book in the ruins, from which we make a few quotations of sales in February, March and April, 1864. The prices, we learn, were then the prevailing ones, and do not indicate the figures reached when a "corner" or "famine" sent up some particular commodity:

February	8, 2¼ lbs. rope @ $1.35	$ 3 50	February	21, 1 can peaches		2 00
"	8, 1 tin plate	40	"	21, 21½ lbs. oats at 18 cents		3 87
"	8, 1 box percussion caps	75	"	21, 1 dozen tumblers		9 00
"	8, 2 boxes cigars	10 00	"	28, 1 bottle schnappe		3 00
"	9, ¼ lb nails	25	March	3, 2 lbs dandelion coffee @ $1.10		2 20
"	11, 200 lbs. barley	36 00	"	4, 2 tin plates @ 50 cents		1 00
"	12, 30 lbs. barley	4 00	"	6, 6 plugs tobacco @ $1		6 00
"	13, 2 cans concentrated lye	2 00	"	11, 2 lbs. tobacco @ $3		6 00
"	14, 1 plug tobacco	1 00	"	20, 3 bottles wine		10 50
"	15, 1 lb rice	60	"	21, 1 bottle champagne		10 00
"	19, 1 can corn	2 00

The name of the affluent party who made these purchases has unfortunately disappeared with the first page of the account, but we are pleased to state that the bill, aggregating $1,050 for less than three months, is marked "Settled in full up to the 23d of April." Great old times those were.

Church History.—The Catholic church of the Immaculate Conception was founded by Rev. R. De Ryckere, in July, 1866. Previous to this time, however, and for many years, the place was known to the fathers of the mission, and services were held at the house of John Grant. On the first Sunday after Father De Ryckere's arrival he held service at John Grant's house, later the residence of Conrad Kohrs. From this point he visited the mining camps throughout Deer Lodge county. In October, 1866, the log house on Main street, between Fourth and Fifth—the first church building erected at Deer Lodge—was begun, and finished in December of the same year. The first services were held therein on December 8, the feast of the Immaculate Conception. In 1875, Father De Ryckere entered upon the work of building a new church. The church was finished early in 1876, and blessed March 19 of the same year. The cost of the building, including parochial house, was over $7,000. It stands on the grounds of the old cemetery, is built of solid masonry, and is altogether a neat building. The moneys to meet the expense of building were realized from the sale of the old church building and grounds and the liberal contributions of the people of the county. Father De Ryckere is the first secular priest that ever resided in the Territory. Rev. F. J. Kelleher, who came in 1873, was the second; Rev. John J. Dolls, of Butte, who came in 1881, is the third, and Rev. E. W. J. Lindersmith, chaplain U. S. A., Miles City, the fourth.

The Protestant Episcopal society of Deer Lodge was organized in 1871 by Rev. W. H. Stoy. The society was reorganized in 1875 by Rev. M. N. Gilbert. Among the original members were Mrs. W. H. Claggett, Mrs. W. W. Higgins, Mrs. Kenyon, Miss Alice B. Higgins, Mrs. M. Irvine, Miss Fannie Kart, Miss K. Bignal, Mrs. Williams, Mrs. Hyde, Miss M. Bailey, Miss Kate Kelley, Mrs. Stackpoole, Mrs. B. Bowie, Mrs. Rodgers, R. H. Mason, Mrs. Orance, Miss T. Orance, Mrs. W. A. Clark, Mrs. A. H. Mitchell, Mrs. H. Mills, Mrs. Geo. Irvine, Mrs. O. B. O'Bannon, Mrs. Zenor, Miss N. Kelley, Lewis Coleman. The first services of the church were held by Bishop Tuttle, July 19, 1868. The present church edifice was built in 1877-8, at a cost of $4,000, and consecrated in the summer of 1878 by Bishop Tuttle. The chancel window was presented by Miss Alice B. Higgins to memorialize the death of Rev. Morell Fowler, who, with his wife and five children, were killed on the Hudson railroad February, 6, 1878. The sum of $1,000 was presented to Bishop Tuttle in 1871, by the parish of St. James, Batavia, N. Y., toward building a memorial church to Rev. Morrell Fowler. This sum, with interest, amounted to $1,500. Two fairs yielded $2,000, and the public subscribed $500. There are twelve single stained glass windows with the memorial window and double window. The members of the vestry, when the church was being built, were W. A. Clark, L. Coleman, E. S. Stackpole and R. H. Mason. The bell was presented by the friends of Henry S. Arthur, of Cincinnati, who died here in 1874. The baptismal font was presented by his aunt, Mrs. Weaver, and the altar cloths by Miss Hudson, of the Boston sisterhood.

The Presbyterian church was founded June 9, 1872, Rev. Sheldon Jackson presiding. The meeting to organize was held in the court-house, when the following named persons were enrolled members of the society: Mrs. L. J. Sharpe, F. B. Miller, Thomas Aspling, Mrs. Aspling, W. Egbert Smith, Mrs. H. Pradeau and Miss Jennie D'Acheul. Thomas Aspling and W. E. Smith were elected ruling elders, and Rev. J. R. Russell, first pastor. The ruling elders resigned the same year, but W. E. Smith was re-elected. In November, 1884, a gift of a six hundred pound bell was made by S. E. Larabie, with the following inscription: "Presented to the Presbyterian church, Deer Lodge, Montana, in loving memory of Mary Ann Larabie, by her son S. E. Larabie." The present officers of the society are Thomas Aspling and T. W. Catlin, ruling elders; J. E. Dickey, secretary; T. W. Catlin, superintendent of Sunday school, and Rev. E. J. Groenveldt, pastor. The pastors of the church from 1872 to the present time are named as follows: Rev. J. R. Russell, 1872-9; Rev. J. L. Henning, 1879-80; vacancy 1880-2; Rev. E. J. Groenveldt.

Schools.—The public school building is a large frame structure, with cupola and bell, contains three rooms with all the modern appliances, and has enrolled two hundred and thirty-two scholars with an average attendance of one hundred and fifty. It has four departments and a high school course embracing limited, classical, scientific and mathematical studies sufficient to fit the student for college. Its principal is J. H. Myers, A. B., a graduate of the Kentucky University, formerly principal of the leading school in Mexico, Mo., aided by teachers graduated from the best New England and Southern schools. Both the principal and assistants are paid living salaries. The school statistics for the year ending March 30, 1883, showed the number of pupils enrolled to date to be two hundred and thirty-two, primary department one hundred and ten, intermediate department seventy-one, grammar school thirty-one, high school eighteen. The number now enrolled is three hundred and ninety-five.

The Montana Collegiate Institute was proposed by E. H. Irvine, in 1878, built up and opened in September, 1881. The Institute is decidedly one of the best buildings in this city. It is a large brick structure, three stories high, including basement, with walls over two feet thick, resting on a solid stone foundation, properly lighted, heated and ventilated, with strong oaken doors turning in and out, with its different stories connected by broad stairways and divided into various apartments. It was opened in September under W. Mountjoy, A. B., a graduate of the Christian University, of Canton, Mo., as principal, with two efficient assistant teachers, graduates of Eastern schools. The number of pupils enrolled is thirty-five. The higher studies are here taught as well as the primary. A curriculum is prescribed, which will eventuate in a regular college course. The trustees are Reverends D. J. McMillan, J. R. Russell and E. J. Groenveldt. The first regular meeting of the stockholders was held April 6, 1878, when the following officers were elected—President, E. H. Irvine, Vice-President, W. A. Clark, Secretary, Thos. Stuart, Treasurer, H. H. Zenor. The work of constructing the buildings was begun August 1, same year.

The conditions of purchase by the Presbytery of Montana of the Deer Lodge Collegiate Institute are summarized as follows: The trustees of the M. C. I. to convey to the Presbytery the building, 15 acres of grounds, furniture, philosophical apparatus, etc., for school purposes. The Presbytery is to maintain in perpetuity an Institute, where the branches of education usually taught shall be presided over by competent teachers, adequate in numbers to the pupils obtainable. The Presbytery to keep the building insured in a reliable company for the amount of debt now assumed: to provide such accommodations and erect such buildings for dormitory and boarding purposes as the necessities of the school may require. Provided, that in case of failure of the Presbytery in any one year, after 1882, and previous to 1893, to maintain at least a four months' term of such school, the property reverts to trustees on their demand, the trustees taking the improvements made by the Presbytery at an appraised value, together with a refund of moneys paid. The debt on the property was $5,774, which was also the price paid for it by the Presbytery. This sum has been paid off, and school commenced September 3, 1883. The property is now solely in possession of the Presbytery, but subject to the conditions of sale.

The contract for erecting a 40x80 three-story brick dormitory for the College of Montana was sold in June, 1885, to McDevitt & McConnell, by President McMillan. In 1884 the foundation was laid by George Cushing. The 300,000 brick required were purchased of Richards, and the brick-laying contract was let to John T. Trigg. This building gives to the college accommodations for 150 students.

An act to confirm and legalize a deed made by the President, Secretary, and the trustees of the Montana Collegiate Institute, to James R. Russell, Eikn J. Groenveldt, and Duncan J. McMillan, and to confirm the title of the College of Montana to certain real estate in the town of Deer Lodge was approved March 12, 1885.

St. Mary's Academy was instituted the first Monday of September, 1882. In 1879 the school building was begun, and completed in 1882, at a total cost of about $11,000. This sum does not include the furniture of the academy, which in itself is a very large item in the list of expenditure. Sister Evangeliste, with four assistants from Leavenworth, were the first teachers. The number of boarders ranged from 12 to 20 throughout the past year, while the day scholars numbered about 17. The commencement exercises were held June 28, 1883. Bishop Brondel was present, having arrived at Deer Lodge the same day. The main building of the academy is 46 feet square, with hip-roof, bell-tower and platform. The basement story is solid masonry, while the two upper stories are built of red brick, manufactured near Deer Lodge.

The Penitentiary was built under authority of the general government in 1870, and the first prisoner placed therein July 2, 1871. By direction of the Attorney-General of the United States the penitentiary was transferred to the control of the authorities of the United States on the first day of August, 1874, and the Territory ceased to control from that date. At the time of the transfer there was made a contract on behalf of the Territory with the Attorney General for the confinement in the penitentiary of all persons convicted of violating the laws of the Territory, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary, at the rate of one dollar per day for each convict so confined, which contract expired on the first day of August, 1876. The directors and warden were continued in office to audit and certify to the accounts of the United States under this contract and to manage the labor of convicts. The warden served for a salary of forty dollars per month.

The previous contract named the consideration for feeding, clothing, and medical treatment of prisoners at $1.26 per prisoner, per day, but this sum was reduced to seventy-five cents, and under warden Bodkins' administration fell to seventy cents, before the seventy-eight cent rate was adopted. The penitentiary proper is a large stone building, but not completed according to the original plan. This institution stands on a reservation of twelve acres, four acres of which form the grounds, within a sixteen foot high fence. The number of cells is twenty-eight, while the number of prisoners is over eighty, a fact which calls for new buildings. The total number of prisoners from July, 1871, to February 1, 1883, was 268. In July, 1885, McTague relieved Wilson as deputy Superintendent of the Penitentiary. Beaupre, Fish and Walton resigned as guards, and the others were continued, the force now consisting of Will. Witters, James W. Brown, R. H. Hereford, Jas. Murphy, Jno. W. Cleary, Alex. Brown, S. M. C. Hughes, C. B. Harris and A. E. Robyns.

Hospitals.—Deer Lodge hospital was founded in September, 1862, with Dr. Mitchell, physician and surgeon. He continued in this position until December, 1882, when he resigned. During the winter's session of 1882–3 Dr. C. G. Glass, of Deer Lodge, was appointed. Dr. Mitchell was the first surgeon of the penitentiary. He was succeeded by Doctors Whitford, Holmes, Musingbrod, who served successively until 1875. In 1875 Dr. Mitchell was re-appointed, and held the position up to December, 1882, when he resigned, Dr. Glass succeeding.

The Hospital of St. Joseph, Deer Lodge, was established in October, 1873, by the sisters of charity of the Leavenworth House. At that time two sisters from the house at Helena crossed the mountains and founded the hospital in a building which was subsequently used as the Methodist church, and then was known as Dr. Mitchell's hospital. Pending the arrival of the sisters, Dr. Mitchell attended to the county hospital, as he had done for years before, and on their arrival they were placed in charge of the sick and poor of the county. In November, 1873, the sisters from Leavenworth arrived and assumed their duties. The present hospital (two-story frame) was erected in 1873–4, and opened in March, 1874. The hospital building cost between $4,000 and $5,000, the moneys being collected by the sisters and the work carried out under the direction of Father De Ryckere. During the first years of its course the patients averaged about six. In later years the number has increased from ten to twenty.

Old Cemetery.—The act to authorize the county commissioners of Deer Lodge county to remove the dead from the cemetery within the limits of the town, was approved February 13, 1874. It authorized the commissioners to cause to be removed all the dead buried in the cemetery within the limits of the town, to the new cemetery situate one mile west of the town, and to appropriate any moneys in the town site fund to pay the expenses of such removal. After all the remains were removed, the ground occupied by the cemetery was dedicated to public use, and disposed of in the same manner as town lots are disposed of.

Societies.—Deer Lodge, No. 14, A. F. & A. M., was chartered October 5, 1869. The officers and members are named in the following list:—

Peter Volkton, W. M.; John Gerber, S. W.; Henry A. Hurlbutt, J. W.; Ed. S. Stackpole, Treasurer; Richard T. Kennon, Secretary; Harry D. Sims, S. D.; J. E. Van Gundy, J. D.; John G. Ballerton, S. S.; Numeris Humber, J. S.; John N. Fox, Tyler; Ed. S. Stackpole, P. G. M.; Richard T. Kennon, P. S. G. W.; Chas. K. Hardenbrook, P. M.; William A. Clarke, P. G. M.; Hiram Knowles, P. G. M.; Thomas Aspling, Joaquin Abascal, John Allen, Nehemiah Beery, James H. Batterton, Nick Bielenberg, Wm. W. Botkin, Frank J. Calenburg, Geo. Cockrell, Louis Coleman, Nelson J. Dovenspeck, J. J. Downhouer, Philip E. Evans, Robert Fenner, William R. Ferguson, William J. Galbraith, Thomas Geagan, Daniel Gamer, John W. Gilbert, V. K. Goss, Alexander Highland, James Hartford, N. Humbert, Henry A. Hurlbutt, Charles D. Kenyon, Conrad Kohrs, Joshua Lincoln, John S. Mills, George W. Morse, Frank Mason, James K. Mallory, John W. Nelson, Orville B. O'Bannon, James B. Orr, Frank S. Price, Chas. Roleau, James H. Robertson, Henry S. Reed, Harry D. Sims, Henry S. Stone, Thomas Stuart, John L. Sweeney, Robert N. Tibbitts, Patrick Woodlock, John T. Woodman, Jacob R. Van Gundy, Henry Weiserman.

Banner Lodge, No. 7, I. O. G. T., was organized at Deer Lodge May 1, 1868, but owing to the exodus of charter members the same year, the organization ceased and the charter was surrendered. A. Smith was the deputy of this lodge.

Deer Lodge, No. 23, I. O. G. T., Deer Lodge city, was chartered October 5, 1870, with sixteen members. T. E. Clohecy was the first lodge deputy.

Centennial Lodge, No. 55, I. O. G. T., was organized June 6, 1876, with the following charter members: T. H. Irvine, T. W. Flowers, John O'Neil, John Marchion, James E.

Owings, Henry McMurphy, C. S. Vanlowen, W. L. Stevens, Geo. W. Irwin, Thos. Todhunter. Mesdames M. C. Flowers, Alice Stevens, S. J. Hensley, Maggie Irvine, Nannie Kelley, Jane O'Neil and Nettie Rogan, with Thomas W. Flowers, W. C. T. James E. Owings was elected first deputy.

Queen of Hope Lodge, No. 6, I. O. G. T., was organized at New Chicago, Deer Lodge county, by Hector S. Horton, October 20, 1878, with fifteen members.

Cottonwood Lodge, No. 2, I. O. O. F., Deer Lodge city, was chartered June 12, 1871, and instituted by the D. D. G. S. Donevan. The names of members in June, 1883, are: John O'Neill, N. G.; J. A. Farnsworth, V. G.; Lew Coleman, secretary; M. Brien, treasurer; Thos. Aspling, J. A. Bradley, P. Birmingham, C. Bielenberg, P. Brogan, W. Coleman, L. Coleman, E. Dashiel, John Doulon, W. Durand, J. D. Eastman, J. A. Farnsworth, J. Gerber, A. Heath, J. A. Hyde, H. Hawley, W. G. Hardenbrook, R. T. Kennon, John Keating, P. Lansing, G. A. Locke, John Lehso, J. A. Lane, B. Lyons, A. Linstadt, J. K. Mallory, A. H. Mitchell, J. C. Robinson, Chas. Rouleau, Samuel Scott, Addison Smith, Nathan Smith, Duncan Seaton, G. F. Sherwood, J. E. Van Gundy, Wm. Walker, Jos. F. White, Wm. Zosel, J. H. Owings, John Thomas and Daniel Thomas.

Valley Lodge, No. 6, K. of P., Deer Lodge, was organized a few years ago. F. E. Hass, J. H. Owings, A. H. Mitchell, George Finlayson, Thomas D. Rockwell, H. G. Ward, John F. Strauhal and Charles Aspling, are Past Chancellors of the Lodge. The number of members is fifty-six, and the amount of reserve fund, $360. The principal officers in 1883 were: C. Aspling, C. C.; George Cockrell, recorder; and John Thompson, M. of E. The present C. C. is James B. Wills, and the K. of R. and S., G. T. Tucker.

George H. Thomas, Post No. 8, G. A. R., Deer Lodge, was organized February 23, 1884, by Colonel P. R. Dolman, with the following members: James H. Mills, E. G. Creel, William Coleman, J. D. Jenks, B. F. Martez, P. Engle, John Finnegan, Lew. Coleman, Howard H. Zenor, E. P. Mills, L. Govereney, Daniel Boisvert, J. Galbraith and S. Glover. James H. Mills was elected P. C.; D. J. McMillan is present post commander, and Lew. Coleman, adjutant.

A call was made April 5, 1883, for a meeting to organize a military company, to be held on April 9, at the Fireman's hall. This call was issued by the following named persons: George S. Miller, J. D. Eastman, William R. Edgar, James B. McMaster, V. K. Goss, C. H. Strauhal, A. S. Higgins, George M. Root, G. W. Todd, P. Connolly, George H. Bell, Thomas McTague, J. H. Wildman, H. S. Reed, J. D. Phillips, S. P. Hauschild, Samuel Maturen, H. A. McPherson, Thomas Morgan, W. Napton, H. D. Sims, J. F. Strauhal, W. P. Clark, George S. Kreamer, Harry Peterson, A. Reinhold, W. G. Tomkins, Thomas F. Ward, Edward McMahon, L. C. Walters, Frank S. Price, Edgar Fish, T. Mckaness, J. B. Dumouchel.

The Deer Lodge County Bible Society was organized four years ago. The second annual meeting was held in the Presbyterian church, Deer Lodge, August 5, 1883, when the following officers were elected: President, N. Humber; vice-president, Thomas Aspling; treasurer, S. E. Larabie; secretary, T. W. Catlin. Executive committee: Addison Smith, E. J. Groeneveld, Mrs. Addison Smith, Miss Bettie Williams, David Irvine.

Statue of Liberty.—In June, 1885, the people of Deer Lodge transmitted to New York their contribution toward the fund for building the pedestal for this great recognition of our government.

Fire Department.—The fire department of Deer Lodge was organized March 18, 1872, with the following officers: Foreman, William H. Richardson; first assistant, H. G. Valiton; second assistant, John Gerber; hose captain, D. C. Lounsbury; secretary, Joseph A. Hyde; treasurer, Peter Valiton. A public subscription was made, and an order sent to Hoyt, Busick & Co., New York, for one of Button & Blake's improved engines, a hose cart, and 600 feet of 3-inch rubber hose. They arrived the following July. The engine is a 7-inch cylinder, admits forty men to the brakes, and has thrown a stream 185 feet horizontally from the nozzle, and 110 to 120 feet perpendicularly. The cost of the engine, hose and carriage was $3,094.31; three cisterns, $900; hooks and ladders, $200; fire-bell and structure, $325. Total, $4,519.31. Except $500, subscribed by the county, this was all contributed by citizens. Owing to the services rendered by the department in 1874, a number of new members were added, so that in 1875 it embraced almost all the leading citizens, viz:

Fire warden of Deer Lodge, Samuel Scott; foreman of company, H. G. Valiton; first assistant, Charles S. Warren; second assistant, Thomas Strang; secretary, John Gerber; treasurer, Dr. A. H. Mitchell; captain of hose, N. Dickenson. Active members: A. H. Mitchell, John Gerber, T. H. Williams, J. H. Wildman, R. Boisvert, Peter Valiton, H. G. Valiton, Charles Ruleau, N. Dickenson, Thomas Strang, W. Stevens, R. S. Kelley, Phil. McGovern, Charles Beilenberg, H. Harris, J. A. Vaughn, Charles S. Warren, Robert Harris, H. H. Zenor, Thomas Beebee, O. B. O'Bannon, James A. Talbott, Henry Jacobs, Daniel A. Steele, H. S. Clarke, W. W. Jones, Robert W. Miller, C. N. Bowie, W. H. Weimar, J. B. Wilcox, J. F. Forbis, J. E. Van Gundy, William Coleman, J. S. Connors, John O'Neil, William Hyde, John Glass, Earl Warren, B. Levi, Conrad Kohrs, Thomas Stuart; and the honorary members: L. J. Sharp, Samuel Scott, William Richardson, George Perry Pioneer.

Banks.—Donnell, Clark & Larabie entered the banking business at Deer Lodge in the spring of 1870, which is still continued under the management of S. E. Larabie. During the years 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874 and 1875, this banking house shipped eastward from $725,000 to $1,225,000 annually. To-day the business of the house at Deer Lodge is extensive, and its management perfect. R. W. Donnell, late senior member of the firm, was engaged in the wholesale mercantile business at Virginia City and Helena, from 1863 to 1869, and since that time has been senior partner in the banking company of Donnell, Lawson and Simpson, of New York City. The company's bank at Butte is managed by W. A. Clark. The banking house of Donnell, Clarke & Larabie, of Deer Lodge, bought in 1871, $1,255,000; in 1872, $1,100,000; in 1873, $970,000; in 1874, $850,000; in 1875, $725,000; in 1876, $650,000; in 1877, $450,000; in 1878, $300,000; in 1879, $225,000; in 1880, $250,000; in 1881, $230,000, or $7,075,000 within the last eleven years, which, added to the amount bought by the First National Bank, owned and operated formerly by the same parties, aggregates nearly $10,000,000 bought by one house during the last thirteen years, and nearly all of it from Pioneer and Bear districts. In 1882 the value of dust and bullion shipped by this house was $176,000. (Vide Butte Bank for organic change.)

Hotels.—The McBurney House was erected in 1871, by George McBurney, a gentleman of large experience in building hotels, and certainly in its architecture and material it is a lasting monument to his ability. Situated on the principal street of Deer Lodge, it at once attracts the eye of the traveler. It is a large edifice, made of brick manufactured in this valley, which, unlike Denver (Col.) brick, has stood well the test of time, and rests firmly on a granite foundation, hewn from the Rocky mountains. With its stone columns in front, supporting a wide piazza surrounded by a substantial railing, and above this another story covered with a metallic roof, it certainly presents a favorable aspect. The Scott House is another good hotel, well conducted by Samuel Scott. The City Hotel is managed by Charles Roleau.

ANACONDA.

This town was founded by the Anaconda Company, in Warm Spring creek cañon, in 1883, on the recommendation of Marcus Daly, the representative of J. B. Haggin. In June, 1883, a second survey of the town plat was completed. On June 25, Clark & Cohen erected the first building, and took down the tent in which they conducted business up to that time. Lots on Main street sold for $500 and on Front street for $350. Within a few months the population increased to 1,500, fell to 1,000, and then followed the decrease to its present normal number. The following descriptions show what was being done here in August, 1883: "The one and five-eighths of a mile flume at Anaconda is nearly finished. It is 4 x 5 feet inside, made of matched lumber throughout, and covered with dirt. An open cut and tunnel about 750 feet long is being run from Warm Springs creek that will connect the flume by a 75-foot perpendicular shaft, where a turbine wheel of great power is used. An order was lately received to increase the capacity of the smelter from three hundred to five hundred tons per day, and the two massive stone walls nearly completed have therefore been built each 1,000 feet long, instead of 750, as at first commenced on the 22d ult. Since that time 125 graders have made quite a showing. Over an acre of ground has been leveled by the plow and scraper, making the front twenty feet above ground. On the left are two other stone walls built, and terraces above are being blasted out of the solid granite for the concentrator. The railroad will run above all this. Lumber and brick are being delivered. About eighty houses are in various stages of construction, including seven hotels and boarding houses, twelve saloons and six stores. The only butcher shop uses one beef daily. The main street is situated at the upper end of town and runs north and south. On it ordinary lots fifty feet wide sold for $500, and $750 was paid for corner lots, while lots on Front street (running east and west with the valley and creek and facing the latter, and eighty from and parallel with the proposed railroad) sell for $300, and $320 for corner lots. The lower end of Front street is opposite the smelter and nearly half a mile below Main street. On First street a ditch four feet wide and one foot deep has been dug. It has a gravelly bottom and six inches of water runs its entire length on the south side, where the company's brick offices are being built, and which will be ready for the plasterers on Monday. On the same side of the street, below, Mr. Oakes, the company's clerk, is having built for rent six frame houses 24x24 feet and ten feet apart. Mr. Read, company's clerk, is also building twelve rooms 12 x 16 feet, in two rows, half of which are finished and rented for $10 each room; a good investment. Mr. Savory, of Cable, has a warehouse nearly built 24 x 100 feet. Numerous wells dug find a ready flow of pure water at a depth of twenty-five feet. Six conveyances arrive daily from Warm Springs, Stuart and Butte, and all uncertainty must now be dispelled as to the location of the Anaconda smelters." In August, 1883, the place contained about 300 inhabitants. During this month Prof. Moore, of Butte, was appointed first postmaster. There were three brickyards, a number of sawmills, a sash factory, a lumber yard, blacksmith shops, boot and shoe shop, and in fact everything required to make a prosperous town, where, forty-two days prior to this date, there was not the sign of a habitation. The Commissioners authorized the building of a 14 x 18 three-room jail or calaboose in August. Sheriff McMaster appointed N. (Dick) Dickinson deputy sheriff there.

The business circle in 1884–5 is as follows:—Barrett & Jacky, harness; Butte Hardware Co.; J. R. Clark, D. Cohen, James Hamilton, general merchants; Benj. Falk, meats; W. M. Jack, hardware; Lynch & Mather, hotel; B. T. Mahon, drugs; C. H. Moore, stationery and notions; E. M. Ratcliffe, Continental Hotel. In March, 1885, the Anaconda Hall Association was incorporated with the following members:—J. S. Hamilton, C. H. Tracy, M. J. Fitzpatrick, J. H. Bartlett and B. E. Storr.

The site is most pleasing, having for a background lofty mountain ranges, with timber-covered sides, which are to be reserved. On the west is the Warm Spring creek cañon, the promising mining districts of Silver Hill, Silver Lake, the productive Cable and Pyrenees mines and mills, and it is but thirty miles by a good road to the famed mines of the Flint Creek and Granite Mountain districts. To the east, south and north is the Deer Lodge valley, the stockmen and farmers of which find this a convenient and desirable trading point. The Anaconda Smelting Works are located directly across Warm Spring creek, northwest of the present business and residence portion of the town, and they are the most extensive, not only on the American continent, but in the world, according to the process used, capacity being 500 tons. The ore is taken to bins above the concentrator on a railroad grade of 225 feet to the mile. The concentrator has a capacity of five hundred tons daily; two turbine wheels furnish four hundred and fifty horse power. The concentrates are then delivered into the smelting buildings by tramways. The two smelters have twenty-six stacks and calcining furnaces equal to all demands. In addition there is a matte house, in which the breakers are also run by water power, the wheel being utilized at night to furnish power to the electric generators, two of the United States being in use. Forty lights in and around the buildings make it light as day. Railroad tracks run to and through the ore and coal houses and through the smelter buildings and matte house, all supplies being delivered just where needed and the products loaded on cars as necessary.

The Anaconda Copper mine was purchased very nearly five years ago, by J. B. Haggin, for $30,000. Since that time upwards of $500,000 have been expended on the works, under the management of Marcus Daly, while over $100,000 have been invested in modern copper machinery. The main shaft, laid off in three compartments, is about 900 feet in depth. Down to 200 feet the conformation is silver ore, while below that level it is copper, carrying from $10 to $20 in silver per ton.

The St. Lawrence is almost a duplicate of the great Anaconda, and is under the same general management.

The Anaconda School was established early in 1884. The number of children of school age in the district is 210. Here also the Anaconda Review is published. Rev. J. H. Phœnix is pastor of the Christian Church.

PHILLIPSBURG.

While the miners were laying the foundations of their great industry, in 1865, a small town had sprung up named Phillipsburg, in honor of Philip Deidsheimer. Deane started a little boarding house, Dick Dickenson and Johnny Gerber opened a saloon, Daniel Stewart & Co. had a store. French followed them. Dr. Merrill brought in a large stock of goods, Wm. Lang opened a saloon and bakery, J. Tonders and O. Emerson a blacksmith shop; C. Elheridge built 27 cabins during the season, Henry Imkamp brought in a stock of liquors, Wm. Weinstein some goods, and for a while it was a genuine boom. The population in 1867 was over 700, being the highest number of inhabitants since the foundation of the settlement down to the present time. The large brick school house was erected in 1879, and other improvements effected. The business of the village is in the hands of the following named firms and individuals:—Allison Sherman, furniture; Dr. C. N. Bowie, Caplice & Smith, David Simons and Wm. Weinstein, general merchants; Mrs. Hynes and M. Kaires, hotel proprietors; Harris & Son, shoemakers; Wm. Hammond, livery and wagon manufacturer; Charles Krager, brewer; Henry Imkamp, wholesale and retail liquors; Wm. Lang, John Rains, M. O. Ragan, A. McIntire, saloons; Wm. McDonald, blacksmith; Mrs. Myers, physician; John Opp, barber, and D. Simons, postmaster. There are two crushing mills in operation here. The population is placed at 500.

Flint Creek Lodge, No. 11, A. F. and A. M., Phillipsburg, was chartered October 7, 1867. The Past Masters are Eli Holland, Josiah M. Merrill and G. V. Sherman. The master masons are Gilbert L. Atwater, James R. Blackheart, Charles Cooper, J. S. Collins, Aaron Davis, Adolph Davis, Francis M. Durfee, Albert Griffith, Elijah T. Huson, Louis Henderson, John Holquist, Charles Holquist, James Hanson, D. B. Jenkins, Joshua Jennings, Alfred Lock, James Milligan, George S. Mason, John Norlin, James O'Brien, C. C. Pearce, Martin Ryan, Charles H. Smith, George Sweeney, Reuben Tyrrell, Samuel P. Wilson.

Band of Hope Lodge, No. 20, I. O. G. T., Phillipsburg, was organized by T. H. Todhunter, November 3, 1876. The roll contains the names of thirteen members, including the officers: R. T. Rombauer, H. D. Ramage, Elijah Bergeson, C. U. Bowie, T. J. Montgomery, and sisters Durfee, Caroline Rombauer and Bowie. H. S. Horton was the first deputy of the Lodge.

Cable Lodge, No. 9, I. O. O. F., was founded, the ninth in order. The members of the Lodge are Charles Bray, N. G.; Benjamin Pizer, V. G.; W. T. Allison, secretary; Wm. Weinstein, treasurer; C. Kroger, T. F. Williams, S. P. Wilson, J. Patten, Barney Levy, S. E. Allen, J. Milligan, C. Alberts, J. H. Kolbeck, W. Davis, T. Botscheider, S. J. Silverman, Wm. Ramsey, Henry Eppell, A. Porter, S. A. Piper, John Westfall, B. E. Vinson, D. T. Campbell, J. R. Featherman, Hugh Phillips, I. N. De Cong, F. E. Wright, J. H. Smith, Wm. Tormey, Gus. Telleene and J. S. Pittmore.

The mines of Phillipsburg were discovered in February, 1865, by a prospector named Hector Horton, now one of its resident and most respected citizens. "This gentleman," says the chronicler, "previous to this time, was engaged in mining pursuits on the other side, and had, by close economy and strict attention to his business affairs, acquired sufficient money to purchase a sack of flour—an article, by the way, greatly in demand at that time, being attainable only at prices ranging from $75 to $100 per hundred pounds. Being a prudent man, he knew that to consume such an amount of breadstuff time and privacy were required in some sequestered spot, where Nature in her primeval solitude and grandeur reigned supreme; where hungry visitors came not, where float quartz in its abundance might reveal unto him a sufficient reward for his unselfish and voluntary seclusion from the haunts of men. To that end, packing his horses, he launched forth into the vast wilds of northern Montana, through dense forests, o'er rugged and precipitous mountains, until "Eureka" float was found. Quartz, rich and in large quantities, on every hand. He immediately divided his flour with himself, made camp near where the Hope mill now stands, and straightway proceeded to locate the cordova lode. In 1866 he visited Silver Bow, and returning brought with him James Stuart and Reece Anderson. He was followed shortly after by Phillip Deidsheimer, Charley Frost, Dan and Sandy Brown and others, who discovered the Trout, Poor Man's Joy, Comanche, and many other rich and productive leads, all of which were located in 1866. Rumor, as usual, reported the new find. A large stampede resulted as a necessary sequence, and early in '66 the town was laid out, a district organized, and prospecting done sufficient to determine the great richness and extent of its mineral deposits. In 1867 the St. Louis and Montana Company made the Canon road, and the same year erected the stone mill building near the town site. The Northwest Company began work at Tower, one-half mile from Phillipsburg, re-organized in 1871 as the Northwest Company, and in 1875 erected the first great ore mill in the Territory.

The Northwest Company was the corporate name of an organization, whose head offices were in Deer Lodge county. The members were Geo. W. Cass, C. Tower, Thos. L. Jewett, Wm. G. Moorehead, John K. Ewing and Gen. A. B. Nettleton, all of Philadelphia. The capital was 1,000,000. To this company Col. W. F. Sanders sold the Speckled Trout mine at Phillipsburg. The company also owned the Poor Man's Joy, Kitty Clyde and Pocahontas mines.

The Sharktown, Scratchawl, Blackmail and Apache leads were the property of Murray & Durfee since 1866. The firm expended $50,000 on this valuable mining tract during the twelve years ending in 1878.

The Salmon, Estell, Emma and other leads formed the property of Holland & Estell, the Vanderbilt of C. M. Freeman, while other leads were worked by Dr. J. M. Merrill, J. K. Pardee, Waterbury, Cullen, Schneple, McLand, Kirber and others. (Vide General Hist.)

Algonquin.—At Hasmarck is the pattern mill of Montana, the Algonquin. It was started up in February, 1880, with twenty stamps and six amalgamating pans, three settlers, dry crushing, revolving cylinder, roaster, and an engine of one hundred and fifty horse power. The rest of the machinery was constructed by Griffith & Wedge, of Ohio. The entire cost of the mill was about $82,000, the hoisting works about $15,000. The Algonquin Company employs eighty-five men, and has crushed within the last year 3,200 tons of ore. They are down now in the Algonquin four hundred feet; in the Salmon three hundred and thirty, and have recently struck a rich streak in the latter, making it look better than ever before. H. A. Stiles, of Phillipsburg, is president; J. H. Williams, vice-president; J. K. Pardee, superintendent; H. Showers, assistant; Hopkins, foreman of the mill; J. Ainslee, engineer; Fairgraves, book-keeper. The old Algonquin Company was organized in 1875 to work the old lodes.

The Hope mines operated by Superintendent Perkin are the property of a company of whom the following named gentlemen are officers: Sam Gatz, president; Edwin Harrison, vice-president; J. R. Lionberger, treasurer; J. T. Fields, secretary. In the mill are running ten stamps, six amalgamating pans, three settlers, three concentrators and an engine of one hundred horse power. The machinery was principally bought in St. Louis and Chicago, and the building of the mill cost about $200,000.

The Speckled Trout is managed by M. Caplice. This old mine continues to pour forth a stream of golden ore.

The Granite Mountain was purchased by C. McClure in 1881. He was also the discoverer. Shortly afterward it was bonded for $40,000, and stocked to the Granite Mountain Company, J. R. Lionberger, St. Louis, president. Work was immediately commenced upon it; a tunnel was run in from above two hundred and twenty-five feet; a lower tunnel was run five hundred and seventy-five feet, striking the lead at two hundred and thirty-five feet. The twenty stamp mill is situated on the mountain side at the end of Tunnel No. 4, which is now in some 1,700 feet, there being three other tunnels above it and one below, all run in on the vein, which is from five to nine feet wide, and has no waste rock in it. The mill was started in December, 1884, has been steadily running ever since, and has put out from $80,000 to $90,000 per month, netting dividends of from $65,000 to $75,000 per month. This property is owned by the Granite Mountain Mining Company, a corporation, most of the stock-holders being St. Louis men. Dr. J. M. Merrill, Chas. H. Clark and Charley McClure, of Montana, are fortunately large stock-holders in it. John W. Plummer, an old and experienced miner, is the superintendent in charge. Some stock which sold a few months ago for $30,000 was valued in June, 1885, at a quarter of a million of dollars.

PIONEER DISTRICT.

The first discovery of gold in Montana was made on Gold Creek, in the year 1861, by an old Mexican miner who was known by the sobriquet of "Gold Tom." His first location was about five miles below the present site of Pioneer Village. During the year following, James and Granville Stuart brought appliances from Walla Walla, and began the first systematic operations in placer mining in the Territory on what was appropriately named Pioneer Bar, and erected sluices May 8, 1862. The extent of this region known to contain gold is about five miles in an easterly and westerly direction and two miles northerly and southerly, "Independent" district being on the east, "Pioneer" on the west, and "Pike's Peak" between them. Yam Hill or Pilgrim Bar, French Gulch, Gold Hill, Squaw Gulch, Woods Flat, Wilson's Bar, Trail Gulch, Prowse Bar, Windy Bar, Hart's Gravel, Rocker Gulch, and Dry Gulch are among the many districts now included in the region designated as Pioneer. (Burchard's Reports 1881.) In 1865 the mines were re-opened, and September 22, 1866, the district was organized, with Hugh Bratton, President; J. S. Pemberton, Secretary; and James Glasgow, Recorder; claims of 200 feet up and down the gulch. Each person was entitled to one claim by preemption, and an additional claim for discovery. Bar claims were 200 feet front, running back to the summit of the hill. All present at the meeting were allowed to stake one claim for a friend. The laws were signed by J. S. Pemberton, Hugh Bratton, A. W. Hayward, R. S. Kelly, H. M. Thomas, James R. Glasgow, Thomas Stuart, F. H. W. Young, H. A. Rice, L. H. Jewett, James Gallaway, and W. F. Mellen. The first record of location was made September 22, by the Pioneer Ditch Company—Pemberton, Bratton, Hayward, Thomas, Rice, Glasgow—the claim being for 2,400 feet.

In a communication addressed to the committee on resources of Deer Lodge county, by E. H. Irvine, dated Yamhill, July 5, 1875, it is stated that, in June, 1866, the Rock Creek Ditch Company commenced the construction of, and in the spring of 1868 completed, their main ditch, carrying water from Rock Creek to the then undeveloped, and you might say unprospected mining districts of Willow Creek, Pike's Peak and Pioneer. To meet the increased demand for water during the ensuing years, the company have added such improvements as give them a grand total in the way of ditches, dams and reservoirs as follows: The main Rock Creek ditch, thirteen miles long, six feet wide and three feet deep, with a grade of three-sixteenths of an inch to the rod, carries eighteen hundred inches of water, measured under six-inch pressure. The Willow Creek ditch, five miles long, thirty inches wide and eighteen inches deep, has a capacity of eight hundred inches. The Pike's Peak ditch, three miles long, six feet wide, two feet deep, and one-half inch grade, has a capacity of two thousand inches. The McMullen ditch, two miles long, twenty inches deep, thirty inches wide, with three-fourths of an inch grade, has a capacity of eight hundred inches. Woodward ditch, two miles long, capacity six hundred inches. Dry Gulch ditch, one mile long, capacity one hundred inches. Pioneer ditch, three miles long, capacity 140 inches. There was also constructed about this time the Keystone and lower Rock Creek ditches, with a combined capacity of twelve hundred inches, and the respective lengths of four and seven miles, making the combined length of ditches conveying water to this camp forty miles, with a combined capacity of seven thousand seven hundred and forty inches. In addition to the above the company has constructed a dam at the outlet of the Rock Creek Lake four hundred feet long and thirty-five feet high, forming a reservoir a mile and a half long and one mile wide. The aggregate cost of the lake, dam, ditches, reservoirs, flumes and head dams, was about one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. The gross yield of the property since its construction approximates three hundred and ninety-four thousand nine hundred and thirty-five dollars, with an outlay for tending and repairs not exceeding seventy-five thousand dollars, leaving a profit to the company of two hundred and eighty-nine thousand nine hundred and thirty-five dollars. The average mining season for the seven years has been twenty-seven weeks, having commenced as early as the 15th of April, and running as late as the 23d of November. The average number of companies using water has been nineteen, mining under the hydraulic system, and employing eight men each, at the uniform wages of five dollars per diem of ten hours. There has been worked out during the time above stated about six hundred and sixty-five acres of ground, with an average depth of fifteen feet and a gross yield in gold dust of two million seven hundred and forty-three thousand five hundred and fifty dollars. The cost of mining the six hundred and sixty-five acres is, for water, three hundred and ninety-four thousand nine hundred and thirty-five dollars; for labor, flumes and other expenses, seven hundred and eighty-nine thousand eight hundred and seventy dollars; leaving to the claim holders a net profit of one million nine hundred and fifty-three thousand six hundred dollars. As to the prospected but undeveloped resources of the camp I would say from an examination of our records I find that there is claimed of ground, for which applications for patent have been made under the mining laws of Congress, twelve hundred and eighty-seven acres; of ground claimed under the local laws of the districts, not less than six hundred acres: making a total of eighteen hundred and eighty-seven acres of mining ground claimed for mining purposes and not worked; which, judging from the past seven years' experience, which with our present methods of and appliances for mining will require a period equal to three times the present age of our camp, or twenty-one years." During the fourteen years ending in 1882, there have been worked in the various camps, under these ditches, 3,000 acres, averaging fifteen feet in depth, and yielding $12,000,000. The ditches now are over 110 miles in length, with a capacity of 10,000 inches of water, miners' measure, built at a cost of over $300,000.

The first marriage was Alex DeLong and Miss Jefferies in the spring of 1868. The first death was that of the suicide, Frank Eisco, early in 1868. The first birth was a child of Mrs. Mary Hubbard. The first sermon was preached in July, 1867, by Mr. Comfort, and the first store was opened by Mr. Pattee. The first Justice of the Peace was D. L. Irvine, elected in 1869.

The first school was opened November 15, 1870, by J. B. Jennings. On October 18, 1869, School District No. 7, Gold Creek township, was organized, with Lawrence Mills, John Thomas, and N. McMish Directors, and Val. Blum Clerk. The number of children who attended during the year was eight, and the moneys received $330.50.

During the earlier years of mining, 1866-7, the population ranged from 800 to 1,000. It cannot be doubted that had the stampede of July 20, 1862, not occurred, the growth of the district would be of such a marked and permanent character that now a city would stand amid the great placers, instead of a village of 271 inhabitants. In 1879 there were 200 Chinese working in the district, and from 400 to 500 white men. The village is located from Deer Lodge, 16 miles; Mullen's Canon, 10½; Rock Creek, 8; Yam Hill, 3½; Butte, 56; Bailey's mill, 9; O'Connor's mill, 13; New Chicago, 14; Missoula, 74; and Helena 61 miles.

The business circle of Pioneer is made up as follows: Mrs. Clarke and C. W. Wilkinson, hotels; M. W. Kelly, A. G. Wilhelm, Quong Waugh, Quong Lee, general merchants; James Petty, John McClellan, Benj. Heaney, liquors; Joseph Daddow, livery; Allen Johnson, blacksmith, and Frank Ritts, shoemaker. The placers may be said to be in the village, or rather the village in the placers.

The rich gold and silver quartz discoveries at Henry Martin's camp, near the head-waters of the left-hand fork of Gold Creek, were made in August, 1873. It is reported that assays of the ore have run over four hundred ounces in silver and twenty-five dollars in gold per ton. The facilities for developing the mines are good, there is plenty of wood and water. The camp is about seven miles from Pioneer, and is daily visited by parties anxious to get locations.

NEW CHICAGO.

New Chicago, a new village on the old stage road between Deer Lodge and Missoula, was founded July 4, 1872, by John A. Featherstone, who came to the Territory in 1864. He it was who chased Bucker and arrested him at Boise City, October 21, 1864, after a chase of 4,000 miles. He erected the first building and opened the first store. The village school-house was built in 1874 at a cost of $1,000. The number of school children in district No. 14, in 1883, was 80, of whom 42 attended school. The first hotel was established by D. M. Taylor & Sons, in June, 1873, which was burned January 27, 1882. There is no religious organization known in the village, although a Protestant Episcopal society once existed there. The first marriage was that of Elijah T. Huson to Alice Taylor. The first death was that of Mrs. Joseph Webb, in the spring of 1873. The population of the village proper is 50, while in the valley of Flint creek there are 500 people. The vote cast by this precinct in November, 1882, was 137. The first ranch located in the district was in 1865. The first school teacher was Mattie Self, who presided over eleven scholars. The business of the village is represented by two stores, a good hotel and livery, two saloons, blacksmith shop, flouring mill, postoffice, and telegraph office. The storekeepers are Caplice, Smith & Dingwall, J. A. and J. B. Featherstone; the liquor dealers, J. B. McMorton and Reuben Conn; Don Berry, McPhoil & Bros., live stock and farmers; Morse & Dunkelberg, flouring mills; A. McPhoil, hotel and livery; Roper & Frangmon, blacksmiths.

The first serious crime which was committed in the valley was the dual murder in December, 1880. Three men, known respectively as Boulder Fritz, French Phil, and Donnelly, had been living together in a cabin on the Hellgate river. On Sunday, December 26, 1880, some men, having occasion to pass the cabin, stopped, and were horrified to find Donnelly and French Phil both dead on the floor—the latter with his head partially blown away and a double-barreled shot-gun clasped between his feet, the muzzle pointing toward his face.

A lodge of Good Templars was organized at New Chicago last year, of which the following named members are the present officers in order of rank: Frank Carnegie, Miss S. F. Milliken, Charles Tinklepaugh, Charles Thomas, Frank Wood, Thomas Fisher, John Childs, Helm, Miss Maggie Bishop, Miss L. E. Bingham, Miss Ella Thomas.

SETTLEMENTS AND MINING CAMPS.

Blackfoot City was located May 16, 1865. The first ditch was carried in by Bratton & Pemberton, in 1865; next the Ohio ditch, completed by Pounds & Green. The principal claim holders in 1879 on what is known as Ophir bar, are, first a lot of Chinamen; next in order, Quigley & Quigley, William Pearl, Bratton, Pemberton & Quigley, and Bratton. The next location is known as Nelson Hill. First in order, Stone & Co., Hubbard & Quigley, Davis & Co., Kimberly & Co., In Ophir gulch, above Blackfoot, Lee, Montgomery & Co., Steve Troutman, and some Chinamen. In Eureka gulch are Hubbard & Co., Echols & Co., and a Mr. Dana. On Carpenter's bar we find Pounds, Green & McLain, Pounds & Green, and the Bed-rock Flume. In the upper part of the gulch Joshua Lincoln & Co., H. Curtis, John Collins, Mr. Brown and Charles Lindley. In the upper portion of Snowshoe gulch are Kelley & Co., Otto & Co, Johnson & Co., and a Chinese company. On the tributaries of the same, Mr. McKay. Since 1879 many changes have been effected in the ownership of old claims; new discoveries have been made in the vicinity, and Blackfoot City, which was partially destroyed by fire, June 29, 1869, is now advancing toward its proper place among the towns of the Territory. At Blackfoot City, C. G. Birdseye and S. W. Spear conduct general stores; while J. R. Quigley deals in liquors. The location is nine miles north of Keene Station.

Bear Gulch, Elk City, etc.—The placers of Bear gulch were discovered in October, 1865, by the Jack Reynolds party, and in March, 1866, the settlement was made. The Mexican, Guayness, located the first lode. In 1866–7 the male population of Bear Gulch was 1,000; Reynolds City, on Elk creek, 500, and the yield of gold for the two years, $1,000,000. In 1881 German gulch yielded $5,000 and Henderson gulch $18,000. In 1881 the placer mines yielded $153,200, and in 1882, $170,000. New lodes of great value have been discovered, to which reference is made in the general history. Eighteen years have elapsed since the discovery of Bear gulch, and during that time it has contributed millions to the wealth of the world. Of the thousands who collected here in the earlier days of the camp, every inhabited country on the face of the globe claim some of them as its citizens. During its earlier days Bear was the theatre of many strange and eventful scenes,—scenes that would read like a romance, if gathered into a volume; scenes of such wild revelry and savage sport as to fasten upon the denizens of the camp the well-known sobriquet of the "Beartown roughs." But notwithstanding the hard name the camp acquired in early days, no place on earth has been more open to the call of charity, or responded more liberally to the cry of distress; political organizations, religious and charitable institutions throughout the world can testify to the fact. J. Abascal & Co., general merchants, and Paul Pelletier, liquor dealer, at Beartown, represent business. Patrick Birmingham keeps the hotel at Bear's Mouth, formerly a stage station.

Ophir gulch was discovered by Nagle, Pemberton and others, January 12, 1865, and the stampede took place March 9, 1865. Since operations were begun at Ophir gulch (Blackfoot) the Mason & Kimberly claim yielded $311,000; the Mason & Stone, $42,960; the Davis & Mason, $61,450; and all other claims an amount equal to the last two.

Carpenter's Bar was discovered June 3, 1865; Dry gulch, May 30, 1868; German gulch, September 14, 1864; and McClellan gulch, February 13, 1865. The nugget found in this last named mining camp April 28, 1879, was valued at $945.80.

Princeton.—This mining property is located at Medhurst, and is owned by French capitalists. It is developed by a shaft 200 feet in depth. The ledge is very extensive, the product assaying about $40 in silver. During the year 1885 a twenty-stamp mill will be erected, expensive and powerful machinery has already been placed in position, and no time will be lost in sinking the shaft to the 500 foot station. The company employs fifty men.

Cable.—This is one of the richest gold mines on the continent. Though never operated on a scale commensurate with its magnitude, it has produced over $1,000,000, and conservative men estimate that on and above the 300 foot level the value of the ore in sight is not less than$ 1,500,000. No mine has produced richer specimens of gold ore. The value of the exhibit sent to the world's exposition is $10,000, one sample alone being worth $3,700. The mine is developed mainly by a tunnel, which taps the lode at a depth of 300 feet, where the pay ore body has the remarkable width of forty feet. Drifts have been extended 100 feet east and west, and crosscuts run, which show that the ore is continuous and uniform in grade. Its average assay value is $18, with occasional large pockets of almost pure gold, and wide streaks assaying from $100 to $1,000 per ton. A twenty-stamp mill, complete in every detail, is in constant operation. The cost of reduction is less than two dollars per ton. The property is owned in DesMoines, Iowa. J. C. Savery, one of the principal owners, is superintendent.

Cable City, named from the Atlantic Cable mine, may be said to have originated in the discovery of the lodes by Cameron. The mine itself was discovered by Stowe, Aitken and Pierson in 1866, and yielded some of the richest ores found in the Territory. Owing to disputed title and other causes, this district remained comparatively unknown for years. Three years ago a few dilapidated log cabins, the remains of two quartz mills, hoisting works, etc., were all that was to be seen, and one solitary individual the sole inhabitant—Mr. S. Cameron, the original owner of the celebrated "Atlantic Cable" mine. In the fall of 1882 a twenty-stamp mill was put in operation. Two stores, two boarding houses, a saloon, etc., were soon established, and the new city entered on its forward movement. According to a statement made by William Nolan, the product for 1881 was estimated at $150,000.

Georgetown, named after George Cameron, located near Cable City, has made steady advances, as shown in the history of mines. Flint Creek falls, ten miles south of Phillipsburg, form a true development of natural beauty. A succession of cascades lead the waters from the summit down a thousand feet to the valley,—the course of the river hidden beneath, and between the shrubbery.

The Pyrenees is one of the oldest mines in the county. It is owned by Salton Cameron, who has worked it continuously for ten years. The product is treated in a five-stamp gold mill. The workings show a vein of pay ore similar in general characteristics to that of the Cable, of which mine it is believed to be an extension. The ore body varies in width from five to twelve feet, and samples in the mill about $15 per ton. M. G. Kidder is taking out $12 gold rock from the North Atlantic, upon which a tunnel has been run 125 feet on a lead averaging three feet of ore. But the master mine of the camp is the Eureka, owned by Judge D. E. Thomas and Dr. J. H. Merrill, from which has been taken plenty of ore, which has assayed into the thousands.

Dry Cottonwood Gulch mines, eight miles up that gulch and sixteen miles from Deer Lodge, were discovered in September, 1869, by Job Harvey and Frank Decker. Job Harvey was elected recorder by the sixty claimants.

McClellan Gulch, thirty-six miles north of Deer Lodge City, on Poor Man's Creek, was originally Pacific City, in 1866. Here Charles Pryse is postmaster and also engaged in mining. The quartz mill is owned by Wiggin, Howey & Co. "In June, 1885," says Herman Blume, "the rain storm leveled our diggings, and fifty boxes of our flume are buried from two to sixteen feet deep. It will take us two or three years to open our mine again. I put our damages at $5,000. Out of twenty odd bridges on Poor Man Gulch, there are but four left, and the bridge across the Big Blackfoot is gone."

The Loon Creek mines, which caused the stampede in August, 1869, contained about thirty fair workable claims. No gold is found in the gravel, but a quantity has been taken from bed-rock. Flumes were erected early in September from native lumber, sawn by a whip-saw. Flour sold at $18; butter, $1; bacon, 50c; and canned fruit, $1.25.

The discovery of the bonanza pocket of gold bearing quartz on the ill-fated Penobscot claim, nearly seven years ago, was the real dawn of the era for lode mining over the range from the head of Silver Creek. The Bald Butte, Black Douglas, Sterling, Mount Pleasant, Blue Bird, Hickey, and even the new Empire and the old Whipporwill, belong to this series of ore.

The Snowshoe Diggings, near Blackfoot, were discovered by Bell and Newell in 1865. In 1867 Rufus Johnson paid them $9,000 for their interests, and in 1868 E. W. Pryor purchased a half interest from Johnson. In 1869 this company claimed 7,000 linear feet of bar and gulch, together with ditches and water rights. The placers are now worked by Anderson and others, and yield about $3,000 annually.

The Morgan and Embody coal mine, four miles east of Frenchwoman's Ranch, on the Mullan road, was discovered July 16, 1869. This mine was worked on the Deer Lodge side of the main range in 1869.

Drummond, a new town, was established as a postal village in February, 1884, when E. A. Hettinger, of the Drummond hotel, was appointed postmaster.

Avon, the distributing point for Blackfoot, Washington, Helmsville and Orando, was established as a postal village in June, 1884.

Garrison, a new town at the junction of the Northern Pacific and Utah Northern, was laid out in 1883. In June, 1884, John O'Neil, manager of the Garrison house, was appointed postmaster.

Stone Station, thirteen miles south of New Chicago, is a new settlement with a population of about thirty.

Willow Glen, twenty-two miles southwest of Deer Lodge, on Warm Spring creek, and four miles west of the Warm Springs, was settled in 1882. The population of seventy maintain two church societies and a public school. John R. Eardley is postmaster, general merchant, stock grower and notary public. William Weir is justice of peace and farmer; John Helstrom and William Talbot, blacksmiths; Em. Strom, carpenter; and R. Rasmussen, bricklayer. The school is presided over by E. E. Kinney. Thirty-two pupils are enrolled.

Helmville, seventeen miles northeast of New Chicago, is a new settlement with a population of about forty.

Keene, a station on the Northern Pacific railroad, twenty miles northeast of Deer Lodge City, has a population of twenty-five.

Levengoods, nine miles from Warm Springs station, claims a population of about thirty-five.

Lincoln, twenty-eight miles northwest of Keene station, has a population of fifty, who maintain a school and church.

Ovando, thirty-three miles north of Bear's Mouth, was settled in 1882 by Ovando Hoyt and others. The population is about eighty. Mr. Hoyt is postmaster.

Race Track, on the U. and N. Railroad, nine miles south of Deer Lodge, was settled in 1867. The two hotels at this point are conducted by P. Hoyt and David Walker, the former being postmaster and the latter, blacksmith. The school house of the race track district was built in March, 1878, and opened the same month with Mrs. N. Hendrickson, teacher. The Church of the Saints of the Most high is situated about eight miles from Deer Lodge City, on the Butte road. The building was constructed in 1878, by the society, which now numbers about forty members of the church of Joseph Morris. The denomination was founded in Utah, in 1862, by Mr. Morris, himself a convert to the Mormon church.

Warm Springs, eighteen miles south of Deer Lodge, one mile from Deer Lodge river, on the line of the Utah and Northern Railroad, 200 miles north of Warm Springs creek. On February 11, 1865, a meeting was held to consider the question of renaming Warm Springs creek, and a proposition to call it Lost creek, by Wm. P. Thomas, was carried. In 1877, Dr. Mitchell entered into a contract with the governor for the care, maintenance and medication of the insane and idiotic. Immediately he procured the site and buildings, erected a few years before, and made important additions thereto, so that now the hotel and buildings are valued at over $16,000. Here E. Gerard keeps a store. The first white child born at Warm Springs creek, was Thomas Glover, March 14, 1870. The first marriage at the creek was Miss Mary James to Alexander Glover in 1868. The first death is said to be that of D. Thomas. The first religious services, other than those of the Catholic church, were held by the Saints of the Most High at D. James' house, with W. M. James presiding.

Stuart Reminiscences.—The following sketch of James Stuart, by his brother Granville, forms a very appropriate close to this historical sketch of Deer Lodge county; for the reason, that, while dealing with the very first American settlers of Montana, it brings forward many incidents of early history.

James Stuart was born in Harrison county, Va., March 14, 1832. His parents removed to Bureau county, Ill., in 1836. In 1838 the family moved to Muscatine county, Iowa, which was then almost exclusively in possession of the Iowas, Sacs, Foxes and Musquakees. He received his early education at home and in the backwoods school, and in 1847-8, studied under James Harlan, at the Iowa City high school. Robert Stuart, senior, left for California in the spring of 1849, and returned in the winter of 1851, by way of Nicaragua and New York. But he soon determined to return to California, and in the summer of 1853 he made the second trip overland, accompanied by his sons, James and Granville, arriving at Neal's ranch, in the Sacramento valley, September 28, 1853. Their father went home in June, 1856, leaving James and Granville in the mines, they being determined to try their luck a few years longer. They mined, herded stock, etc., at different places; with varying degrees of success. They narrowly escaped being killed on Klamath river, on the breaking out of the second Rogue River and Modoc war, in 1855. They served in the California volunteers for some time in this outbreak, and on one occasion, as James, with one companion, was returning to Shasta valley for supplies, they met two Indians who had stolen several horses out of the valley, and were taking them to the lava-beds afterward rendered historic by the murder of General Canby. The result was that the horses were returned to their owners, and those Indians stole no more. James also went, in 1855, with a party to prospect on the head of the Sacramento river. They passed around Shasta Butte mountain to McCloud and Pit rivers, finding the Indians hostile. They succeeded in passing through without any loss, but found no paying mines. In the spring of 1857, James and his brother determined to pay a visit to the States. They left Yreka, California, on the 14th of June, in company with Reece Anderson and eight others. The trip, so far as Malad creek, on the Hudspeth Cut-off (about thirty miles north of what is now Malad City, on the stage-road to Corinne), was devoid of incident, except a severe storm of rain and snow, on the 4th of July, at Stony Point, on the Humboldt river, in which the party suffered greatly, being compelled to camp on the open plain, on account of the known hostility of the Tosa Weeh or Digger Snake Indians of that vicinity, who had murdered many emigrants there in former years. The party reached the head of Malad creek on the 18th of July, and here Granville was taken sick with the mountain fever. After waiting about ten days, the rest of the party went on, leaving James and Granville, and Reece Anderson, at the camp of Jacob Meeks, a mountaineer trader, who had located for the summer at that point. Before Granville had recovered so as to ride, the Mormons had all the roads leading to the States or California patrolled by Mormon troops, and arrested and carried into Salt Lake City all persons found going either way. And most of those so taken were never heard of again, for the feeling against all Gentiles was very bitter, because of the near approach of the United States army, under General A. S. Johnston. As they could not proceed to the States, James and his brother and Reece Anderson resolved to go with some mountaineers, who traded each summer with the emigrants at various points along the overland road, and who usually moved north to winter in the Beaverhead, Pah-Sammeri, and Deer Lodge Valleys, in what was then Dacotah and Washington Territories—all east of the Rocky mountains, and north of the South Pass, being in Dacotah; and all west of the range, north of the South Pass, being in Washington. They spent the winter of 1857-58 in Beaverhead valley, and on the Big Hole river, a short distance below where Brown's bridge now stands. In the same spot were encamped Jacob Meeks, Robert Dempsey and family, Jackson Antoine Leclaire and family, Oliver and Michael Leclaire. And scattered around in a radius of twenty-five miles, the following persons also spent the winter: Richard Grant, Sr., and family, John F. Grant and family, James C. Grant, Thomas Pambrun and family, L. R. Maillet, John M. Jacobs and family, Robert Hereford, John Morgan, John W. Powell, John Saunders, ——— Ross, Antoine Pourrier, and several hired men in the employ of Hereford and the Grants, whose names cannot be recalled; also Antoine Courtoi and family, and a Delaware Indian named Jim Simonds, who had a considerable quantity of goods for the Indian trade, as did also Hereford and the Grants; and most of the others had small lots of goods and trinkets, to buy horses, furs, and dressed skins from the Indians.

All but Captain Grant lived in elkskin lodges, which were warm and comfortable during the entire winter. About Christmas, 1857, they were joined by ten men, under command of B. F. Ficklin, who had been teamsters in the employ of Johnston's army, and were enlisted as volunteers, and sent out from the winter-quarters at Fort Bridger to purchase beef cattle from the mountaineers. They were guided by Ned Williamson, and found very little snow on the route. They could not purchase cattle on terms to suit them, and fearing to return in midwinter, remained on the Big Hole until the general exodus in the spring, when they returned to Fort Bridger. On the 26th of March, 1858, James and his brother, R. Anderson, and —— Ross, tried to cross the divide at the head of Dry creek, above Pleasant valley (then known as "Lodge Pole Camp"). They had twenty horses, and forced their way over to near where the Summit stage-station now stands, but were compelled to return to their camp on Red Rock creek. A few of those who wintered in this region moved camp to Bitter Root and Deer Lodge valleys, and the rest were anxious to get over the divide to Snake river as soon as possible, on account of the danger of having their horses stolen by Blackfeet. It being found impossible to cross the Dry Creek pass, a council was held, and it was resolved to move over and try the next one south, known as the "Medicine Lodge Pass." While encamped in Sheep Horn canon, endeavoring to kill meat enough to do them over the divide, it became apparent that a resort must soon be had to horseflesh, and James Stuart and his companions resolved to return to Deer Lodge, where game was abundant, and kill and dry enough meat to do them to Fort Bridger. They were also actuated by a desire to investigate the reported finding of float gold by a Red River half-breed, named Benetsee, in the lower end of Deer Lodge, in 1852, and its subsequent discovery, in 1856, by a party on their way to Salt Lake, from the Bitter Root valley. They accordingly left the rest of the mountaineers on the 4th of April, 1858, and moved over to Deer Lodge, and found John M. Jacobs camped at the mouth of what is now Gold creek (then known as Benetsee's creek), with a band of cattle that he had taken from John F. Grant on the shares; and here they luxuriated on milk and wild game, afterward joining camp with Thomas Adams (now of Washington City, D. C.), who also had a band of cattle, and with whom they prospected on Benetsee creek, and found fair prospects near the surface. But as they had no tools, and were living on meat alone, and were much harassed by the Blackfeet, who stole four of their horses, and made nightly attempts to get the rest, they gave up prospecting, and moved up Flint creek to a point three miles above where the town of Phillipsburg now stands, where they built a corral, strong enough to bid defiance to the Blackfeet. They then moved down on the West fork of Flint creek, a few miles northwest of where the village of Emmetsburg now stands, where, being joined by Jacobs, they built a second strong corral. At this place a wild horse had been lassoed and broke loose from those holding him, and as he ran by where James Stuart was standing, the lariat took a turn round his feet, tripping him up and throwing him to the ground with great violence. He was picked up by his comrades and carried into the lodge, where he soon recovered. On the 14th of June, 1858, James and his three companions started for Fort Bridger, having about twenty-five head of horses and two very light packs, for they had no provisions except dried moose meat, with a little tallow, and their wardrobes (principally buckskin) were very light and portable. They reached Fort Bridger on the 28th, having eaten the last of the dried meat eight hours before. They remained here a couple of weeks and then went to Camp Floyd, some forty miles south of Salt Lake City, where Johnston's army was encamped, where they remained some two weeks, selling their horses to the soldiers and camp-followers. About the last of July James and his brother went to Green river and began buying and trading in poor oxen with the supply trains, and here they again witnessed such carousals and orgies among the assembled "mountain men" as were almost beyond belief, and must be seen to be realized. There was some very close calls, but again their luck carried them through and none were killed. They wintered (1858–59) on Henry's fork of Green river, and spent the following summer on Black's fork trading with the emigrants, many of whom had started for Pike's Peak (afterward Colorado) and becoming disgusted were going on to California. They again spent the winter (1859–60) on Henry's fork. In the spring of 1860, they moved to Salt River valley, on the Lander's Cut-off on the emigrant road, and spent the summer there trading with the passing emigration. As they were moving up Green river to the Lander road, an incident occurred showing the resolute character of James. While in camp one day they were joined by a village of some twenty-five lodges of Bannack Indians, who encamped with them. It soon became apparent that many of them were drunk, having obtained whisky from some of the traders lower down the river. As one of them, who was mounted, dashed by where the whites were standing, he made a contemptuous remark and struck at James with his whip. He, being unarmed at the time, darted into the lodge after his revolver, but did not get it in time to get a shot at the Indian; but he told the rest, who were standing around, that the next one that insulted him or any of his party should die right then and there, and the look of fierce determination that blazed in his eyes convinced them that he meant just what he said, and they gave his lodge a wide berth during the rest of the day, which was no doubt fortunate, for had a fight once started, James and his two companions, although well armed, would have had but a desperate chance of winning the battle, for the Indians outnumbered them more than twelve to one. In the fall they moved north to the mouth of the Pah Sammeri, or Stinkingwater, in Beaverhead valley, intending to winter there; but the Indians becoming insolent and semi hostile, and beginning to kill their cattle, they moved over to Deer Lodge, and located at the mouth of Gold creek, resolved to develop the gold mines in that vicinity. In the spring (1861) they found good prospects in several places. James went to Fort Benton, where a steamboat was expected, to buy supplies, leaving his brother alone in charge of the ranch, Anderson having gone down the river from Benton on a visit to the states. The steamboat burned near the mouth of Milk river, and consequently James failed to get any supplies, and, as misfortunes seldom come single, during his absence four Bannack Indians stole a band of horses from the Flatheads at Camas prairie (just below what is now Bear gulch), who pursued and overtook them at Moose creek, on the Big Hole river, and killed two of them and recaptured all of the horses. They spared the other two, telling them to go and tell their people to quit stealing from the Flatheads, who wished to be at peace with them. The Flatheads returned home rejoicing; but their success was the whites' calamity, for the two they spared followed them back to Gold creek, where, on the night of June 22, 1861, they stole all of the horses there, except three that Granville kept tied every night at the cabin door. They took twenty three head of half and three-quarter breed American mares and colts, none of which were ever recovered. There being neither tools nor lumber to be had, upon James' return they hired two men to whipsaw sluice lumber at ten cents per foot, and sent, by Worden & Co.'s pack train to Walla Walla for picks and shovels, that being the nearest place at which they could be procured, but they did not arrive in time to commence mining that season. They dug a ditch, however, and completed their arrangements for the following spring. Late in the fall a few others came in and began to prospect, among whom were Major W. Graham, A. S. Blake, and P. W. McAdow, who found good prospects in a dry gulch just below where the village of Pioneer now stands, and determined to remain and mine at that place in the spring.

In May, 1862, operations were commenced, but only paid from one to three dollars per day by the old pick and shovel process, except one claim in Pioneer gulch, just above the mouth of French gulch, which paid from six to twenty dollars per day to the hand. While working in the gulch, which only paid from $1.50 to $3 per day, the Stuart company kept their horses picketed on a grassy slope, now known as Bratton's bar, which, in 1866 was accidentally discovered to be rich in gold, and has paid enormously ever since; but in '62 nobody ever thought of looking on a grassy hillside for gold, although subsequent developments proved that there were many rich channels and deposits on the hills in that vicinity, while the creeks and gulches were usually too poor to pay for working. On the 24th of June, sixteen men arrived being the first of quite a large number who left Pike's Peak mines (now Colorado Territory) for the Salmon River mines, but most of whom finally brought up in Deer Lodge and vicinity. Among the first party was J. M. Bozeman, after whom the flourishing county-seat of Gallatin county was subsequently named, and who was murdered by the Indians on the Yellowstone in 1867. This party discovered a rich claim in a branch of Gold creek, which has since been known as "Pike's Peak Gulch."

A considerable number of men also came up the Missouri river on steamboats to Fort Benton, bound for the Salmon River mines, but many of them stopped at Gold creek and remained permanently. The first of these reached Gold creek on the 29th of June, and among them were S. T. Hauser and W. B. Dance, both of whom became intimate friends of James Stuart.

About this time one Hurlbut discovered the diggings on Big Prickly Pear creek, where the town of "Montana City" afterward sprang up; and a few days after, John White, with a party on the way to Pioneer, struck the mines at Bannack City, which proved very rich; and almost simultaneously, Slack and party found mines on the head of Big Hole river, and within a week John W. Powell and party found the "Old Bar" mines on North Boulder creek, which last caused considerable excitement, culminating in a regular "stampede" over the mountains, but it failed to realize their expectations, and nearly all returned in a few days. At this time quite a village, known as "American Fork," had grown up at Stuart's ranch, at the mouth of Gold creek, but it soon lost its importance, because of the superior richness of the mines at Bannack City. * * * * * * * (Vide History of Yellowstone expedition, 1863. All stated that but for James Stuart not one of them would have lived to tell the tale. His coolness, courage, and knowledge of Indian character, combined with his faculty of pursuing, as if by instinct, his course over snowy mountains and across arid plains, direct to the point he wished to reach, was universally admitted to have been all that saved them from falling victims to the night attacks of the murderous Crows. The mines at Alder Gulch having drawn away nearly all of the population of American Fork, James and his brother, and Anderson finally, though very regretfully, determined to abandon their possessions there and remove to "Varina" (afterward very unwisely changed to "Virginia City"), in Alder gulch, which was proving fabulously rich, and where the aim of half the people seemed to be to find other and faster ways of spending their money than by the usual processes of drinking and gambling, and where everybody reserved the sacred right to do pretty much as he pleased, subject only to a gentle remonstrance at the muzzle of his neighbor's pistol if he intruded; for at this time there was no county organization, no laws, and consequently no courts except miners' courts, which were usually short and quite to the point, but to the credit of those pioneers be it said, there were comparatively few criminal acts considering the way the whisky and the money flew.

In September, 1863, he formed a copartnership with Walter B. Dance, for the purpose of carrying on a general merchandising business, in which they were very successful, and remained associated until October, 1870. In the spring of 1864, James organized a second expedition to the Yellowstone, with the double purpose of prospecting the country for gold and avenging the murder of his comrades the previous year. The party consisted of seventy-three men. James was elected captain; W. Graham, first lieutenant; John Vanderbilt, second lieutenant; Chas. Murphy, orderly sergeant; John Upton and Jas. Dewey, sergeants of the guard; and Mark Post and James Bailey, corporals. They crossed the divide between the Gallatin and Yellowstone rivers on the 28th and 29th of March, finding the snow bad, for it was a very late, stormy spring, and it snowed upon them nearly all the way down the Yellowstone, and over to the Stinking River fork of the Big Horn. So severe was the weather that they found it well nigh impossible to prospect, because of the frozen ground; and the snow was so deep that they could not get back among the mountains at all. Their horses grew very poor, and many became exhausted and were left behind; and as the devil usually takes care of his own, it so happened that the Crows were all over on the Muscle Shell and Missouri rivers, and the party did not find one in the Yellowstone valley, where they had all been the year before. Had the expedition found them, it was their intention to have taken the village by strategy, if practicable, and if not, to have stormed it, and killed as many as possible—a fate they well deserved then, and now deserve still more, for, since that time, they have killed many small parties and individuals of whites, and stolen thousands of dollars of stock, all of which they lay on the Sioux and Blackfeet. James' business arrangements not admitting of his remaining out longer, he and fourteen others left the main body on Stinking river, and returned to Virginia about the 18th of May. The rest of the party returned during July and August, they having gone through to Sweetwater river, and then split up into several parties, who straggled back—some by the emigrant road, and some through the mountains. None of them succeeded in finding any diggings that would pay; but they still believe that rich mines exist in that country. Soon after James left them (which he did with their consent), two men went out hunting while the party were traveling, and a sudden snow storm coming on, and lasting three days, they were unable to find the main party again. One of them (they did not go hunting together), known as "Indian Dick," a young man about eighteen years old, who was so called from having been much among the Snakes, turned and tried to overtake those who were returning with James, but fell in with a small camp of Crows, on the Rose Bud river, who robbed him of all he had, and compelled him to stay with them; but after a couple of weeks, he persuaded them (many of the Crows understand the Snake language) to go with him to the Gallatin valley, telling them that they could make a good trade with the whites there; and when they returned, Dick took one of their best horses from them, to pay for what they had robbed from him. This, however, did not profit poor Dick much, for the horse soon fell sick and died. The other man's body was found that summer, lying in the willows on Stinking river, near where he left the party on that ill-fated morn. He had been shot, as was supposed, by Indians, and had run into the brush and died there. In the fall of 1864, James was elected to the legislature from Deer Lodge county, and served in the first session, held at Bannack City, in December and January, 1864-65. In May, 1865, when the North Blackfeet or Blood Indians murdered ten men at the mouth of Maria's river, and an Indian war seemed imminent along the northeastern border, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel by Governor Edgerton, with authority to call out and organize volunteers; but the Indians moving north across the British line, it was deemed inexpedient to attempt a campaign against them at that time. In 1867, he was chosen general manager and superintendent of the St. Louis and Montana Mining Company's silver mines and works at Phillipsburg, which position he held until 1870. He was also senior warden of Flint Creek Lodge of A. F. and A. M.; and later, junior warden of the Grand Lodge of Masons of Montana. In 1871, he was appointed post trader at Fort Browning, which was the Assiniboin and Upper Sioux agency. And at this place he had another narrow escape from death, the heavy dirt roof of one of the rooms falling in upon him, and crushing him to the floor, where he lay, almost suffocated with dirt and dust, until extricated by the employes of the fort. He was severely injured, and it seemed almost a miracle that he was not instantly killed. In the spring of 1873, the Assiniboine agency was removed some sixty miles higher up Milk river to Fort Belknap, and the Sioux agency was removed and concentrated at Fort Peck, on the Missouri river, and Fort Browning was dismantled and abandoned. James sold out his stock at this time, and accompanied the agent, Major A. J. Simmons, to Fort Peck, where his thorough knowledge of Indian character, his courage, coolness, and excellent administrative abilities were invaluable assistants in the control of the warlike Sioux. In June, he paid a visit to his brothers in Deer Lodge, who entreated him to remain, as they had a presentiment of evil, and were very averse to his returning into the Indian country. But he had promised to return and take charge of the agency, until Major Simmons, who had resigned, could turn it over to his successor—and with him to promise was to perform. He therefore took leave of his brothers and friends, expecting soon to return, but in this life they never saw him more. It is probable that his health was giving way at this time, for he had had, early in the spring, a severe attack of what at the time was supposed to be inflammation of the bowels, but which it afterward appeared was organic disease of the liver. And after his return from Deer Lodge, he wrote in his weather memorandum that, on the 8th of August, he had another attack of the same character. And on the 18th of September he was taken very ill, and soon told the attendants that he now knew his illness to be organic disease of the liver, as all the symptoms were very marked, and that he thought he would not recover. He lingered in great pain until death came to his relief. He died sitting in a chair, with his elbows on a table, and his head resting in his hands, September 30, 1873. (Granville Stuart's Contributions to Montana Historical Society papers, pp. 56–60, 1876.)

The action taken by the people of Deer Lodge during the period of Indian troubles, during the days of the Vigilantes, and in all affairs affecting the territory in general, is so fully noticed in the history of the territory, that even a reference to the events is unnecessary in this chapter. Enough has been written and compiled, from most authentic sources, to place before the reader a review of the history of this old settled county of Montana. In the territorial, county, village and biographical history, the whole story of the settlement and progress of Dear Lodge county is related.

CHAPTER XXII.

FERGUS COUNTY.

THIS new political division of the territory was formed in 1885 from the old territory known as Meagher county. It embraces, within its boundaries, half the area of the old county, including some rich mineral tracts, and a great area of the garden lands of western Montana. The name was conferred on the district in honor of James Fergus, a pioneer, and one of the original officers of the Alder gulch district in 1863, now one of the great stock-growers of the county which bears his name. The first thorough description of what is now Fergus county was written in 1882, by Judge A. R. Barrows, for the River Press of 1882–3. From it the following topographical sketch is taken:

By far the most fertile and attractive portion of Meagher county, a valley of greater area and natural resources than some of the kingdoms of the Old World, is the Judith Basin. Bounded by mountains for the most part, it is somewhat irregular in contour, but forms a basin measuring (as the bird flies) about fifty miles north and south, and forty miles east and west. The traveler from Fort Benton first strikes the basin proper after passing the waters of Arrow creek, and as "the solitary horseman" may be no student, let the reader join in exploring the valley. At a distance of fifty miles from Benton we enter the first tributary valley of the Judith, Wolf creek, running through broad bottoms of fine meadow and farming land, dotted with the cabins of more than a score of thrifty settlers. Passing Willow creek and other small streams, we reach Sage creek, twelve miles from Wolf, and the equal of the latter in all respects except in flow of water. Here A. H. Barney & Co. are tooting their (shepherd's) horns loudly, having covered the country with sheep, and the improvements necessary to the flock-master. Next, after a ride of seven miles we reach the Judith river, which, in its importance as the principal stream of the basin, is well sustained by the variety and extent of its agricultural resources and grazing capacity. As we are not gentlemen of leisure we cannot be expected to give in detail the names and occupation of the people on the Judith, but could easily find more than one hundred actual settlers. Six miles further south we cross Antelope creek, and another six miles brings us to Buffalo creek, both of which streams and their several tributaries are occupied by the gentle shepherds and their flocks.

Riding about sixteen miles from the last named stream we arrive at the headwaters of Ross' Fork, in the Judith Gap. Here we are at the extreme southern part of the Basin, and on the summit dividing the Musselshell and Judith valleys. So far, we have traveled with the Belt mountains to the west and southwest of us, and the several streams we have named head in numberless clear springs forming trout-brooks in those mountains. Ross' Fork heads in the Judith Gap, and runs almost due north to its confluence with the Judith river. It is down the valley of this stream the branch of the Northern Pacific railroad is surveyed that is to connect Benton with the railroad world within two years. Settlers are multiplying in number on Ross' Fork, and particularly in the Gap, most of them engaging in farming and raising horses and cattle. Our course from here will skirt the snowy mountains lying to the east and northeast to the Judith mountains, thence down Warm Spring Creek valley to its confluence with the Judith river and westward to Wolf creek, our starting point. From Ubet, where the several roads leading from the Basin through the Judith Gap intersect, we travel ten miles to a splendid mountain trout brook, also called Buffalo creek, which empties into Ross' Fork near the mouth of its namesake, before described. This stream is well settled. Four miles over the most excellent soil, and we arrive at Trout creek, where a broad valley and substantial improvements seem to explain the faith shown by the settlers. Passing on we cross Rock and Little Rock creeks, the latter well settled, and nine miles from Trout creek we cross Beaver creek, where "Fat Jack" and some twenty-five other settlers, most of them in good flesh, have taken up excellent farm locations.

Three miles over a splendid strip of bench land and we arrive at Cottonwood creek, thickly settled by persons engaged in wool-growing, dairying, horse and cattle raising, and we find, also, extensive preparations for farming. Thence across a bench of rich soil dotted with settlers' cabins six miles to Big Spring creek, the finest stream of its size in the world, the haven of Her Majesty's half-breeds, and the site of the first settlement made in the Basin. Here, "without distinction as to race or color," is the most thickly settled part of the valley, and the advantages of the locality warrant all the development shown. This stream, drawing its supply from both the Snowy and Judith mountains, never freezes, and rarely rises or falls twelve inches during the year. Twelve miles more brings us to Warm Spring creek, a splendid stream, heading in the Judith mountains and running thence westerly through the Moccasin mountains. On this stream, near the famous warm spring which furnishes its name, is the home ranch of H. P. Brooks, the pioneer cattleman of the Basin, and many settlers have followed him. From the point where Warm Spring creek enters the Judith river the course of the latter is through a rough, broken country to the Missouri river, and it forms no part of the "Basin."

The country is entirely free from alkali, and the water is all mountain spring water, noted for its purity, and in all of the streams (some not over two feet in width) can be found the beautiful brook trout that delights the heart of the angler.

Several of the largest and wealthiest stock companies in the territory have chosen this section as their ideal of perfection as a stock country, among whom are: Stewart, Anderson & Co., located three miles east of the post, who have 12,000 head; J. Fergus, eight miles northeast of town, has 3,000 head of sheep, 200 head of horses, and a choice selection of full-blooded stock; Mr. Brooks, on Warm Spring creek, eight miles from Maiden, has 3,000 head, and supplies Maiden and the post with beef; Bailey, Hauser & Co., on McDonald creek, seven miles to the south, have a herd of 300 fine blooded horses; the Montana Sheep Co., whose ranch is just east of the Snowy range, twenty-five miles from town, have a flock of over 15,000 head, mostly Merino; Forman, on McDonald creek, has a herd of 7,000 head; Laurence, on Flat Willow, has 1,500 head. These are but a few of the large number of stockmen. In January, 1885, was incorporated the Pioneer Stock Company, with $1,000,000 capital. This is a formation of a stock company of the H. D. S. Cattle Company, near Fort Maginnis, and they have elected for officers: President, Conrad Kohrs; vice-president, S. T. Hauser; secretary, A. J. Seligman; assistant secretary and superintendent, Granville Stuart. One of the directors is Percy H. Kennett. During the summer of 1884 a number of horse thieves infested this neighborhood. On July 24 seven of them were hanged near the mouth of the Muscleshell, while others were executed at their rendezvous in the Woody mountains. Recently, close of June, 1885, Rezin Anderson who moved to Ft. Maginnis in December, 1880, reported that a band of Piegans raided the neighborhood of James Fergus and Granville Stuart, cleaning out the horses from several sheep ranches and taking a number from William Fergus. Large gardens, producing fine vegetables and large yields, are to be seen on every side, and fields of waving oats, wheat, and other cereals, are no uncommon sight in the Judith country.

The Muscleshell Range is one of the great stock raising districts of the Northwest. The principal stock men in 1882–3 were:—The Montana Cattle Co., Northwestern Cattle Co., A. Lincoln, James Schmall, McGaric & Johnston, George W. Wilson, F. M. Dennis, John H. Freeser, Thomas Linton, Martin Miller, D. Blacker, W. Corkill, Andrew Cooper, R. C. Quaintance, R. W. Quaile, M. J. Settle, Hill & Hightower, Balch & Bacon, William Gordon, Collins & Klein. The range, as defined by these stock growers, is bounded as follows:—Beginning at the mouth of Box Alder creek, on the Muscleshell river; thence up the Box Alder to Flat Willow creek; thence up Flat Willow to the head of same; thence westerly along the divide to Judith Gap; thence westerly along the divide to Copperopolis, thence southerly along the divide to the divide between Fish creek and Sweet Grass creek; thence easterly along the divide between the waters of the Yellowstone and Muscleshell rivers, to a point opposite or south of the mouth of Box Alder creek; thence north to the mouth of Box Alder creek. A post office was established at Flat Willow in July, 1883, and Fred. E. Lawrence appointed postmaster.

A new cattle company was organized in May, 1885, called the Galloway Cattle Company. Two of the Fisk Bros., of the Helena Herald, are in the company. The officers are, D. S. Wade, president; M. Morris, treasurer; A. J. Fisk, secretary; T. Wilcox, general manager. The company has secured a fine ranch fifteen miles east of Judith Gap, south of the Snowy mountains. It is a fine summer and winter range, and several hundred tons of hay can be gathered from it each year. It is being stocked with Durham cows, Galloway bulls and other high bred stock. They now have thirty head of fine mares and a Clydesdale on this ranch. The first cattle herding of importance in Montana commenced in the Judith basin. In 1879 the number in the Territory was about 200,000.

Mines and Miners.—The mountain ranges of Fergus, occupying perhaps half the county, abound in minerals—gold, silver, copper, lead, iron and coal. The most extensive gold and silver mines in the county are situated in the Judith mountains, at Maiden, and beyond the boundary at Neihart and Barker. At the former place are good paying gold placer mines and extensive quartz veins, while at Neihart there are as rich silver-lead mines, so far as developed, as are found in the Territory. The history of the beginning of mining progress in this division of Montana is given in the following review of the discovery and opening of this mineral region:—The first discovery of minerals was made by Joe Anderson and David Jones, in May; 1880. In June their party was joined by C. C. Snow and F. T. McPartlan. Other discoveries followed in rapid succession. Gold in paying quantities was first found in Alpine gulch, and several claims were located June 10, 1880. Warm Springs gulch was next struck, the prospect being found near the present site of Maiden. A few days after, the gulch of Maiden was located by Frank McPartlan. J. R. Kemper made the next location, finding ground that paid $115 to each sluice box of twelve feet. The ground in Alpine and Maiden gulches has been worked every year since discovered, to advantage, by Anderson, Jones, Landusky, Kemper, Sage, Kiser, Snow, McPartlan, Pott Brothers, Hayden, Erwin, Bessey and others. The War Eagle was the first quartz lode discovered, and was located by Jones and Anderson, and is one of the most promising mines in the district. It is, properly speaking, a Galena lode, but carries eighty ounces in silver and a few dollars in gold, is fourteen feet wide, has a deep shaft, well timbered, is situated in a change of formation between lime and porphyry as a contact vein, and shows a large body of carbonates. This is the property of Jones, Anderson, McAdow and Dexter. The next lode located was the Black Bull, by the same parties, is a gold bearing lode, situated near the War Eagle, has a shaft in the center of the claim to a considerable depth, and another one at the south. The Tom Thumb was the next one located, and is situated in Alpine gulch, is a small vein, but very rich in gold, and is owned by the above named parties. Then followed the location of Baby Mine, Golconda, Sun Dance, Gem, Yankee Blade, Little Rhoda, Snow Shoe, Excelsior, Jessie Trim, Collar, Kentucky, Favorite Montana, Maggie, C. Weeden, North Star, Florence, Pilgrim, Hailstorm, Lone Star, Last Chance and Sucker State.

The Montana was first located by J. R. Kemper and after re-located by Barney Hill and John Burke, is a gold-bearing mine. Their first assay was seven hundred and sixty-nine dollars per ton, at a depth of fifteen feet. They sold to Hauser & Holter, of Helena, for fifteen thousand dollars, which company still retain the property under the name of the Maginnis Mining Company. They have a fine mill just below the mine, in active operation every day, and giving good satisfaction. The mine and mill are well and ably managed by A. M. Esler. Montana No. 2 is an extension of the Montana and joins the Keystone on the west. The owners, William T. Nelson and Charles Young, have sunk a shaft, and have a vein three feet in width and widening rapidly. Ore is free-milling gold and silver. The Collar mine, about one and a half miles from Maiden, developed by the Collar Mining and Improvement Company, was discovered in August, 1880, and located in September of the same year by C. C. Snow, E. A. Erwin, Chas. Bessey, C. Young, J. R. Kemper and F. T. McPartlan. It is a silver-bearing mine, 21 feet 6 inches in width, between pophyry and lime, with good clay casing between the ore and "country rock." C. W. Mead, of Omaha, is president; S. S. Eaton, of St. Paul, treasurer; W. M. Curtis, resident agent and manager, and C. C. Snow, superintendent. The developments consist of a tunnel 350 feet down at right angle to the vein, and a shaft 190 feet deep connecting with the tunnel. At 70 and 120 feet, and on the level of the tunnel, lateral drifts were run on the course of the vein, and connected, so as to furnish the requisite blocks of ore to insure a continuous run of the mill. A large ore house was constructed at the mouth of the tunnel, to which is connected four ore bins of a capacity of 250 tons. A double track tramway, 1,500 feet long, takes the ore to the mill. A 20-stamp mill, with all the latest improvements, made by Fraser & Chalmers, of Chicago, was put in running order. This mill has 850 pound stamps, 12 pans and 6 settles. In 1881 the owners disposed of a part interest to the Omaha Smelting Co. on condition that the company shall pay $30,000 in cash, and expend $80,000 in the erection of machinery, stock the mine at a certain valuation, and deliver a stipulated amount of stock to Messrs. Snow, Irvine & Co., the discoverers and owners. In February, 1884, the mine was owned by Gen. Mead, formerly of Omaha, S. S. Eaton and others, of St. Paul; but was attached by A. H. Wilder of that city. In May, 1885, the mine and mill were sold by the sheriff to Eugene Smith, one of the company, for $7,550.

Jones, Anderson, McAdow and Dexter have a galena lode, known as the "Alpine," which bids fair to be second to no lead in the camp, and a gold-bearing lode close to the Montana called the "Spotted Horse," in which they have struck ore surprisingly rich. The Alice is an extension of the "Spotted Horse," a fine prospect, having a shaft and owned by J. Kemper, R. M. Dryden, Chas. Weidman and Chas. Wellman. The same parties also have another mine approximate called the Nevada, which is a good "showing."

The Bamboo Chief is located on the northwest side of what is known as Cayuse Mountain; is rich in silver and is the property of C. Young, J. Wertz and Henry Born. The Mother Green, Consolidated Kentucky, Great Eastern and Golden Terry, are all adjacent, rich in silver, carrying some gold, and are owned by Landusky, Hamilton, Dryden, Cole, Murphy, J. Conoly and others. The Monte Cristo, also close, is a silver-producing mine joining the Mother Green on the northeast, and was the property of John Peck, Arthur Brett, Frank Trombley and others. Ira Gillman, McPartlan, Snow, E. A. Erwin and Charles Bessey have several good prospects on both sides of Alpine Gulch, among which is the Bullion, carrying gold and silver and joining the War Eagle on the northwest and the Silver Cloud, an extension of the Bullion. Above and across the gulch Ira Gillman, E. A. Erwin and Charles Bessey are singly and jointly interested in the Yellowstone, Crow Girl and Tennie, and all show a fine body of ore.

Brainerd & Gardner have invested in several good mines, among which is the Keystone, Comet and Kentucky Favorite, and they also have struck and located several fine prospects. The Dunton brothers and C. R. Williams own many good prospects both in this and the adjoining district of Cone Butte. They are connected with the Judith Gold and Silver Mining Company. The mines operated by this company are the North Star, Great Eastern, St. Paul, Silver Tip and Niagara. The North Star is an extension of the Kentucky Favorite. The St. Paul is galena and carbon; is a large, good vein, containing no refractory metals, situated in Cone Butte District, as is also the Silver Tip, which is an extension of the St. Paul lode. Robert Graham, David Jinks, Frank Rodgers and others are identified with the interests of the Judith Gold and Silver Company, and Graham and Rodgers are interested in the Judith and Spencer lodes. The Judith and Spencer are situated on the northeast side of Crystal mountain, and are both promising prospects. John Peck, Arthur Brette and C. C. Snow have the Dolly Varden, Cameron Lode, and other lodes lying south of the Black Bull, carrying gold and galena. Charles Young and C. H. Wolcott have a mine joining the Montana on the south, known as the Treasure Box, and is considered very rich. T. M. Trudell, P. H. Gesner, Charles Rhodes, Ole Anderson, Jack Tullock, Frank Sage, F. C. Dwinelle, W. C. Draper and others have several mines about three miles north of Maiden, named respectively Northern Pacific, Mountain Lion, Big Collar, Wolverine, and many others that are good leads.

The Day Star is a new prospect struck by Fred Chase and Henry Ebner; it lies south of the Dolly Varden, is the same character of ore, and shows a large and well defined vein. Just north of the Day Star is the African Lion; it is galena ore and very rich. It was worked by Biglin, foreman at the Collar mine, and Benjamin Perkins. The Ashland Lode was located by Stoner, Murray and Dryden, and shows a good body of galena ore. A new lead called the May Reynolds was located by Vincent Gies and F. C. Dwinelle on Prairie Butte. It shows a large copper and galena lead.

Stillman & Higley ran a tunnel into Crystal Mountain and struck a fine body of ore northeast from the Collar and the same character of rock. They have a water-wheel in course of construction for the purpose of driving air into the mine.

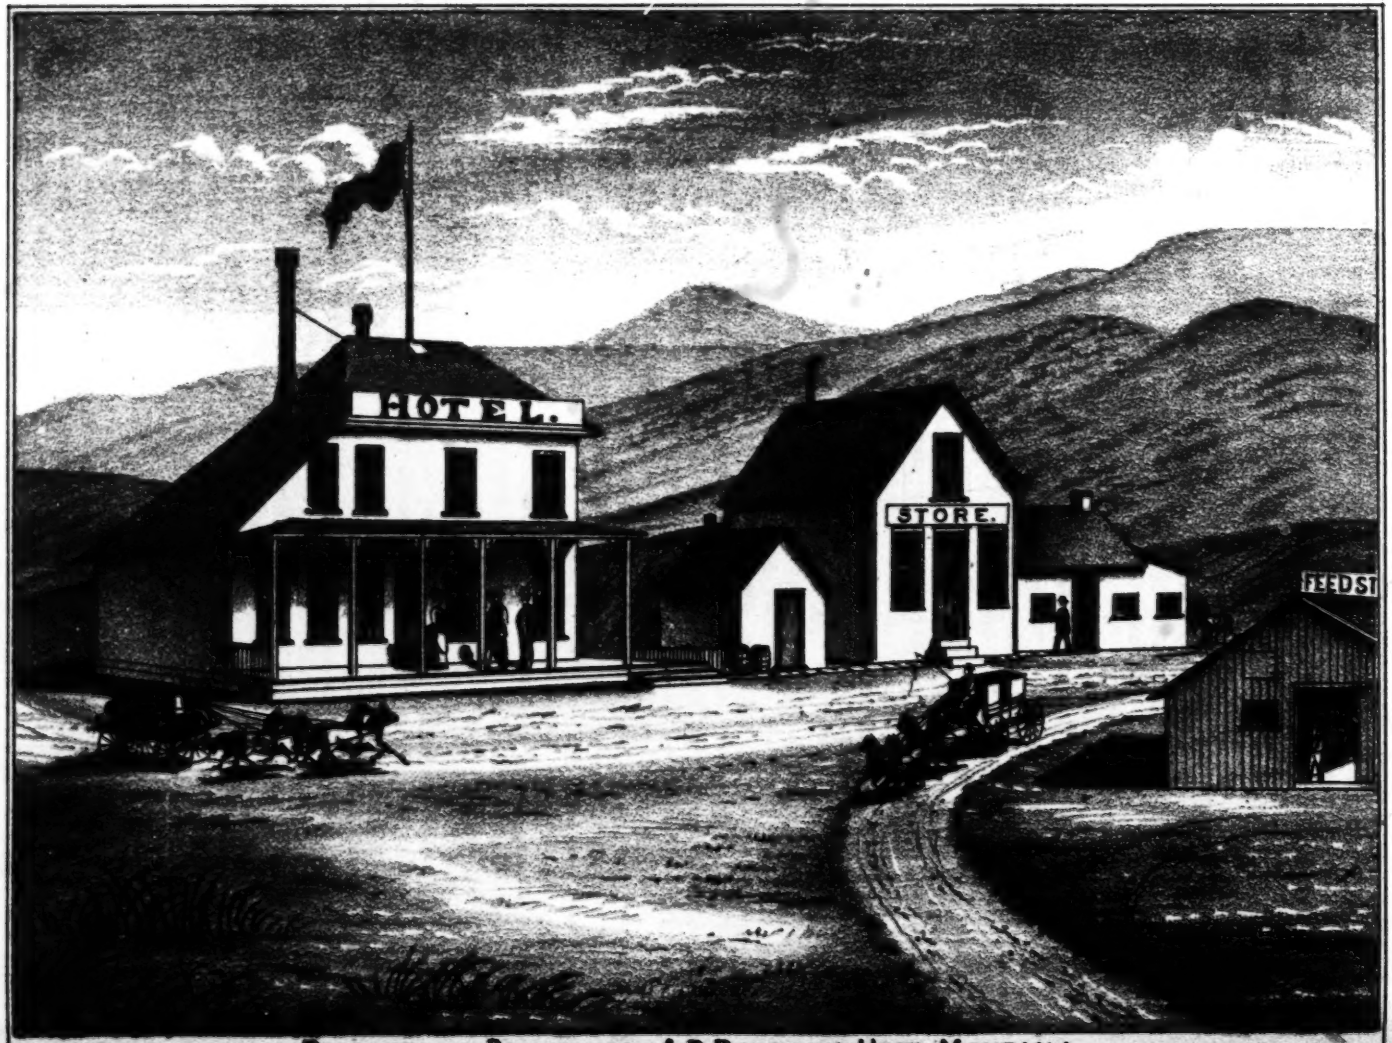
J. E. Davis and Frank McPartlan are engaged in a smelter and arasta business. In August, 1883, there were one hundred and fifty claims recorded, many of which are most valuable mines. The Legal Tender and Mother Green lodes were struck in August, 1883, and promise rich results.

During the summer of 1884 the Maiden Reduction Company was organized, and in 1885 erected a smelter and other works at a cost of about $8,000. The company owns no mines of its own, bnt there are several properties near at hand which can be made productive enough to supply the smelter with all the ore it can handle.

Organic.—The act establishing Fergus county was approved March 12, 1885. The provisions of this act are set forth in the following sections: Section 1. "That all that portion of Meagher county lying and situated within the following boundaries, to-wit: Beginning at the northeast corner of said Meagher county, thence west on the north line of said county to Arrow creek, thence up said Arrow creek to the intersection of what is known as Surprise creek; thence up said Surprise creek to the center of the divide between the waters of Belt and Judith creeks, thence in a south and southeasterly direction on the center of the divide between the waters of the Belt, Smith, Muscleshell and Judith rivers, to the most easterly point of the Belt mountains, at the Judith gap, thence due east to the nearest branch of Careless creek, thence down the middle of Careless creek to the Muscleshell river, thence down the middle of the Muscleshell to the place of beginning, be and the same is hereby erected into a new county, to be known as and called Fergus county. That the town of Lewiston, within the boundaries mentioned, shall be the county seat of said county. All laws of a general nature, applicable to the several counties of this Territory, and the officers thereof, are hereby made applicable to the county of Fergus and the officers who may hereafter be elected or appointed. * * * Sec. 2. Provided for the apportionment of indebtedness as it may exist December 1, 1886, between the new county and Meagher, moneys in the Meagher county treasury, cost of erecting and furnishing court-house and jail, value of real estate forming the property of the county, to be deducted from indebtedness. The remainder of indebtedness is to be apportioned on the assessment of 1886, and any surplus in the Meagher county treasury to be divided on the same basis. * * * Sec. 4, provided that: "At the general election on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, A. D. 1886, the following officers shall be elected for the county of Fergus by the qualified voters of said Fergus county, to-wit: One sheriff, one probate judge, one county clerk and recorder, one county assessor, one county treasurer, one county surveyor, one county coroner, one county superintendent of schools, one public administrator, and three county commissioners. The persons severally elected to such offices, except county commissioners, shall hold office until the next general election in 1888, and until their successors are elected and qualified. The two persons receiving the highest number of votes for county commissioners shall hold the office until the third Monday in December, 1890; the person receiving the next highest vote for county commissioner shall hold the office until the general election in 1888." * * * Sections 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9 set forth the duties of officers to be elected; section 10 dealt with the limitation of indebtedness, and section 11 for the organization of the county, viz: "This act shall take effect from and after the first day of December, A. D. 1886, but that portion of Fergus county lying in Meagher county shall remain united to said county [of Meagher] for judicial purposes until the first day of December, 1886, and the officers of Meagher county shall act as officers of said parts of Fergus county until the date above named, except as otherwise provided in this act. The county boundaries of Meagher and Choteau are hereby altered to conform to the boundaries of Fergus."

MAIDEN.

Maiden, the great mining camp of eastern Montana, is situated in latitude forty-seven degrees and forty-five minutes, longitude thirty-one degrees west of Washington, and elevated 4,000 feet above the level of the sea. It is in the heart of the Warm Springs Mining District, covering a radius of ten miles square, and but six miles west from Cone



PROPERTY AND RESIDENCE OF A.R. BARROWS, UBET, MONTANA.

Butte district. Located, as it is, in a beautiful, fertile valley, and surrounded by the Judith mountains—proven to contain all the precious and base metals known to the world—it is bound, at no distant day, to become the best camp in Eastern Montana. The following military order was posted in Maiden August 8, 1883, and fell on the camp like a fusillade by the Eighteenth Infantry:

FT. MAGINNIS, M. T., August 8, 1883.

Order No. 134. In obedience to general order No. 26, from headquarters of the army, dated Washington, D. C., April 13, 1883, and subsequent instruction from headquarters department of Dakota, all persons now residing on the Military Reservation of Fort Maginnis, M. T., or working in any mines or prospecting for mines, or carrying on any other kind of business, or who may hereafter come on said reservation, without proper authority, I hereby warn that they must leave the reservation, and remove therefrom all property that they may have brought with them, or acquired since coming on the reservation. Sixty days from this date will be granted for the completion of the removal, herein ordered, at the end of which time those remaining without proper authority will be forcibly ejected. By order of Capt. Cass Durham, F. W. Kingsbury, second cavalry post adjutant.

A meeting called by J. Beck, recorder of Warm Spring District, on August 9, for August 11, was duly held in Dryden & Esler's building, with John Beck as chairman and C. S. Fell, secretary. A committee was appointed to draft a petition and present it to the commanding officer, which petition was presented August 13, by Alfred M. Esler, C. W. Gardner, Willard Dunton, C. S. Fell and T. B. Stillman. Capt. Durham, after reading the petition, produced a map which had been drawn for the purpose, and said he would approve of a petition to cut down the reservation to the extent thereon outlined. The proposition made was all that could be desired, and received the unanimous approval of the committee, whereupon Capt. Durham caused to be drawn up and indorsed the following:

FORT MAGINNIS, M. T., August 13, 1883.

The proposed reduction of this reservation, as outlined on this map, and described as follows, to-wit: Commencing from a point on the northern boundary, one and one-half miles from the northwest corner of the present reservation, running due south one and one-half miles, from there one mile due east, then due south one mile, then due west one-half mile, then due south one-half mile, then in a southwesterly direction seven-eighths of a mile, then due south one-half mile, then due west one and one-quarter mile to the original western boundary. Cass Durham, captain Eighteenth infantry, commanding post.

On returning from Fort Maginnis, the committee reported to a meeting of the people, when C. W. Gardner was chosen to represent the interests of the citizens; C. C. Snow, W. Pott, and J. Erwin appointed a committee to procure evidence of prior claim, statistics, etc., etc.; and Messrs. Snow, Williams, Shakely, Dunton and Beck, a committee of finance. While the justice of the claimants cannot be denied, military order No. 134 must also be considered justifiable, the proposed reduction of the military reservation being the only practicable method of settling the matter. The rights of the citizens were ultimately considered, and the village went its way of progress.

The mercantile circle of Maiden is made up as follows: L. Belanger, formerly Belanger & Boisenault, C. Boisenault, C. L. Eaton, general merchants; Dr. Rawn, of the Maiden Drug Co.; Brainard, Gardner & Co., Groes & Beck, hardware; Vincent Gies, bakery; A. J. McGuire, blacksmith shop; Denis O'Brien, hotel; Cradick, International Hotel; Dinsmore, clothing; Dryden, restaurant; Landusky & Hamilton, Dunton Bros., Peters & Janson, C. H. Wolcott, Louis Landt, Hunter & Co., Chas. G. Smith, J. C. Johnson, Bailey & O'Brien, C. Holmes, Hamilton & Wetherell, W. W. Shaky, W. M. Wyman, saloons; James E. Milliken, carpenter; Ed. Roberts, meat market; Carl Drosh, shoemaker; Sharp & Jenkins and S. G. Sharpless, barbers; Graham & Doane, livery stable; S. G. Sharpless, news depot. Jack Kehl is deputy sheriff at this point. The professions are represented by Dr. J. M. Rawn and Lawyer J. E. Wasson. The mining interests, already referred to, created the village, and many mine owners make Maiden their place of residence. Toward the close of 1882 Graham & Doane dissolved partnership. The latter may be said to have ushered in the era of tragedy July 13, 1883, when he shot two men, one of whom died instantly.

Maiden presents a strong claim for the county seat, and urges as reasons why it should be located there that four-fifths of the criminal business and three-fourths of the civil will originate there. A petition was largely signed in April, 1885, by the citizens requesting the county commissioners not to build a jail at Lewiston until the county is organized.

Andersonville is one of the new mining towns in the Judith Mountain region, founded in 1881 by J. R. Anderson, one of the original discoverers. Even now the village gives promise of being one of the most remarkable quartz mining centers in the Territory. The hotel is conducted by R. R. Millt; the general store by P. W. McAdow; post-office, steam saw-mill, and blacksmith shop by Benj. Depte; saloons by Jeremiah Thornton and John Campbell, and express office by A. M. Thomson. This settlement is 75 miles northeast of White Sulphur Springs, and claims a population of about 200.

Utica, on Big Spring Creek, was settled in 1881. Frank E. Wright is postmaster and general merchant; J. D. Weatherwax, general merchant; A. C. Burnham and Ezra Gavur, carpenters; P. McDonnell, blacksmith; D. F. Walrath, hotelkeeper; L. J. Howell and Etteen Bros., dairy, and the Clendinen Lumber Co., saw-millers. John Ferguson was justice of the peace in 1884.

Brassey, 100 miles northeast of White Sulphur Springs, on Beaver Creek, was settled in 1882. Here Quimby and Barnard erected a saw-mill, for which the creek supplies power, and the vicinity lumber. Edward Brassey is postmaster and justice of the peace.

Dodgetown, sometimes called Medicine Lodge, is 88 miles east of White Sulphur Springs, on the Muscleshell. This place was settled in 1882, now claims a population of 80, and has a post-office, presided over by H. S. Dodge.

Grape Range, on Chippewa creek, 100 miles north of Billings, claims a small population. A post-office was established here in 1884.

Bercail, 90 miles northeast of White Sulphur Springs, on Careless creek, was settled in 1881. Alice Maule has charge of the post-office at this point. The agricultural and stock interests in the neighborhood are represented by Ed. Morrison, N. O'Brien, John Ross, Frank Gerr, and J. B. Matheson, farmers; H. Cameron, G. G. Carville, Donald Fowler, H. Hedges, W. A. Hedges, John Holiday, Lee Jacobs, Rufus Thompson, and Daniel Tresslar, sheep-growers.

Overland, 123 miles northeast of White Sulphur Springs, claims a general store and saloon; the former operated by J. Atchison.

Philbrook, 122 miles northwest of Billings, is one of the first settlements of this district.

Yogo Gulch, now called Sutherlin, was named in honor of the editor of the Rocky Mountain Husbandman. It is a new mining settlement.

Kibby, a settlement of 1883, and a postal station, is located on Otter creek, 60 miles northeast of White Sulphur Springs. Here W. R. Sellew conducts a general store, hotel and livery. He is also postmaster. A steam saw-mill was erected here in 1884.

Lavina is a new settlement on the Muscleshell, 120 miles east of White Sulphur Springs.

The Heally Settlement on the Muscleshell, 200 miles east of White Sulphur Springs, was settled in 1883. This village is only 45 miles north of junction on the N. P. R. R.

Oka is one of the old settlements of this portion of the Territory, dating back to 1879. A. J. Stephens conducts a general store and hotel, is also postmaster. J. Lawrence & Son are engaged in wool-growing and freighting. This settlement is 70 miles northeast of White Sulphur Springs. Near this point are the ranches of Collins, Severance & Co.—immense fields of grass dotted with cattle.

Ubet, seventy-seven miles northeast of White Sulphur springs, and ninety-eight northwest of Billings on the N. P. R. R., is the center of business for a large stock-growing and farming district. The hotel at this point is conducted by A. R. Barrows.

Reedsfort, on Big Spring creek, was settled in 1880, and now claims a population of about 300. Frank Day is postmaster, W. H. Watson, operator of the steam saw mill, and J. Holzemar, express agent. Big Timber or Dornix, 115 miles south, is the nearest railroad station.

Roundup district, southeast of Lake Mason and stretching along the Muscleshell, was settled in 1882. The district post-office is in charge of A. McMillan.

Stanford, 120 miles northeast of White Sulphur springs, between the headwaters of Wolf creek, was settled a few years ago, and now claims a population of about one hundred. John J. Viall is postmaster and general merchant. Here are the sheep and stock ranches of Elanty, Croft and Metcalf, J. P. Thomas, Tuttle Brothers, O. Thomson, Jesse Philps, and others.

The uninterrupted prosperity and success which have attended the various branches of enterprise and industry in this division of the territory, from its first settlement to the present day, the change from an almost unbroken wilderness to a rich and populous county in a brief space of time, naturally leads the mind to contemplate, with deep interest and inquiry, the nature of that condition to which the progressive energies of its people will raise it in the future. We have only to examine the resources of wealth which the county naturally presents, the strength, skill and aptitude of the people to lay hold of natural advantages and convert them to the most profitable uses, in order to appreciate the energies which have been put forth by the early settlers, the results of which are so attractive to the traveler. It should be borne in mind that the county was not solely settled by capitalists bringing large amounts of money to expend in subduing and cultivating new lands, but almost exclusively by men who were unable or unwilling to purchase farms in the old states—whose physical and mental energies constituted their funded wealth. This was the capital invested in the settlement and improvement of the Judith and Muscleshell region—a currency not subject to fluctuations. The pioneers are men of independent minds and efforts, whose activities are controlled by the dictates of their own judgments. To their labors we must credit nearly all its present wealth, and look to them for its future importance.

CHAPTER XXIII.

GALLATIN COUNTY.

THE county derives its name from the Gallatin fork of the Missouri, to which the name was given by the explorers Lewis and Clarke in 1805. The area of the county exceeds 26,000 square miles, a large portion of which belongs to the two great valleys of the Gallatin and Yellowstone. This country was first explored by the Verendrye party, referred to in the general history, early in the eighteenth century, again by Lewis & Clarke at the beginning of the nineteenth century, and by Father De Smet and his confreres between 1840 and 1858. The expeditions of 1863, 1874, and 1876–7, together with the work of the geological surveyors, contributed much to complete the round of discovery. In 1862 the first settlements were established in the county, and from the fall of that year the history of the county's progress dates. Early in the spring of 1840 Father De Smet, on his way to the Flathead nation, with the guide Ignace (who was sent for him by the Indians), and several of the tribe, whom he met near the Three Tetons, entered the Gallatin valley and made a short stay near the present site of Gallatin City. From this point he returned to St. Louis, revisiting Montana in 1841 with Rev. Fathers Point and Mengarine, and six lay brothers of the Society of Jesus. At this time the valley was an Indian common, open to all the tribes who wished to pass through en route to the plains.

The first agricultural settlements were made simultaneously on East Gallatin and West Gallatin, near the three forks, in 1863. It is an agricultural and stock-raising county, and has been very appropriately named "the garden spot of Montana." It contains a vast amount of arable land, not one-sixth of which is at present occupied or under cultivation. In fertility the soil is unsurpassed, easy of cultivation, and produces, in quality and quantity, crops of wheat, oats, barley, rye, and almost every variety of vegetables. Water is abundant, and sufficient to irrigate every acre in the county that does not lie above the streams. Much of the land on the foot-hills does not require irrigation. The Madison river runs through a portion of the western part of the county, while the West Gallatin, Middle Fork and the East Gallatin, and many small streams, flow across the more central portions west of the range, which separates it from the Yellowstone valley. The portion of the county lying on the Yellowstone river is watered by the Yellowstone itself, and by Shield's river, Big Timber, Little Timber, Sweetgrass, White Beaver and Kiser creeks, coming in from the north, and by Emigrant, Skull, Mill, Big and Little Boulder creeks, and the Stillwater from the south. Speckled trout abound in all these streams. The main elevations of the county are: Bozeman, 4,890; Fort Ellis, 4,935; Gallatin, 4,500; Bozeman Pass, 5,813; Bozeman Tunnel, 5,565; Livingston, 4,450; Gardiner, 5,300; Yellowstone Lake, 7,738; Emigrant Peak, 10,629; Flathead Pass, 6,769; Bridger Pass, 6,147; Bridger Peak, 9,002. The valleys are partially sheltered by the surrounding mountains; not sufficiently, however, to render the dry, regular cold of winter more endurable than the same season in New York, Michigan, or any of the Atlantic or Northern States.

Gold Mines.—The mines operated in Gallatin county in 1881 produced metal valued at about $50,000. The opening of the Clark's fork and other districts gives promise that the rich mineral deposits of this county will soon be developed. The value of product in 1882 was $30,000, increased in 1883 and 1884, when the era of development was introduced. Emigrant gulch was discovered in 1864, and yielded $180,000 in metal before the close of 1867 in placer gold. The placers are still carried on in deep ground, while the quartz interests are being fast developed. The copper deposits are extensive and very rich. The Cambrian Milling & Mining Co., of St. Paul, entered on the work of development in 1885, while Aylesworth & Van Tassel, and Ashmeade & Davis have performed considerable work on their mines. The placer ground was purchased about two years and one-half ago, by Hopper & Edwards, for $31,000, and ditches built. Bear gulch, now possessing the largest hydraulic plant in the United States, was discovered by the Austin party in 1863, who gave to it the name on account of finding a furless cub on the bank of the creek. Work was begun there in the winter of 1865–6, and continued by Joe Brown & Co., who took out $1,800 worth of metal at the mouth of the creek in May, 1866. Brown and other prospectors continued placer mining on this creek, and in 1875–6–7 constructed a system of ditches. Quartz was discovered in 1874, but left undeveloped until 1877, when Brown, Heffner and Graham put up an arastra at the Legal Tender. The Graham lode was discovered is 1878. A quartz mill was erected in 1885. Boulder, thirty-five miles northeast of Bear gulch, was discovered by the John Allen party, in September, 1866. In October the snow fell so heavily that work was stopped, not to be renewed until 1871. The gold and silver quartz lodes were discovered in August, 1879. Sixteen-Mile creek flows out of the mountains six miles above Emigrant gulch, and was given this name by the great body of prospectors who, in 1864–8, crossed the upper Yellowstone to the gold gulches south of the Yellowstone river. Until recently it has not been prospected much, but during the last fall a number of prospectors entered it in search of quartz. To use a rough phrase, they seem to have "got there." From a lead situated two miles from the point where the gulch enters the mountains, known as the Homestake, an assay has been made from ore taken out at a point twelve feet in on the tunnel, which shows thirty-seven per cent of lead, six per cent of copper, seventeen ounces of silver and a trace of gold. The vein on this lead is very well defined and gives assurance of a profitable mine when its extent is shown up. Very few other leads have been located, although there can be no question of their existence farther up the creek. All the placers on Six-Mile have been located and recorded. The creek carries as large a body of water as Emigrant gulch. It has been known seven or eight years that veins of copper and silver combined exist in Sixteen-Mile creek, but only of late has much interest been paid to them. In July, 1883, rich specimens of argentiferous galena were taken out. Mill creek comes out of the mountains less than six miles this side of Emigrant gulch. The body of water which it carries is tremendous. It seems to stand on end, running swifter than a mill race, and in a great seeming hurry to join the Yellowstone. At the head of Mill creek is the "Mammoth Lead," now under steady development. This lead, although not as rich as several other leads farther down Mill creek, attracts the visitor, because it has ore on the dump of good quality, and the tunnel which has been run plainly indicates rich lodes. Recent discoveries at the mouth of Mill creek have been made and located by Jack Baronett, James Connell and others of such surface extent and richness as to give every assurance of making the fortunate locaters rich men. One assay on this discovery shows 1,384 ounces of silver to the ton, and a mineral expert of eighteen years' service in the Rocky mountains pronounces it equal in every respect, in extent, in surface showings, to the celebrated Homestake of the Black Hills. This bonanza lies 20 miles from Livingston. Up to the beginning of 1885 very little was accomplished toward the development of this district. Pine creek, distant 72 miles from Bozeman, a tributary of Bear creek, was discovered by the Austin party, but nothing was done there until 1879, when the Delmonia was developed by Kannis, Fisher, Gundolph and Hartman. The Crevice gulch placers date back to 1863. Two miles below the gulch is Crevice mountain, where gold quartz was discovered in 1879. The Pilot lode was worked in 1879 by Stoner & Co., when an arastra was erected. The free milling golden ore at this point is rich. The Bromfield silver lead, seven miles from Bozeman, was discovered by Bromfield in June 1883. The discoverer at once complied with the law in such cases made and provided, and is now the possessor of a rich claim. Several parties set out to prospect in the vicinity of the find. Woodward gulch was named after John Woodward, a pioneer of Alder gulch, who prospected for quartz in 1864. The Vivion mines, seven miles from Bozeman, were discovered in the fall of 1882. Elbow creek, a tributary of the upper Yellowstone, heads in the mineral belt, and begins to claim the attention of prospectors.

The mines known as Clarke's Fork or Rourke are situated in a section that but a few years since was a real terra incognita; never penetrated by white men and even unknown and unexplored by the Sheep-Eater Indians, who claimed it. These Indians were moved to a permanent reservation by what is known as the Shoshone treaty, and immediately following the Emigrant gulch mines were discovered in 1864; the Crevice mountain mines in 1865, and the Boulder mines in 1866. In 1868, however, this entire country was included in the then formed Crow Indian reservation, and consequently withdrawn from the public domain; thus stopping all further prospecting and relegating everything back into the obscurity of barbarism. Shortly after this a small hunting party accidentally discovered very rich silver ore in three or more places near the head of Clarke's fork of the Yellowstone, and this too, cropping out in such large bodies as to leave no doubt of its permanent value, could title be obtained. But upon the whole of this enormous country hung the mill stone of the Crow reservation. White men had no rights there, and it was the exclusive property of the Indians. From 1868 to 1882 it was lost to the country, lost to the prospector, and lost even to the Indians themselves, since they never visited this portion of their reservation, even for hunting purposes. It may be added that the Crow Indians, like the Sheep-Eaters before them, have never frequented what is now known as the National park. The subterraneous ramblings and vast bodies of water cast high in the air by the geysers, arousing all their superstitious awe and leading them to believe it was given over to the exclusive abode of evil spirits, who would kill all who entered. In this general evil country they include the Clarke Fork mines, which are just north of the boundary of the park. Caring little as they did for this part of their reservation, it was a simple matter to get their assent to the relinquishment of it, and a treaty with them covering this feature was ratified and became a law in April, 1882, thus restoring it to that embodiment of energy, patience and muscle—the prospector—from whom it had so summarily been snatched fourteen long years before. The Great Republic mine, on the Republic mountain, is a vast body of reddish brown galena, due to the iron in it, and having such a straight dip as to be almost horizontal. It is enclosed in limestone, and can obviously only be worked by drifting in from the side of the mountain where it crops out. The top of the mountain is covered by a volcanic formation. The Black Warrior at the base of Crown Butte is penetrated by a vertical shaft, which drops at once into what seems to be an immense body of ore, much of it of high grade, made up of fine galena and iron pyrites in intimate contact. A shaft fifty-two feet in depth has been sunk, but thus far there is absolutely nothing to base an opinion on as to whence it came or where it may go. The ill-defined magnitude of it is the only thing the mind can grasp. The War Eagle cuts directly across Henderson mountain, and is a big vein standing within fifteen degrees of the vertical, with the walls as smooth and well defined as the side of a house. The ore is in large part base. Iron, antimony and zinc are found, while scattered through the ore are found large blotches of clean bright galena. On another part of this claim and apart from this vein, very valuable gold quartz is found, but not yet opened. These three mines show very well the great variety in position, of the mineral of this camp. It is a country of narrow valleys and jagged, precipitous mountains; of swift flowing streams and dense forests of pine and fir. Excellent mill sites can be picked out by the score, and charcoal can be burned almost where it can be shoveled into the smelter. In 1876 Capt. Rourke, the discoverer of Heart Basin, was located on the Clarke's Fork, and here, when he, with others, prospected in 1867, he found a thousand evidences of mineral wealth.

Coal Deposits.—The coal deposits within the boundaries of the county are inexhaustible. The Rocky Canon mines, the property of Col. Chestnut, were worked by Col. James Muir during the fall and winter of 1882–3, he paying the owner a royalty of one dollar per ton. The veins worked were twenty-five feet in thickness. Col. Chestnut, Major P. Pease and C. W. Hoffman filed claims to ground, extending over three miles, covering the veins, in 1882. Daniel Maxey is owner of the coal mines southeast of the Chestnut claim, while the Northern Pacific Railroad Company operate other mines in the neighborhood and farther east. The coal mines near Livingstone were explored by Prof. Pumpelly's party in 1883. Within four miles of Livingstone, and thence southwest, southeast and northwest, continuous seams of coal have been discovered. In 1883 a railroad was built to the mines six miles southeast. In December, 1882, a car-load of coal was shipped to Bismarck from the Bozeman mines for blacksmiths' use, which stood the test well. Large and rich deposits are found within a mile of the main Cinnabar mountain, on the Upper Yellowstone, distant from Livingstone about forty miles. This coal field was discovered in the fall of 1864, by N. Seward, of Livingston, at which time he took out a sack of black coal from croppings. The veins are eight feet or more in width, and it is thought by those who have explored it that the field extends for many miles. In June, 1883, a transfer was made of an undivided one-third interest in the Chestnut coal mine, to D. F. Sherman, C. H. Cobb and Frank Esler, for a consideration of $15,000, the gentlemen buying the interest of J. D. Chestnut in the property. A company known as the Bozeman Coal Company, and composed of C. W. Hoffman, F. D. Pease, Frank Esler, C. H. Cobb and D. F. Sherman has been formed, with Chas. W. Hoffman as president and D. F. Sherman secretary and treasurer. This company has entered into a contract with the Northern Pacific Coal Company to furnish the company with 25,000 tons of coal and the entire product of the mine for five years. The sale of the Maxey coal mine, eleven miles east of Bozeman, was consummated in June, 1883, J. P. Chater purchasing the property, without title, for $20,000. In November, 1882, one of the Bozeman editors visited the mines, and on his return published the following reminiscences:

"'From time immemorial,' almost, we had heard of the Colonel's Rocky Canyon coal veins; for as early as 1867 he was burrowing into the sides of the mountains, occasionally bringing to town specimens of black material which Col. Vaughn, of Beaver Creek fame, facetiously pronounced 'the finest fire-proof stone he ever saw, and just the properist material with which to construct fire-places and chimneys.' Even Father Crowell, the boss brick-artistic 'chimblies;" and Cy. Mounts, who was but little more sceptical on the subject than the rest of the old-timers, offered to make a bet that he would eat every pound of coal discovered in the range of mountains dividing the Yellowstone from the Gallatin; while J. V. Bogert was among the first to test its burning qualities, with rather discouraging results."

The Banner coal mine was discovered in the summer of 1882 by M. B. Thompson, one of the early settlers of Helena, and Alex. Johnson. The mine is twelve miles east of Bozeman and within one and one-half miles of the Northern Pacific railroad. In June, 1883, the ten and seven feet veins were penetrated 100 feet, and a very superior quality of coal obtained. John Vesuvius, in his reminiscences, says:

"Chestnut! What a struggle that's been! And now his tunnels have reached the very bowels of the earth—and his coal is burned in a hundred stoves, and the engine which runs the press which prints this article is fired with the coal which has given him his name of Coal-bank Johnny! When you venture up the Canyon some day next June and stop at his headquarters, ask him to show you the hole in the mountains to which he took me years ago—and then, as you follow him through the tunnels and over the croppings and measure the seams of glistening coal and notice how gray his head has grown, tell him you never meant it when you said his coal was slate and that he was crazy as a loon when he said you talked like a fool. For coal it was; and coal is boring a hole through the everlasting hills for the railroad Maguire predicted and you and I have longed to see. And as the 'Old Man of the Mountains' asks you down to dinner, just drink a glass for me, and tell him he builded better than he knew, for his discovery opened the way for the finding of 'coal measures' without end—while, when by and by the steam car comes, as it belches down into the valley, you'll have poorer ears than mine if you don't understand it to chug out, 'Chestnut! Chestnut! Chestnut!' with each puff of steam on its rattling way to Bozeman station."

At Timberline the Northern Pacific Company operate two mines, while Quivey & Hoffman, of Bozeman, own and operate two. Two and one-half miles below are the Chestnut mines; one and one-half miles southeast is the Maxey mine; one mile east of the Maxey is Hodson & Co's. The Mountain House mine, owned by W. F. Sloan, M. M. Black, E. D. Ferguson, and Mr. McIntyre, of Bozeman, is situated a short distance from Hodson & Co's. The Pine Creek mines, owned by Wilbur & Co., are on Pine creek, a tributary of Trail creek. There are five veins at this point, from four to twelve feet in width. Those owned by Davis & Co., J. W. Ponsford & Co., and others, are large in extent and contain coal of superior coking qualities. C. P. Blakely, Bromfield, Speith, Krug & Co., and others, own fine mines nearer Bozeman, which are well developed and their superior character fully assured.

Agricultural Interests.—The accepted statistics prepared by Matt W. Alderson, in 1883, convey at once a fair idea of the present condition of agriculture in the county, and the prospective increase of that industry. H. N. Maguire estimates the grazing and arable extent of the Gallatin basin (including the lower Madison and Jefferson) at 600 square miles, sufficient for 2,400 quarter-section locations, or three times as many as have been made, and he also says: "It may be assumed that not to exceed ten per cent of the land appropriated has been put into a producing condition." The county assessor for 1882 reported 118,535 acres of "improved lands" in the county. As less than two per cent of the crop of Gallatin county in 1882 was raised outside of the Gallatin basin, the importance it figures in the permanent wealth of the county cannot be overestimated. Gallatin county has twice the acreage of improved lands of any other county in Montana, with one exception, that of Meagher county, which has 88,891 acres. It has nearly one-fourth of all the improved lands in the Territory, the actual figures being 118,535 acres in Gallatin county, 397,566 acres in twelve other counties—an average of 33,130¼ acres each. More than nine-tenths of all the cultivated lands in Montana are in the mountain region, and strangers who estimate the agricultural resources of the Territory by observation and examination of the farming done east of longitude 33, do all the counties west of Yellowstone a great injustice. The cereal product of Gallatin county for the season of 1882 was 703,361 bushels—554,052 of oats, 141,749 bushels of wheat, and 7,560 bushels of barley. The market value of these products on the farm was $574,282, divided as follows: Oats, $387,836; wheat, $178,886; barley, $7,560. The oats were nearly all sold in the county, at a profit of fifteen to twenty-five cents per hundred, and the wheat manufactured into flour by our own mills, with a handsome profit to the mill owners and others. The following table shows what has been done under favorable conditions, by Gallatin valley farmers:

There is little doubt but without irrigation the farms of Montana produce greater crops than even the noted wheat fields of the Red river of Dakota or the Willamette valley in Oregon. Instances can be cited which certainly demonstrate this, as in the vicinity of Bozeman some farms are seldom, if ever, irrigated. On one of these, one mile south of the city, a forty-acre field yielded in 1867 forty-two bushels of wheat to the acre. On another, that of Samuel Bostwick, one and a half miles from the city, the entire cultivated field of fifty-five acres yielded in wheat, barley, etc., an average of forty bushels to the acre. This was in 1882, and without irrigation. A still better showing was made on the farm of Nelson Story in 1879. This farm, just outside of the city limits, having been neither plowed, sowed nor irrigated that season, presented its proprietor with a volunteer crop of 1,000 bushels of superior winter wheat, without expense except that of harvesting and threshing. Its annual productiveness per acre far exceeds that of any other county in any of the States or Territories of the Union. S. B. Cope in 1879, harvested and threshed from a piece of ground on his West Gallatin farm, measuring six and one-fourth acres, 401 bushels of wheat, which weighed on the test scales of Valley Mills sixty-four and one-half pounds to the measured bushel. This was nearly sixty-nine bushels, by weight, to the acre, and was the ninth crop on the same ground in eleven seasons. Besides being the largest grain growing county in Montana, the assessment returns of 1881 showed Gallatin county to be rich in live stock—31,416 head of cattle, 19,051 head of sheep, and 7,837 head of horses were returned by the assessor for taxation. The population of the county in 1880 was 3,643. The immigration of 1881 increased it to 5,000. Probably 4,000 more people have settled in its rich valleys the past two years. The principal manufacturing industries are fourteen saw mills and five flouring mills. Since 1879 the hills and valleys of Eastern Montana have afforded new fields for enterprise. The Indians who held them as hunting grounds for centuries have almost disappeared, and in their place have come the pioneers of a new civilization. During the years 1882, 1883–4, many available locations for farms have passed into the hands of the cultivators.

Organic and Political.—The organic act passed by the first Legislature provided, "That all that portion of Montana Territory embraced within the following boundaries be and the same is hereby created a county, to be known as Gallatin county, to-wit: commencing at the intersection of the 119th meridian of longitude with the 47th parallel of latitude, thence south along said meridian of longitude to the 45th parallel of latitude, thence west on said parallel of latitude to the eastern boundary line of Madison county; thence northerly along said boundary line to the northeast corner of Madison county; thence west along the northern boundary of Madison county to the eastern boundary of Jefferson county; thence northerly along eastern boundary of Jefferson county to the Missouri river, thence down Missouri river to the 47th parallel of latitude; thence east along parallel to the place of beginning. The county seat of Gallatin was located at the town of East Gallatin. On the establishment of Meagher county in 1874, the Legislature passed an act which was approved February 13, 1874, changing the northern boundary of Gallatin. This act decreed the following boundary: "Commencing at a point in the middle of the Missouri river, opposite the mouth of Sixteen Mile creek; thence easterly up the main channel of said Sixteen Mile creek four miles; thence north to the south boundary of Meagher county; and thence due east along such line to the 109th parallel of longitude." The bill introduced in 1880 to extend the line of the county so as to embrace the Crow reservation, ceded by the United States, passed both Houses February 12, 1881.

The act authorizing the people of Gallatin county to vote at the general election of 1867 for changing the seat of justice was approved December 14, 1866. The vote resulted 280 for Chrisman's Ranch and 475 for Bozeman. The count was certified by Vivion, Gray and Dunbar, the county officers. The act approved January 7, 1869, provided that the name of Farmington, the county seat, should henceforth be known as Bozeman. Under the recent act for fixing the true boundaries of the county, parcels of land formerly in Madison were detached, so to speak, by Surveyor Mead, and conferred on Gallatin. Among the new citizens brought in by this change is one aged 105 years—Patrick Clarke, born in Ireland in 1780—an active old settler with a wonderful memory.

First Meeting of the County Board.—At a meeting of the officers of Gallatin county, at the residence of A. F. Nicholas, near Gallatin City, March 11, 1865, Gallatin county was organized as follows: Phillip Thorp, A. F. Nicholas, and D. H. Ketchum having been appointed County Commissioners for Gallatin by the Governor of the Territory they were sworn into office by Thomas Dunbar, Probate Judge, the county court being duly organized and in session. The official bond of W. M. Wright as Clerk of the Board was examined and approved. Ordered that O. D. Loutsenhizer be appointed Sheriff of county. He accepted, and bond was approved and sworn in. There was no law to govern their acts and no farther business, hence on motion of Mr. Nicholas the court was adjourned until meeting of regular term, May 13.

At a meeting held May 13, 1865, J. B. Campbell presented certificate of his appointment as Treasurer of Gallatin county by the Governor; was sworn in and gave bonds. On motion of A. F. Nicholas a public road or certain highway was agreed upon, and James Gallaher, F. J. Dunbar and Wm. Broadhead appointed receivers. Ordered also that the court meet at county seat on May 20 and continue five consecutive days. June term. June 20, 1865, they met at residence of J. S. Wilson. On June 21, 1865, it was ordered that Wm. M. Wright hold his office at his residence until a suitable building was prepared for that purpose. There were no laws provided for the Board, and D. H. Ketchum was empowered to go to Virginia City and secure all laws; also Assessor and Treasurer's blanks necessary for use of board. On June 28 it was agreed on motion of D. H. Ketchum, seconded by Nicholas, that they should rent from J. B. Campbell his building for one year, for the use of County Clerk, for which they paid $200. On motion of D. H. Ketchum, seconded by Nicholas, $10,000 was appropriated for county buildings at Gallatin City. George D. Thomas was appointed Assessor, and June 29, 1865, a permit was given O. D. Loutsenhizer, Sheriff, to keep his office at his residence until the county should provide one. A charter was given same man to keep a ferry at the, or near, mouth of Beaver creek, on the Missouri river, same date, the county was divided into precincts.

Precincts.—Gallatin City precinct or No. 1 was laid off by the Board of Commissioners June 29, 1865. The boundaries of the precinct were the line of the Gallatin river from its mouth to the forks of the east and west Gallatin, including Nixon; the line of the Madison from its mouth to the county line, and down the Missouri to the mouth of Sixteen-Mile creek. The judges of election appointed June 29, 1865, were James B. Campbell, Stephen Allen, A. Green, and the meeting ordered to be held in the J. B. Campbell building, then used as the Court House. Jefferson Precinct, or No. 2, was set off by order of the board June 29, 1865. The territory from the junction of the Madison and Jefferson rivers, along the latter river to the county line, was organized under the name of Jefferson, with Myers, Sturgis and Reeves judges of election. West Gallatin precinct, or No 3, comprised the settlements on the main Gallatin below the Bozeman road, exclusive of Nixon, together with the settlements on the West Gallatin below the said boundaries. I. Culver, P. Thorp and George Kritzer were appointed judges of election to be held at Hamilton City in July, 1865. East Gallatin precinct, or No. 4, comprised the settlements on the East Gallatin and forks below the claim of Stephen Roberts to the confluence of the East and West Gallatin. John Thomas, Lee Wells and W. S. Mentage were appointed judges, and the precinct meeting ordered to be held at the Thomas house. Bozeman precinct, or No. 5, was set off June 29, 1865. The boundaries were Stephen Roberts' claim on the East Gallatin, with all above this claim on the river and its forks, the settlements on Middle creek, the West Gallatin above the Bozeman road to the divide between the Yellowstone and Gallatin rivers. The judges of election were J. S. Mendenhall, S. A. Meredith and J. S. Simpson. Yellowstone precinct, or No. 6, was organized in July, 1865, with O. C. Keith, E. P. Smith and J. T. Hull, judges of election. The Yellowstone precinct was laid off by order of the board June 29, 1865. It embraced all the residents on Emigrant gulch and its adjoining districts southeast of the Yellowstone and Gallatin divide. Diamond City precinct, or No. 7, as laid out June 29, 1863, embraced the settlements along Confederate gulch and adjoining territory from the Missouri river up to the head of the gulch. William Burr, C. W. Cork and A. McGregor were appointed judges of election. White's Gulch precinct, or No. 8, was organized in July, 1865, with F. Allen, A. Hawkins and Jacob Venable, judges of election. White's Gulch precinct embraced the settlements along the gulch from the Missouri river to the head of the gulch.

J. B. Campbell transferred to the county for county purposes his house between the Gallatin and Madison rivers for one year for the sum of $200.

August 12, 1865, the following accounts were allowed:—P. Thorp, for services as county commissioner, $130, and A. F. Nicholas, services as county commissioner, $79 respectively; W. M. Wright, for cash paid for county and for services as clerk, $256; Geo. D. Thomas, assessor, $455; D. H. Ketchim, services, $3. It was agreed by the board to levy taxes for 1865 as follows:—Four mills on dollar for territorial purposes, and one cent on the dollar for county tax; one mill on dollar for poor, and one mill on dollar for school tax. The report of Geo. D. Thomas, county assessor, showed one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, or thereabouts, of taxable property, and was audited September 3, 1865. The following accounts were allowed:—H. J. Myers, as judge of election, in 1864, and carrying abstract of same to capital, $64.50; Wm. M. Wright, for auditing account book, etc., $190; D. H. Ketchim, for commission and cash paid out, $154; O. D. Loutsenhizer, cash paid for map of county, $20; J. B. Campbell, book, $7.50. The board adopted a seal or scroll, to be used until a suitable one be provided. J. Gallagher was authorized to hold probate court on September 15 to 20, in each month until further orders. On November 11, 1865, the resignation of Thomas W. Coover, elected September 4, 1865, was received and approved, and Wm. M. Wright appointed to act as clerk of the county for next term.

Elections of 1884.—Delegate Toole's majority was 102. The legislature and county is represented by the following officers: District attorney, H. N. Blake (Rep.); councilman, F. K. Armstrong (Dem.); representatives, J. M. Robinson (Dem.), W. H. Martin (Dem.), Geo. Nichols (Rep.); county commissioner, Dr. William Tracy (Rep.); probate judge, Charles S. Hartman (Rep.); treasurer, Ed. F. Ferris (Rep.); clerk and recorder, James Gourley (Rep.); sheriff, Andrew J. Edsall (Rep.); assessor, T. P. McDonald (Dem.); surveyor, J. M. Robertson (Dem.); superintendent of schools, Miss Ada Hamilton (Independent); coroner, R. D. Alton (Rep.); public administrator, Davis Willson (Rep.). The constitution was carried by 303 majority. The vote cast was nearly the same as cast in November, 1882, showing that the county has made up by actual settlers what it lost by the railroad.

Court House—the Court House Loan, 1878.—The question of empowering the county commissioners to borrow $25,000 for the purposes of building a court house was submitted to the people of Gallatin county, November 5, 1878, when the following vote was recorded:

	FOR.	CONTRA.		FOR.	CONTRA.
Bozeman Precinct	377	34	Willow Creek	2	29
Elk Grove Precinct	47	34	Still Water	4	14
East Gallatin Precinct	40	52	Sweet Grass	14	2
West Gallatin Precinct	11	24	Yellowstone, No. 1	53	13
Gallatin City	5	27	Yellowstone, No. 2	16	4
				569	233

This count was certified November 15, 1878, by A. D. McPherson, judge of probate; J. D. McCaman, county treasurer, and M. Mendenhall, chairman of county commissioners.

The commissioners selected the court house site in December, 1879, on the north side of West Main street, in Tracy's addition, which embraces lots one to eight inclusive, and thirty feet off the south ends of lots immediately in the rear of said lots, making, with the alley, a piece of ground 224 by 202 feet. The location is an excellent one, and the structure, which cost over $25,000, one of the finest buildings in the territory. The ground was donated to the county. On February 9, 1880, the commissioners opened the bids for new court house and jail as follows: R. C. Knox, $28,600; Buck, Jenks & McPherson, $27,000; B. & F. W. Vreeland, $25,000; Shaffer & Yergy, $24,750. Messrs. B. & F. W. Vreeland were the architects, and the builders were Shaffer & Yergy, of Helena.

The Poor Farm.—The county Poor Farm is situate one mile west of Bozeman. In 1881 the commissioners appropriated $4,000 for the purchase of this 160 acre tract, or $25 per acre. To-day the land is worth $50 per acre. The hospital and other buildings afford ample accommodation.

Schools.—From the earliest settlement of the county the school was always an object of interest to the citizens. Then were the humble beginnings of the common school system made in the valley. The whole number of children in the county under the age of 21 years January 1, 1883, was 2,251, and the whole number of census scholars, 1,731, including 21 negro Americans. The condition of the county with respect to schools at the beginning of 1883 is set forth in school superintendent George W. Monroe's report, as follows:

Number of organized districts, 28; number of pupils attending school during the year, 905; number not attending school, 662; number of male teachers employed, 8; number of female teachers employed, 18; total number of teachers, 26; average length of school in days, 78; number of brick school houses, 1; number of log school houses, 24; number of graded schools, 1; number of ungraded schools, 25; total number of schools, 26; rate of county tax for school purposes, in mills, 4; amount per capita of school census children, $6.03; amount raised by county tax for schools, $8,705.62; total amount from all sources apportioned during year, $8,705.62. Even since this report was published in the spring of 1883, the era of school-house building was introduced.

The first school taught in the Gallatin valley was that by Miss Florence A. Royce, district No. 7, opened January 1, 1867. The names and ages of the scholars are given in the following list: Howard Stone, 15; Ward L. Stone, 7; John D. Harvey, 16; Stephen Gratten, 13; Martha M. Grattan, 10; Mary H. Sloan, 10; Jimmy Sloan, 15; Josephine Johnson, 14; Fannie Barkley, 8; Georgie Sloan, 7; Stephen White, 13; Harrie B. Rea, 14; Willie Rea, 9; Jennie A. Rea, 6. What a change! In Bozeman of to-day, large brick buildings are devoted to the cause of education. The first was built in 1877 by Beal & Chestnut, at a cost of $15,000, and the second in 1883. Stephen Allen, the father of Mary E. Allen, was the first superintendent of public instruction, and the first 'squire of Gallatin City. He also taught school for several years in district No. 7.

Tax Statistics.—The equalized assessment and tax collections of the county from 1865 to 1882 are given as follows, while the figures for 1883–4 are given in the chapters on statistics:

YEAR.	TOTAL ASSM'T.	TAX COL'TIONS.	LICENSE.	YEAR.	TOTAL ASSM'T.	TOTAL TAX.
1865	150,000			1877	1,190,060	4,538.98

According to the assessor's returns the assessed valuation of the property of Gallatin county is $4,750,550, exclusive of the personal property of the Northern Pacific railroad, put at $94,405. The main line is assessed at $486,000, and the Park branch at $204,000, which, added to the above, makes $5,534,845, and to which is yet to be added all the unsold lands of the railroad in Gallatin county. The valuation for 1884–5 is $6,265,192.

BOZEMAN AND WEST SIDE VILLAGES.

The county seat of Gallatin, 75 miles from the mammoth Hot Springs of the Yellowstone Park, is situate in the midst of the grandest, most sublime scenery in the entire mountain region. North of the city the mountains are about three miles distant, but the range suddenly diverges in the same direction, and afterward the valley becomes twenty miles in width. Bozeman is the oldest established town on the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad in Montana, the town-site having been laid out in July, 1864.

"The town-site," says Judge Maguire, "was located by Daniel E. Rouse on the 7th day of July, 1864. He built upon it the first house, the site now being occupied by the business houses of Rich & Willson. The next improvement was on the ground now owned by the Masons, at the northwest corner of Bozeman and Main streets—Judge Fitz, from Chicago, opening there the first store. Stafford & Rice opened the second. Among the first houses was the cabin of Wm. H. Tracy, northwest from the intersection of Black and Main streets. On the 1st of August, 1864, Col. John Bozeman arrived on the site of Bozeman, named in his honor, having piloted an emigrant train of 40 wagons, embracing a large number of families, from the North Platte along the eastern base of the Big Horn Mountains. About the same time arrived the trains of Major Bridger and Capt. Jacobs, which aggregated 125 wagons. At the time there were probably not more than 25 settlers in the Gallatin Valley. The three trains went on over to Virginia City, then and long after the center of the gold mining interest; but Col. Bozeman and some of his followers were so impressed with the beauty and fertility of the Gallatin Valley that they soon returned and made permanent locations. P. W. McAdow and Thomas Coover located a mill-site on Bozeman creek, now within the town limits, in the fall of 1864, and had their mill in operation the succeeding year. Then the flourishing city of Bozeman was founded, and thenceforward population rapidly increased. Col. Bozeman was killed in the Yellowstone Valley by hostile Indians in the spring of 1867, Thomas Coover at the same time being wounded. These, with other atrocities committed that spring, caused General Thos. Francis Meagher, then Acting Governor, to call for volunteers. Several hundred, well provisioned and supplied with munitions of war, entered the field; but the hostiles kept out of the way, and no fighting was done. In the fall of 1867 Captain La Motte arrived, commanding three companies of U. S. troops, when Fort Ellis was established, 2½ miles east of Bozeman. The volunteers were then disbanded. From this time on the Gallatin Valley steadily gained in population, the nucleal points of settlement being Bozeman, at its head—always the most populous, Hamilton, 12 miles northwest from Bozeman; Spring Hill, 12 miles north, and Gallatin City, at the junction of the Jefferson, Madison, and Gallatin. These continue to be the most prominent points. In the fall of 1869 the first number of the Pick and Plow was issued in Bozeman, the circulation of which reached 1,500; and this, along with the discovery of the rich and extensive silver mines on the Clarke's Fork (117 miles southeast of Bozeman), gave a new impetus to settlement and improvement in the Gallatin Valley. Bozeman at once came to the front as one of the most important trade centers. In 1869 also the Crow Indians were brought under treaty stipulations, their first agency being established on the Yellowstone; about 36 miles from Bozeman. Furnishing supplies to the agency and the military garrison added greatly to the prosperity of all classes. Until 1874, when the first steamboat ascended the Yellowstone, reaching the mouth of the Big Horn, the only route of travel and transportation in and out was southward, by way of the Union Pacific Railroad, involving a tedious land travel of over 400 miles. The natural and most direct outlet was by the Yellowstone Valley, to the eastward; but the general government opposed its settlement—though by clear legal implication pledged to protect the N. P. R. R. Co. in constructing their road through it—and the commander at Fort Ellis was instructed to prevent the Gallatin settlers from entering the Yellowstone Valley in force. The Sioux, under the wily Sitting Bull, had frequently raided through the Crow country into the Gallatin Valley, on one occasion (in the spring of 1874) coming to the suburbs of the town and driving off a herd of horses from within gun shot of Fort Ellis. So the Gallatin Valley settlers had to contend with them as well as evade the short-sighted policy of the government in opening the Yellowstone country to travel and settlement. They proved equal to the emergency. In the spring of 1874 a strong citizen expedition, amply armed, and well supplied with provisions contributed by the public-spirited farmers and business men, crossed the divide and entered the heart of the hostile territory. From near the mouth of the Upper Porcupine they moved southeasterly toward the Black Hills, forced their way beyond the head of the Little Rosebud and well on toward the head of the Tongue river. Three pitched battles were fought, and skirmishes were of almost daily occurrence, until they were within fifty miles of Bozeman on their return. The Sioux were badly whipped in every engagement. This expedition of citizens was immediately followed by a second, resulting in the erection of a block-house at the mouth of the Big Horn—civilization's first foothold in the Yellowstone Valley. When the forces of the lamented Custer reached that point in 1876 the national banner was still waving over the block-house. Undoubtedly those daring volunteer enterprises of the Gallatin Valley settlers precipitated the war against Sitting Bull; this, in turn, expedited the extension of the railroad up the Yellowstone Valley; and the general result is now seen in the chain of flourishing young cities and thrifty farming settlements that stretches continuously from Bozeman to Bismarck, with the lines of settlement rapidly extending southeastward, toward the Black Hills, and northwestward, toward the head of the Saskatchewan."

The first house builders in the settlement, succeeding D. E. Rouse, were Patrick Constantine, who hauled logs and drove oxen; W. H. Tracey, John M. Bozeman, and William Beal. During the month of July one or two men were camped outside the settlement, where the business house of Strasburger & Sperling is now situate. Topping, in his Chronicles of the Yellowstone, says:

"In July, 1864, Elliott Rouse located a ranch at Bozeman's present site, and commenced to build. F. F. Fridley, Cy Mounts, W. W. Alderson, W. J. Davies, Bill Heffner, William Beall, and Joe Merivale started houses at the same time. There were six buildings completed during the summer and fall, and some of the emigrants that came through with Bozeman and Bridger settled in the Gallatin Valley, near to this place, and quite a trade sprang up. Stafford & Rice opened up a little store, as did Fritz & Son. Jack Mendenhall, who had a saloon, had also canned goods, etc., for sale. Bozeman brought a second train from Missouri in 1864; also Squire Lilly and others came in charge of parties of immigrants. Tanner, an old Bozemanite, came through with one of these trains after Bridger, using an ox for a saddle animal. In a train just behind Lilly, one wagon was owned by a Methodist clergyman. The party did not go fast enough to suit him, and at Rocky Fork he struck out ahead. As he was going down the hill to the Yellowstone at the mouth of Bridger creek he was met by a party of Indians, and he, his son and a hired driver were killed; when found their bodies were bristling with arrows. Campbell came through with a train on Bozeman's trail, and about four weeks behind him. At Powder river he was attacked by Sioux, and fought them for three hours, four of his men being killed."

At a meeting held at Bozeman in June, 1873, a company was organized known as the Yellowstone Transportation Company, with Nelson Story, president; H. N. McGuire, secretary; G. W. Fox, N. Story, Major Bowen, A. D. McPherson, J. S. Mendenhall, Charles Rich, C. L. Clarke, P. W. McAdow and Charles Hoffman, directors. Nelson Story contracted with A. Jamieson to build ten boats. They were each thirty feet long by twelve feet wide; capacity, fifteen tons each. They were used in shipping merchandise down the river.

The Yellowstone Wagon Road and Prospecting expedition was organized in 1874, and left Bozeman February 12, 1874, for the general rendezvous at Quinn's ranch under Captain Frank B. Grounds, Lieutenant William Wright, Adjutant E. B. Way, Recorder B. P. Wickersham, Surveyor Peter Koch and Surgeon Whitby. The leading spirits in this citizen movement were John P. Bruce, J. V. Bogert, H. N. McGuire, Nelson Story, W. S. McKenzie, S. L. Langhorne, A. M. Quivey, W. Cooper, Joseph Wright, Ramsey, Peter Koch, L. M. Black, S. W. Lewis, G. G. Holloway, D. Davis, John Stevens, O. Berneires, C. Speigel, D. E. Rouse, J. Epplers, Rich, L. S. Willson, Dr. Osborn, P. W. McAdow, C. W. Hoffman, J. Speith, D. A. Kughn, Strasburger, L. Sperling, and others hitherto mentioned. Mrs. Lizzie Williams also aided the enterprise.

The names of those who cast their votes at the first election, under the laws of Montana, at Bozetown or Bozeman, September 4, 1865, are as follows: Baptiste Pouriere, J. J. Parham, George Westover, L. B. Lyman, Jake Lingrey, Duncan McArthur, John L. Noble, R. Howes, H. Calvert, John Richard, F. F. Fridley, S. J. Beck, J. S. Mendenhall, C. D. Filly, John Alderson, J. S. Simpson, M. Railsbeck, S. Turner, J. Tressler, Tom Cover, William Naggle, J. M. Bozeman, Payne Fittz, W. H. Tracey, William W. Alderson, C. S. Bradberry, E. B. Ames, W. N. Buchanan, William O'Donnell, Edgar Reynolds, Joe Merrival, William F. Gilkey, C. M. Hyde, A. M. Knox, Sam McCoy, William Bunn. The name Bozeman was adopted at a meeting held August 9, 1864, the minutes of which are taken from the original record in possession of W. W. Alderson.

"At a meeting held by the settlers of Upper East Gallatin at "Jacob's crossing," on Tuesday, August 9, 1864, John M. Bozeman was elected chairman and W. W. Alderson, secretary. The chairman stated the object of the meeting to be to form a claim association for the purpose of making laws, etc., in relation to farming claims and for mutual protection. On motion of W. W. Alderson it was Resolved, First: That the town and district be called Bozeman. Resolved, Second: That the boundary of the district shall be as follows: Commencing at the northeast corner of Kimball's claim, thence east to the base of the mountains, thence in a southerly direction around the base of the mountains to Gallatin river, thence down said river to a point due west of said Kimball's claim, thence east to the place of beginning. Resolved, Third: That after any settler stakes out and records a claim he must be an actual resident hereof within ten days thereafter in order to hold said claim. On motion J. M. Bozeman was elected recorder, and the sum of one dollar made the fee for recording a claim.

The "Kimball Place," to which reference is made in the foregoing report, was subsequently known as Lyman's ranch, four miles north of Bozeman.

Organization of the city.—The act approved February 13, 1874, authorized the inhabitants of Bozeman to organize as a corporate body, and defined the boundaries as laid down on the plat of the original town. J. S. Mendenhall, L. S. Willson, Frank Harper, C. L. Clark, John C. Guy, Arch. Graham, William H. Tracy, D. A. Rouse, Nelson Story, Louis Sperling, and H. N. Maguire were constituted and appointed to act as commissioners until a board of alderman should be elected and qualified.

Under the charter granted in 1883 by the Legislature the city council was organized April 9, 1883, with J. V. Bogert, mayor; W. F. Davis, W. H Tracy, Nelson Story, and D. F. Rouse, aldermen for long term; W. B. McAdow, W. H. Tracy, Nelson Story, and Peter Koch for short term.

Land District.—The act to create the Bozeman Land District was approved in 1874. The limits were, all that portion of the Territory east of the range line between ranges 2 and 3, west of the principal meridian, and south of the first standard parallel, north of the base line.

Mails and Telegraph.—Joseph R. Farley carried the first United States mails on horseback from Virginia City to Bozeman during the winter of 1869–70. The district mail had hitherto been carried via Helena. In June, 1885, Robert P. Minnefee took possession of the Bozeman post-office, hitherto conducted by Ed. C. Alderson. The new postmaster is one of the pioneers of the Territory, and is known among his political opponents as an old-fashioned Missouri Democrat.

The first telegraph connection between Bozeman and Helena was made November 11, 1871, when messages were transmitted:—one from Joe Wright, of the Avant Courier, to the Fisk Brothers, of the Herald. On March 20, 1880, the telegraph line between Bozeman and Bismarck, Dakota, was completed.

Banks.—First National bank of Bozeman was established and opened for business in August, 1872. The officers were Colonel L. M. Black, President; George W. Fox, cashier; L. M. Black, George W. Fox, C. J. Lyster, and John P. Bruce, directors. The suspension of this bank August 27, 1878, by order of its president, George W. Fox, created some anxiety.

The Bozeman National bank was opened in November, 1882, under authority of a charter granted in October, 1882, by the comptroller of the currency. Emory Cobb, the president, is a man of ample means, and is president of the First National bank of Kankakee, Illinois, a prominent man in the Western Union Telegraph Company, and has long been foremost in matters of public interest in Illinois. C. H. Cobb, the vice-president, is a son of Emory Cobb, and is a young man of energy and activity. D. F. Sherman, cashier, has been connected with the Kankakee National bank for twelve years, is fully conversant with banking, and he and Mr. Cobb, Jr., are the practical managers of the bank. The directors of the institution are Thomas Lewis, Wm. H. Tracy, Frank Esler, C. W. Hoffman, G. W. Wakefield and Walter Cooper. The resources of the bank are placed at $151,477.71.

Gallatin Valley National Bank.—The banking house of Story & Willson, the only bank in eastern Montana, previous to the entrance of the Northern Pacific into the Territory, was established by Nelson Story and Lester S. Willson. J. E. Martin is cashier; directors, Nelson Storey, Lester S. Willson, E. B. Martin, Ed. B. Lamme.

Street Railroad Company.—A joint stock company was organized and articles of incorporation filed with the territorial secretary in November, 1882. The object of the association being to construct and operate a street railway from the western limits of the town to the railroad depot, together with such branches as may be found necessary. The incorporators are Major D. S. Gordon, Jas. Bellows, J. W. Smith, Frank Gilchrist and Mat. M. Black. The capital stock is placed at $50,000.

The Eastern Montana Mining and Smelting Company, organized in 1876, is represented at Bozeman by: president, L. S. Willson; secretary, Elias Sperling; treasurer, W. W. Alderson; trustees, J. Hunson, H. Annis, W. J. Davies, W. W. Alderson, L. S. Willson, E. Sperling, E. D. Ferguson. The company owns some valuable ledges, a mill site and smelter at Soda Butte, near Cooke City, and is also possessed of a very valuable deposit of fire clay.

Churches.—Methodist Episcopal church is so fully treated in the general history, the following summary is only necessary here. The preachers in charge since 1875 were Revs. Cluckner Long, W. A. Shannon, 1879; W. C. Shippen, 1879; Geo. Comfort, 1880–2; F. A. Riggin, superintendent of Montana mission, 1880; and T. B. Gray, December, 1882. The brick house of worship, corner of Central avenue and Olive street, was begun in July, 1873, and completed in 1874, at a cost of about $7,000. The old frame church building, which stood on Main street, where is now Monroe's drug store, was commenced in 1866 and completed in 1869. A parsonage was begun in 1871, which was subsequently sold. The membership of the society in July, 1883, was 40, and of the Sabbath-school, 60. The present officers are T. B. Gray, P. in C.; Matthew Bird, W. W. Alderson, Nelson Story, A. C. Reeves, J. H. Aylesworth, Arch Graham, F. Harper, trustees; P. H. Bohart, Arch Graham, J. J. Walruth, J. H. Aylesworth, stewards; L. M. Jones, superintendent Sabbath-school; —— Sipes, treasurer; John Wylie, secretary.

The Protestant Episcopal church was founded in July, 1868, by Bishop Tuttle, at a time when there were but seven women in the entire neighborhood. The bishop visited the locality annually until November 1, 1875, when Rev. Thomas E. Dickey, now of Moorhead, Minn., came from Silver City, Idaho, as pastor of the Bozeman mission, when the mission received the name of St. James. Bishop Tuttle held services at various places in the village, sometimes, in the Methodist church or court house. In 1875 Mr. Dickey held services in the hall of the Y. M. C. A., on Main street. The present church, corner Templar avenue and Olive street, then the Good Templars' hall was purchased by Mr. Dickey, in 1876, for about $900. The building was refitted and now forms a neat church building. In August, 1877, Mr. Dickey left the parish. In 1878–9 occasional services were held by Rev. Mr. Prout, of Virginia City, together with Bishop Tuttle's annual visit. Rev. Frank B. Lewis, of Oxford, New York, was appointed to the mission in May, 1879, and made the journey westward during the summer of that year, arriving here August 2, 1879. Since that time he has presided over the mission, comprising Gallatin county, while the missionary has charge of the work in Yellowstone county. The number of the congregation varies from forty to sixty, of communicants, about 50; and the Sunday-school about 75. Sandford Ruffner is superintendent of Sunday-school. This Sunday-school was founded shortly after the church, and has been carried on continuously to the present time. During 1878–9 the existence of the Sunday-school was due principally to the efforts of Miss Amy Sweet, now of Salt Lake City.

Presbyterian Church.—Bozeman was first visited in the interests of Presbyterianism by Rev. Wm. S. Frackelton, about the 28th of May, 1872; on the following Friday he was joined by Rev. Sheldon Jackson, superintendent of Territorial missions. The following persons were organized into the Presbyterian church: J. H. Taylor, Mrs. Malinda Rich, Miss Alice Leonard, from Presbyterian church, Canton, N. Y.; Mrs. Emma Willson, 2d, from Albany, N. Y.; Mrs. Mary E. Perkins, from Onarga, Ill.; Mrs. E. Hoffman, Episcopal church, Buffalo, N. Y.; Miss Maria J. Davis, on profession of faith; John Craig, from United Presbyterian church, Rochester, N. Y. J. H. Taylor was elected, ordained and installed ruling elder for one year. The first minister was Rev. Wm. S. Frackelton. From the summer of 1873 to August, 1877, Rev. L. B. Crittenden, of Hamilton Mount, visited the church regularly, preaching once each month. From August, 1877, until April, 1883, Rev. C. L. Richards, of South Toledo, Ohio, had ministerial charge of the church and congregation. On June 9, 1879, the appointments of J. L. Patterson, Davis Willson and John P. Bruce as trustees were confirmed by a congregational meeting. J. H. Taylor was, at the same meeting, elected to fill the vacancy caused by Mr. Bruce's departure. At this meeting a motion was carried "that, seeking the favor of God, this church build a house of wor ship." The work was begun at once and completed the following year, and entirely paid for soon after, the total cost being about $5,000. The number of members at the present time is forty; number in Sabbath school, about eighty. This school organized summer of 1878. Pastor (July 1, 1883), Rev. R. M. Stevenson.

The First Baptist Church of Bozeman, erected in 1885 at a cost of a few thousand dollars, is a commodious edifice, the interior finishing and furnishing of which is contemplated at an early day. The building is now, June, 1885, regularly occupied by the society.

Schools.—The city claims two large school buildings, one of which was erected in 1883, referred to in the history of the county. In April, 1885, Nelson Story, banker, headed a subscription list with ten acres of land and $1,000 in cash for the erection of a Presbyterian college in this city. The sum of $10,000 in all was raised.

Cemetery.—William Blackmore, whose wife died in 1872, bought five acres of land and donated it to the people of Bozeman for a cemetery. The deed is made out to a board of trustees consisting of Nelson Story, Charles Rich, J. S. Mendenhall and L. S. Willson. The grave of Comstock (the famous discoverer of the Great Ledge of the State of Nevada), who committed suicide September 28, 1870, is in a neglected spot in the Bozeman cemetery, and unmarked by even a headboard. This great mine he discovered yielded over $300,000,000.

Societies.—Gallatin Lodge, No. 6, A. F. and A. M., was organized under dispensation in 1866, and the charter granted October 4, 1866. The original members were J. L. Noble, W. M.; J. D. Davidson, S. W.; L. Stockman, C. D. Fritz, R. P. Menefee, S. Falls, J. J. Chambers, D. Sneider, W. H. Heffner, W. A. Gregory, H. H. Mood, T. W. Cover, J. S. Simpson, J. C. Guy, George Austin, E. Andrews, W. S. Montague, L. E. Wells, W. O. P. Hays and William Degin. The W. M.'s were J. L. Noble, 1866–7; George Austin, 1868–70; J. B. Finch, 1870–71; W. O. P. Hays, 1871–72; T. R. Edwards, 1872–74; J. S. Mendenhall, 1874–5; S. W. Langhorne, 1875–6; Walter Cooper, 1876–7; S. W. Langhorne, 1877–8; C. L. Clark, 1878–9; Thomas Lewis, 1879–80; W. F. Sloan, 1880–81; S. W. Langhorne, 1881–2; C. L. Clark, 1882–3, with Elias Sperling, secretary. The membership in July, 1883, was fifty-three. The first of Gallatin Lodge—J. D. Davidson—was murdered seven miles west of Bozeman during his year of office. His murderers were never brought to justice. The new brick building on the north corner of Main and Bozeman streets, erected in 1883, at a cost of about $12,000, was built by Gallatin Lodge.

Bozeman Lodge, No. 18, A. F. and A. M., was organized under dispensation March 5, 1872, until charter was issued October 8, 1872, with W. H. Bailey, W. M. The first officers, elected in March, 1872, were Silas Ralston, A. D. McPherson, R. M. Reinshaw, J. Holzman, W. H. Blackwell, J. W. Grannis, E. D. Ferguson and J. H. Forsythe. The charter members were Irvine Hunter, Z. H. Daniels, L. S. Willson, G. D. Thomas, B. F. Mullikin, B. F. McDonald and J. G. McAdams. The W. M.'s from 1872 to the present time are named as follows: W. H. Bailey, 1872–3; Silas Ralston, 1872–4; George W. Monroe, 1874–5; John W. Grannis, 1875–6; A. D. McPherson, 1876–7; George W. Monroe, 1877–8; A. O. Brawner, 1878–9; E. D. Ferguson, 1879–80; A. D. McPherson, 1880–2; G. R. Nichols, 1882–3, with John Mitchell, secretary.

The membership in 1883 comprised John W. Grannis, P. M.; George W. Monroe, P. G. M.; Enoch D. Ferguson, P. M.; Alexander D. McPherson, P. M.; George Ash, Benjamin P. Barker, Angus P. Clarke, E. T. Ewing, James H. Forsythe, Samuel V. Getts, Benjamin F. Fridley, Fred. Holroyd, Francis Harper, W. R. Kermode, George W. Leckey, W. S. McKenzie, R. L. Morton, George R. Nichols, Fellows D. Pease, William H. Randall, John M. Robinson, Elbert E. Robinson, Charles F. Roe, Lester S. Willson, Timothy C. Ward, Frank Whitney.

Valley Gem Lodge, No. 8, I. O. G. T., Bozeman, was organized September 5, 1868, with J. J. Davis, deputy, and forty members. Charter forfeited 1874. Fairview Lodge, No. 21, I. O. G. T., Bozeman, was organized by James C. Switzler October 26, 1876. W. W. Woolverton was elected Lodge Deputy. Ceased work in 1879. Fountain of Hope Lodge, No. 42, I. O. G. T., Bozeman, was organized by J. W. Gillen November 28, 1873. T. C. Iliff was its first deputy. The original members numbered fifty-three. Lincoln Lodge, No. 10, I. O. G. T., Fort Ellis, was organized April 21, 1873, by Owen C. Parker. The number of members in January, 1883, was thirty-four, including the following named officers: James D. Abbot, James West, W. F. McNally, H. P. Erls, Ed. Ogden, Lewis C. Moore, Charles Gilman, A. Culp, J. R. Craft and Charles Bock.

Western Star Lodge, No. 4, I. O. O. F., was organized under a dispensation of the G. L. U. S., April 26, 1872, with W. L. Blackwood, N. G. The charter was issued the same year to the following members: W. L. Blackwell, A. D. McPherson, Ed. L. Purtle, John T. Jeffers and F. E. Schultze. The presiding officers from 1872 to the present time are named as follows: W. L. Blackwell, 1872; A. D. McPherson, W. P. Parsons, 1873; H. N. Maguire and J. F. Speth, 1874; S. H. Osborne and A. D. McPherson, 1875; E. M. Tracy and F. A. Major, 1876; B. F. Bisel and Julius Basinski, 1871; S. H. Osborn and Lewis Sperling, 1878; White Calfee and A. D. McPherson, 1879; John Stevens and O. A. Lundwell, 1880; A. P. Clark and White Calfee, 1881. Phillip Dodson and Lewis Sperling, 1882; and Lars. Anderson, for the yearly term beginning January 1, 1883. The members are A. D. McPherson, P. G. M.; B. T. Bisel, J. Basiniski, W. Calfee, A. P. Clark, P. Dodson, O. A. Lundewall, J. F. Spieth, L. Sperling, John G. Stevens, and H. N. Maguire, P. G's.; J. H. Brewer, L. W. McPherson, W. Y. Mulvaney, J. W. Mardis, M. Olsen, J. W. Drennan, S. Johnson, E. J. Ripley, A. G. Hemphill, T. Buchlex, Lars. Anderson, J. W. H. Frederic, and C. Bollman.

Pythagora Lodge, No. 2, K. of P., was chartered November 29, 1879, with White Calfee, R. P. Vivion, Byron Vreeland, H. Stevens, A. B. Charpie, M. Lunwall, F. Essler, B. P. Barker, D. Brooks, F. Hill, W. Lockey, E. B. Lamme, Z. T. Stahl, C. M. Chambliss, C. Caigell, and H. Brooks. The officers in 1883 were George E. Barnaby, C. C.; John Koch, V. C.; O. A. Lunwall, P.; W. W. Alderson, K. of R. and S.; F. Vreeland, M. of F.; Frank Hill, M. of Ex.; T. J. Kelley, J. G.; H. H. Hollidge, O. G. The lodge is in the jurisdiction of Montana, presided over by W. L. Bretherton, Sup. Dep., of the S. L. of the World, K. of P. The present membership is fifty. Financial condition good. George W. Lockey died November 26, 1882, while serving the lodge as M. of E. His was the first death among the members since the organization of Pythagora Lodge in 1879. The Eddowment Rank is in course of organization, while the organization of the Uniform Rank will be completed at an early date.

Bozeman Lodge, No. 5, A. O. U. W., was chartered February 10, 1882, with the following members: F. L. Gilchrist, Charles F. Baker, S. M. Fitzgerald, Madison M. Black, L. Sperling, B. P. Barker, E. M. Gardner, George R. Nichols, W. F. Sloan, D. A. Kughen, J. S. Axtell, S. W. Langhorne, James Jobb, E. D. Fergensen, G. W. Highsmith, Charles Rich, Thomas J. Lynde, George W. Wakefield, C. W. Hoffman, Francis Harper, and J. H. Taylor.

On July 13, 1883, a few gentlemen met at Walter Cooper's armory for the purpose of organizing a gun club. W. J. H. Carlin was called to the chair. After discussions as to the feasibility of the question the meeting proceeded to the election of officers as follows: Walter Cooper, president, Hon. S. W. Langhorne, vice-president; M. R. W. Berry, treasurer; T. G. Brooksbank, secretary. A committee of arrangement was appointed, consisting of Messrs. Worth, Harvey and Steffens.

The Bozeman Board of Trade was organized in March, 1883, with Walter Cooper, president; John S. Mendenhall, 1st vice-president; General Lester S. Wilson, 2d vice-president; Peter Koch, treasurer; J. V. Bogert, secretary.

The Bozeman Fire Company was organized January 5, 1880, with J. L. Sanborn, fireman; E. L. Fridley, assistant fireman; Robert Augustine, second assistant; J. S. Mendenhall, treasurer; Mat. M. Black, secretary; H. Rea, R. McChesney, O. Dowers, F. Carr, L. Pherson, L. Faulhaber, T. T. Thompson, J. W. Ponsford, V. C. Rosen, John F. Stocker, M. Mount, D. Boeman, E. L. Fridley, J. L. Sanborn, M. M. Black, Walter Cooper, Ira H. Pearce, F. D. Bogarth, G. H. Wilson, Robert Eugistine, H. Horwood, members.

Self-improvement Society. This was an organization gotten up for the purpose of training the moral and intellectual faculties of its members and was permanently organized November 21, 1877, when the following members were elected officers: President, Matt. W. Alderson; vice-president, B. F. Bemott; secretary, W. Y. Smith; treasurer, M. A. Lundwall. The Young Men's Association was organized in 1872, the hall built in the same year, and opened January 18,1873, J. V. Bogert delivering the address. Messrs. Bogert and Peter Koch were president and secretary, respectively.

Miscellaneous.—At a meeting held at the court house in 1874, called by the Territorial Deputy, R. N. Sutherlin, Bozeman Grange was organized. Thirty persons signed the call, twenty men and ten ladies. P. W. McAdow was elected master; W. S. McKenzie, overseer; S. J. Beck, lecturer; John McCormick, steward; Thomas Ellis, assistant steward; Rev. M. Bird, chaplain; Sandford Ruffner, treasurer; W. Y. Smith, secretary; W. F. Everman, gate-keeper; Mrs. A. M. Guy, ceres; Mrs. A. H. Mortis, pomona; Mrs. S. J. Ruffner, flora; Mrs. E. Woolverton, assistant steward. The Gallatin County Bar Association was organized in 1872, and the first annual meeting was held February 3, 1873, when Judge J. J. Davis was elected president; H. F. Williams, vice-president, and C. W. Turner, secretary. The membership is given in the general history. The Pioneer Society of Gallatin valley was organized in 1872, when T. L. Street was elected historian. The Upper West Gallatin Canal Company was incorporated September, 1882, with a capital stock of $40,000, divided into 400 shares of $100 each, with Geo. W. Krattzer as president; Frank Hill, secretary; Alex. Kissell, treasurer, and the following named gentlemen as trustees: J. H. Nixon, S. T. Parsons, Horace Kelly, Z. Lay, A. C. Reeves, T. C. Ward, Wm. Foster and J. B. Stewart. A right of way was secured from the West Gallatin canon to Middle creek for sixty feet in width, said right of way having been secured thus far by the purchase of only one man's right. The canal will be, when completed, twenty-four and one-half miles long, twenty-four feet wide and three feet deep. The route was surveyed by Engineer Littleford and will reach Bozeman creek about two and a half miles south of Bozeman. The canal commences at a point in the West Gallatin canon about two miles below the mouth of Spanish creek, but on the opposite side, at or near the point from which Oliver Holloway had commenced the construction of an irrigating ditch, whose rights the company have acquired. Where the canal is taken from the river it has narrowed down to a width of not to exceed two hundred feet, and the place has the appearance of having been arranged by nature to meet the wants of some such gigantic enterprise as that undertaken by the projectors of the canal. The rocky bank has been dug away for a distance of nearly one hundred feet, and the water permitted to flow to the head gates through a rock-walled cut. Here is a waste gate through which all the surplus water enters the river. The head gates are substantially built. They are six in number, and are easily raised or lowered by one man, and when open will be secured by lock and key. Up to the 15th of July, 1883, work was carried on by a body of first-class workmen. A meeting of the directors held subsequently advised the closing down of the works.

The Stockgrowers' Association of Gallatin county was organized on the plan of the territorial association, with the following named officers and committees: Nelson Story, president; Charles Ancency, vice-president; E. M. Gardner, secretary; J. M. Lindley, treasurer. Executive committee: W. H. Martin, David Fratt, Alfred Myers, S. R. Miller, W. M. Wright. Committee of arbitration: Nelson story, A. H. Murray, E. M. Gardner, James Gallop, J. E. Martin.

The Bozeman Lumber Company filed their articles of incorporation in the territorial secretary's office in March, 1885. The object is a general business of dealing in lumber, to be conducted at Bozeman, and the company have a paid up capital. The incorporators are: George W. Flanders, Genet S. Lansing, Theodore S. Lynde and Frank J. Nesbitt, of Bozeman.

Bozeman creek was called Soured Dough creek, on account of dough falling into the creek, which, being seen by a miner, urged him to ask: "What's that?" "Why," said the amateur baker, "that is sour dough." The name was given to the creek.

The Gallatin Town Company was associated December 30, 1862, with Alfred Ray, N. W. Burris, James Bouton, Edmund Ash, George Lemley, M. R. Burris, Felix Burton Albert Green, William Townsley, Benjamin Townsley, B. B. Burchit, E. House, S Stimpson, George Wiliford, Dr. Glick, P. C. Wood, H. P. S. Smith, Monroe Atkinson

J. B. Cowen, A. F. Watkins, E. P. Lewis, John Ault, C. M. Davis, G. M. Stapleton and Samuel McCann. The object of the company was to survey and plat a town below the mouth of the Gallatin, as located November 20, 1862. The company was chartered by first legislature, and the act of incorporation approved February 2, 1865.

The names of voters who appeared at the polls in Gallatin City, September 4, 1865, are as follows: Gurdon Campbell, William H. Gallaher, George Curtiss, J. B. Campbell, R. H. Crawford, E. French, William M. Wright, Thomas M. Dunbar, D. H. Ferguson, Jarvis Akin, James A. Bailey, Willard Grattan, William Fulkerson, F. B. French, Robert S. Lovell, Frank J. Dunbar, D. J. S. Pearce, William Rea, Stephen Allen, M. Monroe, R. C. Moore, Aaron Wair, James Gallaher, A. F. Nichols, James Burrell, I. B. Gray, O. D. Loutsenhizer, Walter Burris, Andrew Knox, D. L. Shafer, W. L. Perkins, A. C. Hill, Joseph Wilson, Alexander Watson. The names of the freeholders who voted in 1863 under the Idaho laws, are not forthcoming.

EAST GALLATIN.

This settlement is cotemporary with Gallatin City. An act of the first legislature, approved February 6, 1865, granted a charter to the East Gallatin Town Company, comprising Felix Burton, Alfred Ray, James Burton, N. W. Burris, and others. This charter provided: That the said company shall have power to hold, manage and control the land now owned by them as hereinafter described, to wit: Three claims situated on the side of the Missouri river, opposite the town of Gallatin; said claims consist of one hundred and sixty acres (or less) each, and were originally pre-empted by Felix Burton, Alfred Ray, and N. W. Burris, recorded by them in the books of the Gallatin claim club, and by them deeded to the said East Gallatin Town Company. Said company shall have power to survey and erect said tract of land into a town, to be known as East Gallatin, and to sell and transfer any portion thereof and in such manner as they may deem expedient.

The first religious services were held here in 1871, and at the same time a lodge of good templars was established. Pleasant Valley Lodge, No. 27, I. O. G. T., East Gallatin, was organized by C. W. Cook, March 16, 1871, with 39 members. J. E. Cook was elected L. D. Charter forfeited. Frontier Lodge, No. 32, I. O. G. T., East Gallatin, was founded by T. P. Street, April 12, 1872, with H. R. Somerville first deputy, and 23 members. Surrendered in 1876.

The vote by the citizens of East Gallatin, September 4, 1865, for county officers, was cast by the following named persons: Stephen Sale, M. Sanders, W. L. Montague, John Pointer, S. H. Cave, F. L. Weaver, S. M. Blankenship, A. D. Weaver, Samuel N. Myers, J. D. Wells, William H. Langford, A. Ward, Robert Reynolds, Alfred Johnston, E. C. McBroom, William Pierce, David Davis, G. W. Fair, E. W. Depew, Christian Nelson, H. Williams, C. J. Barclay, J. E. Martin, C. J. Bryan, A. Howell, L. Wallace, C. Pierce, J. A. Howes, L. E. Wells, A. Lamme, Thomas E. Berry, Charles E. Smith, John J. Thomas.

Keystone Grange, East Gallatin, was organized by R. W. Sutherlin in 1874, with W. O. P. Hayes, master; A. L. Corbly, overseer; J. W. Gillen, lecturer; T. Reese, steward; A. Johnson, asst. steward; J. J. Reese, chaplain; Harvey Wells, treasurer; T. P. Street, secretary; J. A. Bender, gatekeeper; Miss A. D. Street, Ceres; Mrs. A. Johnson, Pomona; Mrs. H. Wells, Flora; Mrs. L. Corbly, lady asst. steward.

East Gallatin, Elk Grove, and Farmington granges were existing at this time.

The school was one of the first institutions in the settlement.

WEST GALLATIN,

Jefferson Settlement, and White Gulch were all centers of population as early as 1864. The rich agricultural lands of the valley won from the immigrants of 1862-3 a recognition of their value, and drew to the districts named a large number of those who came to embark in the less certain business of mining. Willow Creek, Reese Creek, Hamilton, and all the eastern villages follow in the order of settlement. A saw-mill was built at Jones' Canon in 1865 by Marshal Jones. Sweet Grass, 70 miles from Bozeman, is a station on the Tongue river stage route.

The voters of West Gallatin Precinct in September, 1865, were: Joseph W. Curtis, A. E. Keathon, J. W. Nelson, S. Smith, S. A. Smith, S. H. Murrey, B. M. Dawes, S. A. Conrad, J. C. Ramsey, F. L. Kirkader, Wolcott Curtis, W. McNellan, J. D. Cestid, N. Y. Henthorn, V. A. Cockrill, D. C. Vallantine, J. Ridgley, C. Francisco, W. W. Curtis, E. H. Mills, E. Falls, Geo. L. Rent, J. F. Wells, H. M. Falls, W. D. Davis, L. Clark, A. W. Tanner, Chas. P. Blakely, J. M. McClintock, Andrew Cowen, F. McFarlin, R. B. Curtis, John Christman, J. C. Guy, Charles Ansney, J. A. Culver, E. M. Dairekon, Geo. W. Bratteer, R. H. Martin, W. H. Martin, Joseph Berry, J. C. Battey, G. A. Shepherd, E. A. Barton, L. G. Halley, H. J. Right, Phil. Thorpe, M. W. Goodell.

The following is a list of voters in Jefferson precinct, along the Madison from its confluence with the Jefferson to the county line, September 4, 1865: George Hale, Charles Lile, Marion Anderson, John Y. Cooper, Geo. Terry, Joseph I. Reeves, C. C. Graves, Morris Peyton, Nora J. Peyton, R. H. Reeves, J. M. Wood, Joseph L. Tinsley, T. B. Foster, Presly Thompson, James Nave, Alex. Williams, S. A. Pratt, Henry Moore, E. Pratt, Levi Powell, W. J. Smith, E. W. Cloud.

The citizens of White Gulch entitled to vote at the elections of September 4, 1865, were: S. Voorhees, Mike McCarthy, R. Kelley, James M. Fletcher, Frank D. Bacon, Joe Erwin, John C. Ryan, W. T. Richman, Benj. Toole, Frank Allen, W. F. Sloan, Jacob Venatte, Frank Cotrell, Robert Vickers, F. M. Mathison, Timothy Wilcox, Jacob Straup, Denis Lawler, Henry Kitchner, Wm. Armstrong, G. B. Ackley, A. W. Nuckols, E. Roberts, R. E. Creight, N. Hutchinson, A. M. Graham, Geo. A. Riggle, J. F. Hinton, A. J. Maxwell, S. Rasmussen, A. C. Dellinger, Frank Hogan, Frank Gill, H. Beckman, S. C. Miller, A. S. Fousher, C. Harrington, J. M. Easton, Wm. Ferrice, Dr. P. H. Clark, J. W. Welch, G. S. Barlow, S. J. Porter, B. S. Butler, W. Basye, J. M. Van Hoose, John Bordage, Hiram Neel, S. Madary, J. R. Boon, A. Manning, Jack Wason, R. G. Newell, Wm. Gorden, N. V. Mundy, George Horn, O. C. Lockheart, Wm. Graham, H. Dougan, T. F. Dougan, John Triplett, Geo. Howard.

HAMILTON.

Eighteen miles from Bozeman, is one of the old settlements of the county. In 1866 the only ladies in the settlement and vicinity were Mrs. Thomas, Mrs. Drew, Mrs. F. Roberts, Miss Drew, nee Mrs. Halley, the Misses Carpenter and Mrs. Anceney. These ladies met at the house of John Brown that year, danced on a puncheon floor and cooked what is termed a palatable supper without the aid of a stove. There was no stove to aid them in this enterprise. On September 8, 1871, McAllister, while working in his wheat field, four miles west of Hamilton, near the Canon house, was killed by two Indians. This caused the organization of a committee of defense. In April 20, 1872, a meeting was held at Hamilton to devise means and to more thoroughly perfect plans for protection from Indians. Geo. D. Thomas was appointed chairman and John Potter, secretary. Messrs. Judge Street, Potter, Thomas, Thorp, Nichols, and others forcibly stated the cause of the meeting, and committees were appointed. Hamilton Lodge, No. 31, I. O. G. T., was organized by W. J. F. McConnell, with C. S. Leavitt, lodge deputy and nine members. Charter forfeited July 31, 1872. Morning Star Lodge, No. 47, I. O. G. T., was organized there February 11, 1875, with fourteen members. Enos Swan was first deputy. In 1875 a seminary for girls was started near Hamilton by R. M. Crittenden and his daughter Gertrude.

SMALL SETTLEMENTS.

Three Forks—A town site of one hundred and sixty acres was surveyed November 1, 1882, by Paul & Hanley, proprietors, on the survey of the Utah & Northern railroad. The soil is gravel, and ten feet reaches good water. The present hotel was erected in 1882 to take place of the one consumed by fire. It is one of the best hotels in Gallatin county. A frame building two and one-half stories, front 40x24, back building 24x50, there are forty-seven windows of eight panes each 10x16, twenty-three rooms, parlor and dining-room included, have sixteen to twenty beds, dining-room 24x32; house is furnished throughout in good style; as many as two hundred and forty meals per day have been given, and two hundred and two head of horses each night. The slough bridge cost $2,380 and the other one more. Madison cost $1,600. The bridges are kept in perfect repair. Here is found the cheapest toll in the Territory. In the new town is a store, a physician, a saloon and blacksmith shop, and a hall in which to hold church service.

Willow Creek—on the road from Sterling to Gallatin City is a cotemporary of the early settlements. The post-office was established June 1, 1872, with Terry Burns postmaster. Willow Creek Lodge, No. 26, I. O. G. T., Gallatin county, was organized by C. W. Cook March 6, 1871, with eighteen members. Solon Pratt was the first lodge deputy. Charter arrested April 30, 1872.

Bridgeville is said to have been first settled by James T. Shed and wife, who, it is claimed by old settlers, built up the village of the swamp and named it Shed's Bridges, by which name it has been known for over sixteen years. Afterward the location was bought by Paul & Hanley, who entered on improving the village and developing the resources of the district, and who gave to it the name it now bears.

Salesville is twelve miles southwest of Bozeman, near the Gallatin canon. A saw-mill was established here by Z. Sales which is doing an extensive business. The ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the M. E. church was performed on June 6, 1885. The school of Salesville is cotemporary with its settlement. H. A. Webb conducts a general store at this point.

Jones Canyon is called after Marshall Jones, who built a saw-mill there in 1865.

Spring Hill, a post town, was once the scene of a stampede. In 1871 a set of practical jokers reported a discovery of gold at this point, and thus induced a number of men to visit the place. The post-office is continued with Mr. Walton in charge. The location is one and a half miles below the original settlement. Here Woodward, Page & Penwell built a mill. The first farm on the Reese creek (once called Rouse creek), in the upper Gallatin valley, was by D. E. Rouse, near the mouth of the creek. It was settled by Rouse and a crop raised in 1864.

Ross Peak is so called on account of Melvin Ross, Sr., having gone to the summit and there planted a flag, that could be seen for long miles away. It remained for several years. Ross was a "Josephite, and came from Utah to avoid" the curse of polygamy, etc. He came to Ross creek and settled in 1864. Mr. Thomas came from Boles to fix a corral in the fall of 1864, and found the cabin of Ross. The top of this peak is above timber line. There are two forks, one called South Fork, on which is Thomas' Mill. At the mouth of the Reese and Ross creeks were W. O. P. Hays, D. E. Rouse and Jacob Gurn, in 1863. When Mr. Thomas came to the county, Campbell and Gallagher were the only occupants of Gallatin City. There were about 60 to 80 houses and a warehouse, 40 x 60 feet, on the bank of the river, for boats to unload at in the spring. The settlers discovered there was a fall intervening, and the town was abandoned.

Middle Creek.—In October, 1864, Robert Gillespie and partners constructed a ditch one mile long at this point. In 1865 the Gillespies raised the first crops here. In 1872 the first postoffice was established at John McCormick's house, and the first religious services were held in the house of John E. Murphy by Rev. Blackwell.

LIVINGSTON.

Livingston or Clarke's City, named in honor of Charles Livingston, of New York, one of the directors of the Northern Pacific R. R. Co., is located three miles up the Yellowstone from the old Benson's Landing store, and three miles from the mouth of the Yellowstone cañon. It is 115 miles from Billings, thirty-four miles from the Boulder, twenty-five miles from Bozeman, twenty miles from Hunter's Hot Springs, now famous for the medicinal qualities of their waters. The principal route to the park—though there is a southern one and a western trail—is through the upper Yellowstone valley, from Livingston, at the base of the Snow mountains, to Mammoth Hot Springs, fifty-five miles distant. At Livingstone the channel of the Yellowstone river changes abruptly from east to south, coming through the gateway of the mountains. The city owes its rapid growth to the building of the Northern Pacific, the development of the mineral region which surrounds it, and the agricultural and stock-growing capabilities of the valleys. In November, 1882, there were one hundred and thirty houses and tents, ten or twelve of which were quite respectable buildings, the remainder being small and rudely built for temporary occupancy. The business houses of the nucleal points were six hotels and restaurants, four stores, five feed stables, two butcher shops, two wholesale liquor houses, thirty saloons and a lumber yard. The nearest post office was at Benson's Landing, three miles distant; but during that month Mr. Phillips received the appointment of postmaster, and an office was opened. About the same time a school was founded, with Miss Allen in charge, and the present school building was erected early in 1883.

In November, 1882, the population of this new railroad town was about 500; on January 1, 1883, it was only 150; in March the number of inhabitants was over 200, which number has steadily increased, until now the population is said to be 1,700. It is owned by the railroad company, and is growing with giant strides. In February, 1883, 159 lots were sold for $54,760. The total sales to the first of March, 1883, amounted to $93,020. Here is the junction of the Yellowstone Park Branch R. R. with the main line. E. V. Smalley, writing in July, 1883, of this new settlement, says:

"Livingston, the new town at the gateway of the lower cañon of the Yellowstone, has a beautiful situation on a broad, green plateau, in face of the towering peaks first seen from the railroad nearly a hundred miles away down the valley. Here the railroad leaves the river and begins the ascent of the Belt range, and from here diverges the National Park branch, now under construction, and to be completed in July. Livingston is now in the secondary stage of growth, having passed through the shack and shanty period, and begun the building of permanent structures. A long street of huts and hovels, grotesque in their rudeness, and inhabited by the driftwood of frontier society which float in advance of a railroad, still remains, but is hidden from the track by hundreds of smart frame buildings, the growth of the past two months. The people who have established themselves in this town count upon it speedily becoming a place of importance. The railroad shops will give it a permanent population of 1,500, and the coal mines and the limestone ledges near by, together with the tourist travel to the Park and the cattle ranches in the hills, ought to add at least as many more."

The Northern Pacific Railroad was completed to this point and turned over to the operating department January 15, 1883. The construction reached Livingston November 22, 1882. S. R. Ainslie is the division superintendent; F. G. Richmond, first assistant superintendent. Here are the headquarters of the Montana division, and the company has erected extensive shops, capable of employing 300 men. J. C. Munro is master mechanic; C. S. Hefferlin, freight and ticket agent. The National Park branch starts from this point and extends a distance of fifty-one miles.

Fire of May 2, 1883.—This fire is said to have originated in the Livingston hotel. The fire quickly spread to Vohse Brothers' building and the Revere hotel next adjoining, both two-story frames and both east of the Livingston, and completing the row on that end of Park street. The Vohse building was occupied by its owners as a saloon in the lower story and by Mrs. W. H. Lowe as a dwelling above. The Revere building was not occupied for its original purpose as a hotel, but contained a considerable amount of furniture belonging to Mr. Montagu, who also owned the building in conjunction with Frank Henry. The contents of these buildings were removed. From this point it reached out toward Higgins Brothers' building across C street, opposite the Livingston hotel; this was also a two-story frame building occupied by its owners as a saloon below and for lodging purposes on the upper floor. This building was soon destroyed, and here Henry Frank's brick building opposed the progress of the flames. The following is the statement of losses and insurance: J. P. Nolan, loss, $6,500, insurance, $4,500; Vohse Brothers', loss, $3,200; insurance, $1,500; P. Montagu, loss, $2,840, insurance, $1,200; Higgins Brothers, loss, $2,500, insurance, none, aggregating $15,000 and $2,000 respectively. The insurance was distributed as follows: Ceperley & Ayrault's agency: Home, $500; Commercial, $500; Scottish Union, $1,100; National, $500; Fireman's Fund, $600. E. J. Chamberlin's agency: Springfield, $1,500; Pennsylvania, $1,500. Savage & Elder's agency: Union of New Zealand, $1,000. Higgins Brothers' insurance policy had expired not many days before the fire.

Banks.—Bank of Livingston, Stebbins, Mund & Co., proprietors, was established April 9, 1883, under the management of A. L. Love. The associate banks are: Stebbins, Mund & Co., Miles City; Stebbins, Mund & Co., Billings; Stebbins, Conrad & Co., Buffalo, Wyoming; Merchants National Bank, Deadwood, D. T.; Stebbins, Mund & Fox, Central, D. T.; Stebbins, Fox & Co., Spearfish, D. T. The First National Bank was chartered by the Comptroller of the Currency July 16, 1883. The authorized capital is $250,000, of which the sum of $50,000 is paid up. The officers are C. Livingston, President; D. E. Fogarty, Vice-President; and Fred Ward, Cashier.

Stock Company.—The Yellowstone Live Stock Company was organized August 6, 1883, with the following members: Walter J. S. Traill, of St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota; Charles W. Ware, of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa; Robert A. Fox, of Livingston, in the Territory of Montana, for the purpose of the buying, selling, leasing, and dealing in lands, tenements, and hereditaments, the carrying on of the general business of farming, and also the buying, owning, raising, selling, and dealing in horses, mules, cattle, and sheep in the State of Minnesota, the Territory of Montana, and elsewhere.

Churches.—The new Catholic church at Livingston was commenced and the foundation completed in May, 1884. The building is 60 by 30 feet, erected at a cost of about $3,000. The Methodist church, referred to in the general history, was erected in 1883. Rev. Mr. Wadsworth is pastor. The Protestant Episcopal church was organized in 1883, and on January 1, 1884, Rev. Alfred Brown accepted the charge of this mission, with Billings as an appointment. The Congregational church was established here in 1884, a house of worship erected, and regular services held. The Presbyterian church was founded at Livingston in 1883. The Baptist church was organized here in 1884.

Societies.—National Park Division, No. 232, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, was organized September 13, 1883, with J. M. Moore, chief engineer; T. J. Irvin, 1st assistant; Hugh Monroe, 2d assistant; Hannaford Ross, 1st engineer; James Nolan, 2d engineer; Jas. Moran, guide; P. Kennedy, chaplain; F. Kissler and Ed. Horn, journal agents. The division claims a membership of twenty-four. In connection with this society is the mutual insurance division, which provides $3,000 for the widow of a member, or the same sum in case of permanent injury. Livingston Lodge, No. 23, A. O. U. W., was reorganized on May 7, 1885 (the old lodge having been partially disorganized), when the following named officers were elected: J. E. Hendry, M. W.; D. P. VanHorn, foreman; Dr. R. D. Alton, Overseer; R. H. Norton, recorder; E. Nebel, financier; E. L. Boughton, receiver; N. Imo, guide; H. Frank, I. W.; C. H. Moore, O. W.; F. L. Mintie, P. M. W. The Knights of Pythias have a lodge at this point, presided over by Frank Henry, C. C.; G. H. Wright, is K. of R. and S.

TRIBUTARY SETTLEMENTS.

Muir, east of Bozeman, is one of the railroad towns of 1882. Situate just east of Bozeman pass, near the eastern end of Bozeman tunnel; it commanded an extensive trade during the progress of railroad building, and even after the completion of the tunnel, the coal mining interests of the district contributed to its support.

Benson's Landing.—Benson and Nailly kept the first store on the river controlled by private enterprise. When Benson erected his cabin in 1872, he was an old fisherman, but his age did not operate against him, as he followed this trade in company with Peter or John Benson and Daniel Nailly. They established a ferry skiff on the Yellowstone, but failed to place a scow thereon. In 1873–4 two stores were opened by Benson & Nailly and H. J. Hoppy. Benson left for the Black Hills, while Nailly is said to have been taken to an asylum in California. The first ferry was established by the Indian department, in 1872, during the agency of Major Pease. On June 5, 1875, John Dolan and Frank Williams, volunteered to ferry Yellow Leggins, his squaw and child, across the river. The wire rope broke, Williams and the Indian were drowned, Dolan swam ashore, while Yank Evarts rescued the squaw and child. On July 12, 1875, a ferry sunk on the Yellowstone, and the following persons were drowned: Thomas Stonewall, Jackson Hunter, citizens; Geo. Fril, Jno. E. P. Shibble, Jno. Malery, James H. Burr, of the 7th U. S. Infantry, and Berry Smith (colored), an employe of Nelson Story.

Duck Creek.—The third settlement on the Yellowstone was on Duck creek, known as Gage's Station. Nelson Gage kept a saloon and restaurant at this point until his death, when the management of his business passed to Mrs. Gage. (See Sketch of Nelson Gage.)

Sweet Grass.—The fourth settlement was at Sweet Grass, named from the perfumed grass that grew in the vicinity. The first public school on the Yellowstone was established at the mouth of Sweet Grass creek, by Miss Lizzie Evans. She was succeeded by Miss Flora Cutter, who was killed by her alleged lover, in August, 1882. The first white child born in the Yellowstone country is said to be a daughter of Daniel McMillan, born in 1873, at the Crow agency. The question, however, is a disputed one, as it is claimed that the first white child in the Yellowstone valley was Edson Whitney, whose father moved into that country in 1877, when the valley had only been populated one year by frontiersmen. Now the boy is attending a graded school with 130 other children.

Botteller's Ranch.—Early in March, 1868, the Botteler Brothers located a place at what is now known as Pease's ranch, and commenced breaking ground, but seeing Indians, went higher up the river and located and now hold a ranch opposite the mouth of Emigrant gulch. Several places had been taken before and left, but this was the first permanent location made on the river. In this neighborhood, in 1877, William Davis, George Reese, John Workes, while en route to the National Park, had an encounter with the Nez Perces.

Hayden.—This settlement, twenty-five miles east of Bozeman, was named after Professor Hayden, of the United States Geological Survey. Its location in the valley between the canons of the Yellowstone is picturesque and useful.

Chicory.—Twenty-one miles up the Yellowstone from Livingston is a station on the Park branch called Chicory. It is just across the river from the town of Chico, the camp or center of the mining district in and around Emigrant gulch. James Kreppner owns a quarter section of land round Chicory, and having sold interests in his farm to Drew B. Allen, a well known Livingston real estate agent, and M. G. Grant, a Northern Pacific engineer, the three gentlemen propose to have the tract surveyed and platted. Chicory is in the heart of a fine stretch of agricultural country, and has, besides, the placer and quartz mines of Emigrant gulch to assist in its support.

Chico, the old mining village, is also beginning to show the effects of the revival of enterprise in the eastern part of the county. In Topping's Reminiscences of Eastern Montana, the following story is told: "Fair prospects of gold were found in Emigrant Gulch by those who had gone up the river, and many claims were taken and a town soon sprang up at the mouth of the canyon. This was called Yellowstone City. About forty houses were built and three hundred people wintered there, fifteen of whom were women. The ground was very deep and hard to work, and many of those who had claims did not get them properly opened this season; the result was hard times. What little flour there was in the country sold readily at $100 per sack, bacon $1 per pound, and all groceries in proportion. The country was alive with elk, deer and antelope, and wild meat was the main article of diet to those poor in purse. A meeting was held in the fall, which elected a Justice of the Peace and made mining laws. Hanging was to be the penalty for murder, thieving, or for insulting a woman. The next spring many of the inhabitants of Yellowstone City left for better mining camps, and those that stayed built for better protection, should they be attacked by Indians, up in the mouth of the canyon. The name given to the new town was Chico. Some very good pay was found this season, and the output of gold for 1865 was estimated at $80,000. In the spring of 1865 Albert Hull had taken a ranch on the creek now called Giesdorf; he sowed one and a half acres of wheat, besides garden vegetables; everything grew nicely and better wheat has never been raised on the river. Ben Strickland and Ike Dawson harvested and threshed it, doing the latter poorly, for after Hull left they threshed the straw over and winnowed out enough wheat to support them during the winter; it was of fine quality, and they readily sold what they had to spare at $12 a bushel.

Emigrant Gulch.—The mines of Emigrant were worked so early as 1864, and extensive preparations were made to develop the neighborhood. Owing to the magnificence of the mines west of the Upper Yellowstone, Emigrant and other points were almost evacuated by miners, and all industry may be said to droop, if not to cease, for many years. In February, 1865, the Yellowstone Anthracite and Bituminous Coal Company was incorporated with the following members: Wm. G. Hollins, Wm. M. Bowers, E. H. Kimball, John R. Green, Daniel Williams, Daniel Lanigan, A. S. Potter, Wm. Chumasero and Chas. S. Bagg. The land located was on the Yellowstone, near Red Streak mountains, above Yellowstone City, or as it is known, Emigrant gulch. This company, like many others, withdrew from the enterprise. Neither railroads nor wagon roads were there to assist them, and so the coal mining industry was left for other years and newer men to develope. Yellowstone City is now coming into prominence again. New leads are being discovered, old channels reworked. In December, 1882, the Ossian, owned by Peter Peyer, was found to yield $297 in silver and $180 in gold per ton. Then comes the Villard Hydraulic Gold Mining Company, whose mines are situated in Emigrant gulch, about twenty-five miles from Livingston, on the road to the National Park. The company owns what is believed to be the old channel of the gulch. They have about 380 acres of ground. A small portion of this has been worked continuously for the past twenty years and has yielded a large quantity of gold. One claim now being worked by hand yields a net profit of eleven dollars per day to each man. Since purchasing the ground the company sunk five prospect shafts twenty-five feet deep and they show good pay dirt all the way down. This, however, does not take them down to bedrock, there being from sixty to one hundred feet of gravel on bedrock as shown by old workings. The company owns the Mill creek water right, and for the purpose of more extensive operations than at present, they propose to construct a ditch eight miles in length to bring its waters to the mines. It will have a capacity of six thousand inches, which will be fully sufficient for all requirements. Thirty new claims adjoining this ground were taken up in June, 1883, for the working of which water will be procured of the company.

Hunter's Hot Springs.—John H. Ailsworth located the Hunter Hot Springs in September, 1866, while passing through en route to Virginia City. In May, 1871, Harry Horr and James McCartney went to the Mammoth Hot Springs and located claims of 160 acres each. At nearly the same time McGuirk made a claim at the hot springs on Gardiner river. In 1871, Mr. Ailsworth was appointed teacher to the Crow Indians, and remained teaching at the Old Crow Agency until September, 1873. A post office was established at the springs in 1878, with Dr. Hunter, postmaster. The location is very picturesque. The scenery grand and sublime. Nestling among the foot hills these springs are the fountain head of several warm creeks that flow into the Yellowstone. There is a cold stream on the ranch, and below the mouth of it a dam has been built to catch both cold and warm water. In the vicinity the land is very fertile and a good supply of water for irrigating can be had. Trout, such as no stream save the Yellowstone, can furnish, are caught in great abundance. Here are to be found all the varied features of nature—valley, mountain and hill; river, brook and dale, all blended in one scene of perfect harmony to delight the eye and charm the admirer.

CHAPTER XXIV.

JEFFERSON COUNTY.

JEFFERSON COUNTY lies between Gallatin and Madison counties on the south, Lewis and Clark on the north, Deer Lodge and Silver Bow on the west, and Meagher and Gallatin on the east. The Jefferson and Missouri rivers half encircle it on the south and east, and the valleys bordering them are very fine. The county is noted for the vast number of mineral lodes it contains, which have proved valuable. At Wickes, Elkhorn, Basin City, and at the Gregory large mining works are in successful operation, and daily turn out many tons of silver bullion. At Radersburg, on Crow creek, the placer mines are worked for their gold. The principal towns are Radersburg, Boulder City, Jefferson City, Wickes and Clancy. Although the county is one of the smallest in area in the Territory, it holds its rank for productiveness of live stock, farm products and the precious metals. The fourteen principal mines of Jefferson county produced in 1881, gold and silver valued at about a quarter of a million; while according to the census returns of 1880, the total value of gold and silver was $132,295. The U. S. mining reports place the product of 1882 at a low figure, but good authorities estimate the yield of quartz and placer mines of Jefferson county, in 1882, at $600,000. The Mountain Chief, Chillicothe, Venus, Alta, Montana and Comet mines all contain fine bodies of ore. In March, 1883, a quartz ledge, eight feet in width, rich in native silver, was discovered. Every day some new discovery is reported, each of which in time will attract capital.

Dick Hammer, who, in partnership with his brother, John G., owns a ranch about a mile and a half north of Boulder City, discovered a deposit of excellent fire clay in the ranch pasture in June, 1883. His attention was first called to it by the peculiarity of the earth which the prairie dogs had thrown up out of their burrows. He made an examination and feeling sure that it was really fire clay he sent up to the Amazon works for Dr. Grenier to come down and look at it. Grenier at once pronounced the deposit fire clay, and of a very fine quality. A test of it was made at the Amazon works to ascertain if it would stand a very intense heat. The test demonstrated it to be equal to the best in the country. So far as prospected, Mr. Hammer has found that the deposit covers three or four acres, and is at least three feet deep. In 1882, Prof. W. P. Blake, while riding from Helena to Wickes, saw some samples of stream tin at Clancey, and obtained some from Dr. H. M. Hill at that place. It occurs in the creek near the Legal Tender Mine, and is obtained by the miners in washing up their sluices for gold, it encumbering their rifles and pans in cleaning up. This ore is the well known "stream tin" or "wood tin," an oxide of the metal with an earthy look, not metalliferous, but very heavy and generally red brown in color and extremely hard.

Boulder Valley, about thirty miles long and a mile or more in width, is the banner dairying district in Montana thus far. Fine grassy bench lands and well-carpeted hills flank the valley and abound in springs of the purest water. The county has many herds of stock, and is admirably adapted to grazing. The many mountain streams furnish as many fine valleys for the dairy and the farm. The principal are the Jefferson, North and South Boulder, Prickly Pear, White Tail Deer, Pipe Stone and Crow Creeks.

Organic.—This county was organized in 1863 by the legislature of Idaho, and an election held under the laws of Idaho. After the establishment of the new Territory of Montana, Governor Edgerton, by proclamation, acknowledged the county and appointed officers, which executive action was approved by the first legislature in the act of February 2, 1865. A reference to this act and a look at the map of the Territory are sufficient to show the many changes in boundaries which have been effected since 1865. The organic act approved February 2, 1865, provided, "That all that portion of the Territory of Montana embraced within the following boundaries be created a county, to be known as Jefferson county, commencing at a point where the meridian of longitude 111th degree intersects or crosses the northern boundary of Madison county, thence along said northern boundary of Madison county to meridian of longitude 112 degrees; thence north along said meridian of longitude to the Bald mountains at the head of Ten Mile creek; thence along the dividing ridge between Prickly Pear and Ten Mile creeks to the foot of the mountains; thence east to the south side of the Vermillion Butte on the Missouri river; thence up said Missouri river to meridian of longitude 111 degrees; thence south along said meridian to the place of beginning; and the county seat of said Jefferson county is hereby located at Jefferson City." The year succeeding the people requested county seat legislation, and on December 14, 1866, an act was approved providing, "That the board of county commissioners of Jefferson county shall have the authority and it shall be their duty, at any regular meeting of said board of commissioners, upon a presentation of a petition signed by fifty residents of said county, to order an election for the purpose of changing and permanently locating the county seat of Jefferson county." This act became a dead letter, so that on January 15, 1869, a second act was approved, giving to the people authority to vote at the general election of that year on the question to move the seat of justice. During the same session the act to legalize the district records of Jefferson county was approved. This act provided, "That the county commissioners in and for Jefferson county are hereby authorized and empowered to examine the county district records, as copied into a record book, and indexed F, D, the letter "F" being the order in which the books are lettered, the letter "D" denoting it as a district record; and if a majority of said board of county commissioners shall declare the same as correctly copied, they shall be considered the legal records of said district. That these records shall be considered and taken as evidence in any court in this Territory."

The contest over the county seat resulted in favor of Radersburg, where the county court house was erected at a cost of $18,000, and a jail built at a cost of $8,000. In 1883 Boulder City won the coveted prize, and the offices of the county are now located there.

A. M. Easterly, assessor of Jefferson county, gives a few facts and figures worthy of record. It is only necessary to say of Mr. Easterly that he has assessed the people of Jefferson for nearly eight years; first by appointment, second by election for two successive terms as sheriff and assessor, and next by election as assessor. In 1878 the assessed valuation of property amounted to but $743,000; in 1881 the assessment roll showed $2,100,000; in 1882, $1,383,000; in 1883, $2,213,000, or an increase of $850,000; in 1884 it will go $3,000,000 or over. In 1883 $10,000 of the county debt was liquidated, and 1884 saw it still farther reduced. The Wickes railroad corporation has been taxed at the rate of $45,000 per mile for the bed, and rolling stock, building machinery, etc., at market value.

The political condition of the county, based on the official record of the November elections of 1884 is shown in the following table:

On the night of December 31, 1874, the safe in the Treasurer's office was opened during the absence of Mr. Lineberger, the Sheriff, and $8,000 in money belonging to the county and $2,000 belonging to Lineberger stolen.

Schools.—The condition of the schools of the county at the beginning of 1883 is shown in Superintendent J. A. Elder's report for 1882 as follows: Number of organized districts, 18; number of white persons between four and twenty-one, 657; number of African descent, four to twenty-one, 1; number of pupils attending school during the year, 349; number not attending school, 309; number of male teachers employed, 6; number of female teachers employed, 12; total number of teachers, 18: average length of school in days, 78; number of frame school houses, 3; number of log school houses, 3; number of ungraded schools, 18; total number of schools, 18; rate of county tax for school purposes, in mills, 4; amount per capita of school census children, $6.27; amount raised by county tax for schools, $4,127.82; total amount from all sources apportioned during year, $5,118.97; total number of children under twenty-one years of age, 898. In 1882 there were no private schools, graded schools, or brick school buildings. Now the county can boast of all these, together with an increase in the number of houses devoted to school purposes.

* In this county in 1882, 616 votes were recorded for Martin Maginnis, the Democratic candidate for Congressional Delegate, and 704 for A. C. Botkin, the Republican.

BOULDER VILLAGE.

The Boulder Town Company was incorporated February 8, 1865, almost three years after the first settlement, with N. Walls, president, G. W. Case, secretary; W. Berkins, treasurer; H. Stevens, R. Heaton and J. J. Healy, trustees. The boundaries of the town were: "Commencing at the north side of Boulder crossing, on the Gillett road, thence north one half mile, thence west one mile, thence south one half mile, thence east one mile to the place of beginning, containing three hundred and twenty acres." The stampede from Gold creek to the Boulder, which took place July 20, 1862, was the origin of the village. The vicissitudes of the village are known to every old resident of the territory. Until the revival of mining the old town was almost forgotten, but with the new industrial era it has sprung once more into active life, and with so much earnestness, that she won from the rival towns the County Seat. The population of the village and vicinity in 1880 was 215. In July, 1883, the number of inhabitants in the town was about 150. The business circle of the town in 1883 comprised the following named citizens: R. W. Jeffries, T. F. Murray, Edward Dougherty, William Reins, William Deacy, J. G. Smith, V. A. Cook, F. Farnham, proprietor of the Boulder City Hotel. Boulder is the dinner station for three stage divisions; one from Butte, one from Helena and one from Dillon. In 1884–5 general stores were kept by V. A. Cook, J. E. Dougherty, R. W. Jeffries and T. F. Murray; hotel by F. Farnham, saloons by W. Deacy and J. G. Smith, livery by W. D. Northrop, blacksmith shop by W. Reins, and meat market by Murray & Davis.

The Australian, Belle of Boulder, Amazon, Wall Street, Ollie, Chillicothe, Emmett and Spencer lodes are all in this district. The Amazon concentrating works, two miles from the Amazon, were erected in 1883 by Jacob Wave, the mill-builder. Henry Thompson was granted $2,500 by the Legislature January 11, 1865, for the pursuit of G. Kelly, the murderer of R. R. Dorsett and John White on the Boulder. Boulder Star Lodge, No. 3, I. O. G. T., was organized February 18, 1869. The present number of members is fifty-one, including the following named officers of the lodge: G. W. Rohrbacker, Elmer Douglass, T. B. Mills, J. A Bailey, G. A. Douglass, S. A. Riley, V. A. Cook, J. R. Holt and J. M. D. Holt.

From Boulder City excellent roads diverge in every direction, east to Elkhorn, southeast to Gallatin City, south to Dillon, west to Butte City, northwest to Comet and Wickes, and north to Jefferson and Helena, the several distances being: to Elkhorn, 15 miles; Gallatin, 40 miles; Butte City, 35 miles; Comet, 6 miles; Wickes, 9 miles; Jefferson, 12 miles; Helena, 32 miles. South of Boulder City two and a half miles are the famous Boulder Hot Springs, a favorite resort for invalids, the waters of which are held on high authority to be a specific in cases of rheumatic and scrofulous diseases and highly beneficial in nearly all chronic complaints. A large hotel building was completed at the springs in 1883.

WICKES.

Wickes, named in honor of T. A. Wickes, the leading merchant of the town, was settled in 1877, and is one of the most prosperous mining camps in the county. The Alta, Alta South, Gregory, Rumley, Custer, and Comet mines have made a record for the district. These mines have been operated on a large scale, and are so located in the hills that they can be easily worked. The ores, which are rich galenas and high grade in silver, are found in true fissure veins, in a favorable formation, and the Wickes district contains all the elements and ingredients needed in smelting, and in just the proportion required for that purpose. The elevation of the district is not high, and the mines are reached by wagon-roads of easy grade. Best qualities of rich ore, opened and developed in these mines, will supply the reduction works for years to come.

The destruction of the costly and extensive reduction works of the Alta-Montana Company at Wickes was a prostrating blow to the camp. Those works had been erected at a cost of over $250,000, and were in operation at the time the property was purchased by the Helena M. & R. Co. The business of the village in 1883 comprised a half dozen of saloons, a notion store, the Wickes general store, and the post-office store by Messrs. Dean and Stout. In 1884–5 the business circle comprised E. R. Dean, postmaster and notion store; T. A. Wickes, general store; Dean & Street and C. F. Parker, hotels; Tole & Hardin, saloon;

H. D. Taylor & Co., meat market; J. T. Reynolds, shoemaker; J. A. Bailey, blacksmith, and the officers and employes of the H. M. & R. Co's works.

Churches.—The Presbyterian society of Wickes completed a very neat and comfortable church edifice, 27x45 feet, at a cost of $2,750, in December, 1882. Newberry & Graham, of Helena, were the contractors. The seating of the church cost $250, paid by the Sabbath school. The final payment was made and a deed received from the Alta-Montana Co. for the land upon which the building stands. Much of the success of this church is due to the efforts of Rev. T. A. Wickes and his wife. Rev. T. M. Todd is pastor in charge.

Societies.—Eureka Lodge, No. 13, I. O. G. T., was organized April 22, 1880, by Geo. A. Douglass, G. W. C. L. The number of members belonging to this lodge, in January, 1883, was 104, including the following named officers: John Andrews, Carrie Gillette, J. T. Reynolds, Geo. Clark, T. A. Wickes, Anna Dallas, John Baylie, T. N. Todd, Bettie Lampton, A. M. Morgan, and W. D. Woodbridge.

RADERSBURG.

Radersburg, forty-eight miles southeast of Helena, where the old Bozeman stage-road crosses Crow creek, may be classed among the early settlements of the county in 1866. The population in 1879 was 250, reduced to 109 in 1880 in the village and vicinity. The valley of Crow Creek at this point possesses all the qualities to render it at once a rich agricultural and stock country. This was for years the county seat, and here a court house and jail were erected at a total cost of about $26,000. The quartz lodes, known as the Congress, Ohio, Keating, Leviathan, and Iron Clad, were yielding freely in 1879. The Blacker Mill of 15 stamps, and the Ten-stamp Keating Mill, were most important contributors to the welfare of the district; while the system of ditches, operated and owned by William Quinn, afforded the necessary water supply to carry on the mining industries, as well as for the purposes of irrigation.

The business circle of the town in 1879–80 comprised: Frank Wells, general merchandise; J. E. Dougherty, general merchandise; J. R. Weston, drugs, tobaccos, and notions; Charles Hosfeild, meat market and stock dealer; D. G. Warner, livery stable; Mrs. M. A. Parks, Central Hotel; Archie Macumber, hotel; S. S. Huntley, sheep-grower; P. B. Clark, sheep-grower; Charles Halleck, saloon; Mrs. J. W. Hamper, saloon and brewery; G. E. Norem, blacksmith, since deceased; F. M. Smith, blacksmith. In 1884–5 the following named firms and individuals formed the list of business men: E. M. Batchelder, notions and tobacco, and postmaster; J. E. Dougherty and Frank Wells, general merchants; J. D. Ripley, hotel; Warner & Horsfield, livery; E. J. Ripley and A. H. Dougherty, liquordealers; Chas. Horsfield and Huntley & Clark, horses and cattle; S. Shull, — Skinner, blacksmiths; R. Norem, shoemaker; Johnson & Suderburg, carpenters; D. G. Warner, Judge of Probate; A. H. Dougherty, deputy sheriff.

Societies.—The first society organization at Radersburg was Mount Hope Lodge, No. 4, I. O. G. T., organized April 12, 1868, reorganized in September, 1868, with twelve members, H. C. Powers, Lodge Deputy. Jefferson Lodge, No. 15, A. F. & A. M., was chartered November 1, 1870. The Past Masters and Master Masons of this lodge in 1883 were: Charles Horsfeild, P. M.; Frank Wells, P. M.; H. E. G. Winters, P. M.; Benj. Townsley, P. M.; A. F. Bright, George Behrenger, J. C. Blacker, James S. Bullard, A. M. Easterly, John R. Gilbert, Charles G. Hallbeck, O. Brodock, G. B. Ballard, J. M. D. Taylor, Joseph E. Hassel, William Jewell, B. F. Lowrey, Alfred Myers, Isom Prewitt, Philip Roberts, C. E. Worden, A. W. Sederberg, John Johnson, Robert Horsfeild.

The latest strikes of gold quartz in this county are the Deer Lode, worked by Boyd and Rader, in 1878, and the Bonanza Chief, discovered in April, 1879, by Boyd and Rader, showing native gold in a large vein of soft sulphuretted quartz, running up into the thousands per ton. The discovery is in the mountains of the Prickly Pear, about eight or nine miles south of Helena and Radersburg.

JEFFERSON CITY.

The Jefferson Town Company was incorporated January 11, 1865, with Nathaniel Merriman, John Radcliff, Allen T. Axe and Philip Sheenan, incorporators. The place was settled in 1864 by these men while en route from Alder Gulch to Helena. Allen T. Axe discovered the Gregory lode, and there the party located. In 1865 the legislature designated the new town as the seat of justice for the county. Shortly after the district was organized a post-office was established with Nathaniel Merriman, postmaster. The first school was conducted by Miss Sallie Allen, during the winter of 1866–7. She was the daughter of "Dad" Allen, who kept a blacksmith shop after Frank Smith and John Haggerty, the first blacksmiths. The first hotel was conducted by William Campbell, and the first store by J. S. Redding; Gou Camix and A. H. Moulter were among the pioneer business men of the village. A substantial school building has given place to the pioneer school-house of 1866–7, the Emerson House takes the place of the first hotel, and even the blacksmith shop is modern compared with the old one, which was destroyed by the only fire that ever threatened the village. The business circle of Jefferson in 1879 was made up of the following named traders: M. B. Thompson, Emerson Hotel; J. G. Sanders, general merchandise: Henry Dildine, general merchandise; Dell & Wehr, meat market; Conrad Becker, blacksmith; Henry Blakeman, blacksmith; Casper Deaflin, shoemaker; Thomas D. Tice, barber shop; William Whitstone, saloon and billiard hall; Kessler & Winters, saloon; Conrad Becker, saloon and billiards; Becker & Co., livery stable; Jessie Patterson, lumber dealer; Holter & Russell, lumber dealers; Dr. A. F. Rudd, physician. Jefferson Lodge, No. 14, I. O. G. T., was organized May 6, 1869, with Geo. Benjamin, L. D., but ceased working. Jefferson Lodge, No. 33, was organized by G. A. Douglas, August 10, 1872 with sixteen members. J. M. D. Taylor was the first deputy of this Lodge. Charter forfeited 1873. The population of Jefferson in 1879 was estimated at five hundred; in 1880 the number of inhabitants in the village and vicinity was two hundred and ten. The business circle of 1884–5 is made up as follows: Ellis & Berendes, general store; E. C. Eyl, general store; A. F. Rudd and C. Denbow, physicians; Clements & Fay, hotel; Wm. Campbell, J. McLaughlin, Wm. Whitstone, saloons; Soule Bros., livery; Wm. Neil, blacksmith; John Culver, justice of the peace, and F. W. Ellis, postmaster.

SMALL SETTLEMENTS.

St. Louis, at the head of Crow creek, eight miles northwest of Radersburg, was a prosperous placer mining camp up to 1879, and offers to-day resources which will reward development. Here the Little Giant and the Jaw Bone quartz lodes were worked, and the Lewis & Reese twenty stamp mill erected. There is a church and a school maintained in this settlement. St. Louis Lodge, No. 49, I. O. G. T., was organized by R. S. Clark, March 8, 1875. The original members numbered eighteen. W. L. Moore was elected first deputy. Ceased work in 1879.

Whitehall, on White Tail Deer creek, sixty miles south of Helena on the overland road, is one of the old settlements of 1864. In 1879 it had a population of one hundred, which, owing to discoveries at Pipestone and other places in 1879, was reduced to forty-one in 1880. Since the date of the census the little village has shared in the general progress of the Territory, so that in 1882 the population had reached its normal state, giving a vote of thirty-two. E. G. Brooke, cattle-grower and hotel keeper; John Paul, A. Belcher, C. Thurston and others, stock-growers, may be named among the first who have aided in the development of this village and neighborhood. A school-house was erected in 1879, and the first regular religious services of the Methodist church were held here. This society erected a house of worship some time ago. E. G. Brooke is postmaster.

Big Pipestone, six miles west of Whitehall, was the seat of the placer mines of Worthington, Booth, Paul and others. The Belcher ditch, carrying water from Fish creek to the mines at this point, a distance of seven miles, was the first step toward the true development of the district. Pipestone Hot Springs, owned by W. B. Barnes, promises to be one of the leading health resorts of the future. Little Pipestone, four miles west of Big Pipestone, was the name given to the placers of Dan Stanard, Baxter, the Tuttles and others. The whole country along the Whitehall, Deer and Pipestone creeks offers advantages to the miner, stock-grower and even agriculturist, which have not been, so far, half developed. The population of Pipestone and Fish creek in 1880 was sixty; of Pipestone and vicinity thirty-six, and of Pipestone Mts., ten.

Clancey, fourteen miles southeast of Helena, is one of the business centers of the county, settled in 1865. In 1879 this village was credited with a population of 200, while, according to the census returns of 1880, the number has fallen to 77. M. H. Hill may be considered the pioneer merchant of Clancey. He carries on a general mercantile business, including hardware and drugs, a machine and blacksmith shop, and acts as postmaster, assayer and metallurgist in that district. The sawmill and ore hoister at this point are operated by water power. Star of the West Lodge, No. 46, I. O. G. T., was founded by Massena Bullard, May 29, 1874. The number of original members was 27. F. L. Gillette was elected Lodge Deputy. Charter revoked in 1876.

The Jefferson Valley Woolen Mill was erected in 1879. This is a two-story stone building, 50 x 100 feet, supplied with first-class machinery, and is the pioneer of the woolen manufacturing industry in this Territory—the introduction, as it were, to hundreds of large manufacturing establishments which the Territory will sustain, and for which this county is so well adapted.

Montana Town, reference to which is made in other pages, was incorporated by the first legislature. The name was changed to Prickly Pear, under authority of the act approved February 6, 1865, which chartered the Prickly Pear Town Co., with James Gurly, H. M. Hill, A. H. Moulton, C. G. Hallback, T. G. Merrill and A. Ackeman, incorporators. The boundaries of the new town were:—Commencing at the northwest corner of mining claim number five, in the lower Prickly Pear district; thence up the Prickly Pear creek, one mile; thence west from said creek, one-half mile; thence north one mile; thence east one-half mile to the place of beginning, containing three hundred and twenty acres. James Gurly was appointed president; H. M. Hill, secretary; A. H. Moulton, treasurer; and C. G. Hallback, T. G. Merrill and A. Ackeman, trustees of this town company.

Fish Creek, just east of Table Mt., is an old settlement, dating back to the sixties, when prospectors looked north from Alder gulch to the quartz hills of the Jefferson, and located there in 1865. The population of the settlement in 1880 was 12, now increased to 500. Geo. A. Bruffey is postmaster at this point. (Vide Mining History.) Here a steam sawmill and crushing mill are located. Fish Creek Lodge, No. 5, I. O. G. T., was organized August 2, 1870, by Geo. Comfort. The present membership is 50. Walter M. Jordan, Etta Jordan, O. J. Gist, J. W. Rundell, John A. Beall, Mattie Tuttle, A. D. Beall, J. M. Gist and H. M. Rundell hold the official positions from W. C. T. to W. I. G. Waterloo Lodge, No. 48, I. O. G. T., was formed February 23, 1875, with 10 members. J. S. Crissman was its first deputy. Charter revoked in 1876.

Beaver Creek is the name given to the center of this great stock range. The hamlet is 18 miles southeast of Helena, at the point where the water of the creek is diverted into the two French Bar ditches. The name Beavertown is also applied to this settlement, and under this name the census enumerator credited the place with a population of 14 in 1880. The discovery of lodes at this point and in the Park during the years 1878–9, added to the advances made in mining, will doubtless lead to the development of this district. The commercial community is made up as follows:—M. M. Brooks, carpenter; Crahn & Marks, sawmill; Hanlay Bros., sawmill; C. Reynolds, hotel; Tuckes & McPherson, hotel; J. W. Shoffs, meat market; W. H. Ridgeway, blacksmith; John Robinson, wagonmaker, and J. N. Kelly, postmaster.

Cataract.—In June, 1862, a month after the discovery of the Bannack placer mines, the Old Bar near the mouth of Cataract creek was discovered. The prospectors worked the Old Bar until their provisions were exhausted, when they fled to Bannack. Subsequently this claim passed into the hands of the Stuarts and Reece Anderson, who erected their houses at the mouth of the creek, and resided there with their families while working the placers. In 1864 the McIrwin Brothers found rich ore 2½ miles above the mouth of the creek, but owing to the difficulty of working quartz at that time, they abandoned the location. Zach. Thompson's Company discovered the Big Medicine, the Susie Brown and Mt. Thompson leads in 1873. The Mantle lode was struck by Smith in 1879, and now belongs to S. T. Hauser. Brown and Hathaway sold the Boulder Prospect to Lawson and Allport in 1880. The numerous mines of this district now worked have been opened since 1880, and are among the leading industries of the Territory. The population of Cataract and Basin in 1880 was 99.

Basin City, the rival of the town of Cataract, was founded by Lawson & Allport, in 1880, at the mouth of Basin creek, a tributary of Boulder river. Among the mines of the district are the Mantle, Boulder, Custer, Independence, Martin Maginnis, Rock of Ages, Nabob, Boston, Big Medicine, Susie Brown, Mohawk, Mount Thompson, Captain Cook, Mountain Chief, Custer, Saginaw, Katie, Silver Butte, Union, Clipper, Highland, Gib, and others. Basin City was once a camp of enterprise, and had its full share in contributing to the building up of the Territory. Owing to new and more easily worked mines being discovered, Basin was left over, as it were, for the era of new development, new machinery and increased production. That it will eclipse its olden greatness is only a matter of a short time. The business circle is made up as follows: Thomas Bassett and Truman Hopkins, liquors; Amos Calvin, hotel; T. F. Murray, general merchant; D. D. Jackson, postmaster. The gold and silver ore mills at this mining point are worked.

Mitchell Gulch.—The first pay dirt was discovered at Mitchell's gulch, near Helena, on June 12, 1865, by J. J. Doyle, who was associated with J. F. Mitchell. Mr. Mitchell was at Helena the day it was discovered, but being the older man, Doyle named the place in his honor. Doyle was working on quartz at the time, but the gravel looking fair, he thought he would try it, and, doing so, picked out nine dollars that afternoon. There were as many as seventy men working in the gulch during the spring of 1866. The first death took place in the spring of 1870, when a man was shot in a miner's quarrel. Mr. Mitchell now resides in Java. The gold was discovered by Mr. Doyle directly opposite his present house in the gulch.

Parnell, now known as Weber, forty-eight miles southeast of Helena, on the Boulder, is one of the modern settlements of the county, claiming a population of about seventy. The business circle is made up as follows: George Beemes, miner; J. Brady, stock and grain; C. Clark, grain and stock; T. Dawson, grain and stock; R. Dunn, grain and stock; J. Hagen, grain and stock; Olof Larson, grain and stock; Henry McCauley, grain and stock; William Mulvey, grain and stock; A. C. Quaintance, grain and stock; H. Ryan, grain and stock; Wm. Ryan, grain and stock; Con. Schmit, grain and stock; J. Schmit, blacksmith; J. Shay, farmer and stock; R. Swarbrick, mason; M. W. Weber, miner and postmaster; Patrick Wickham, farmer and stock. At this point a church society and school are supported. Manufacturing industry is represented by a steam saw mill.

Woodville, or Elk Park, nine miles north of Butte City, is a modern settlement (1883). Here Thomas Wright is postmaster and general merchant; W. J. Ward, hotel and general storekeeper; Wm. Noonan, justice of the peace; Louis Lawrence, Noonan & Gregory, blacksmiths; James McGee, hotel; W. Parsons, lumber and wood; Wm. Givens, wheelwright; C. L. Harris, A. Than, meats; D. E. Smith, saloon; Mrs. A. Than, barber. The population is estimated at about 170.

Gregory, twenty-four miles southwest of Helena, on the Prickly Pear, is an old mining settlement, now ranking as a postal town. D. Freyler & Son conduct a general store at this point; T. Cullivan and Thomas & Renshaw, saloons; and Mentrum & Britt, the Gregory hotel. The estimated population is sixty.

Highland Gulch was discovered July 25, 1866, and the Highland Gold Co.'s mine started November 1, 1868. Cooley's gulch was discovered September 4, 1866.

Comet is the name of a settlement of 1869, twenty-eight miles south of Helena, just west of Wickes. J. T. Parkison is postmaster. The district is credited with a population of about 300. The works at Wickes, Comet and Gregory have not only added to the wealth and population of Jefferson county, but have also given a strong impetus to prospecting.

MINES.

The Helena Mining and Reduction Co. organized in 1883, purchased the Alta Montana Co.'s property, subject to $250,000 liens and mortgages; and with Mr. Seligman, of the Gregory mine, made the proposition to the Northern Pacific railroad company, which resulted in completing the Helena and Wickes railroad, in December, 1883. In September, 1883, John Longmaid, and John W. Buskirk were appointed superintendent and secretary respectively. Since assuming control of this immense property, the company rebuilt the entire works, costing $190,667; have increased the daily capacity of the 6-calciners from 25 tons to 8-calciners with 60 tons capacity. The "2" smelters from 40 tons capacity to 80 tons. Rebuilt the 15-stamp mill and increased it to 25 stamps, and added two new boilers. Rebuilt the Comet concentrator, and increased it from 35 tons to 120 tons. Built the Alta concentrator, 150 tons capacity, giving a daily concentrating capacity of 270 tons; built six charcoal kilns of 25,000 bushels per month capacity; built $5,000 worth of track in and about the works, and completed two miles of wire tramway; increased the water supply by laying pipe and adding pumps and tanks. The various additions and improvements have not only increased the size and capacity of the works, but resulted in reducing the cost per ton of treating the ores from 30 to 50 per cent. They have produced 2,015 tons of bullion, 15 tons of mill retort, 300 tons of matte, and shipped 1,453 tons of concentrates. (Balance, over 9,000 tons, were smelted), making a total gross value of $941,033. They have mined out of the Comet mine, 21,000 tons; Alta, 13,000, making 34,000 tons taken out of the mines; Rumley, 4,197 tons; North Pacific, 319 tons; Custer, 110 tons. The company is incorporated with a capital stock of $3,000,000 in $10 shares. In December, 1884, and January, 1885, dividends summing up $72,000 were declared. S. T. Hauser is president.

Alta Montana Mining Co. (former owners of the H. M. & R. Co. property) expended and lost over $500,000 in an effort to develop the Alta and Comet lodes. In 1882 the mill produced $64,113.56 in fine silver, and $325,000 in lead bullion; but notwithstanding this, the want of railroad conveniences, destruction of their mills, and other causes, led to the downfall of this enterprising firm, and the sale of their property at New York, in 1883, to the Helena Mining and Reduction Co., for $250,000. This company, with a railroad from the works to the main line of the Northern Pacific railroad at Helena, new machinery, etc., etc., have reached the true method of development. At the Comet mine the shaft is being widened for a three-compartment shaft and larger hoisting works introduced. The new two-mile long endless wire tramway, put up last fall at a cost of $25,000, is working well, delivering 60 tons of ore daily from the Comet concentrator and Rumley mine. It could deliver 200 tons every ten hours, if required.

Gregory Consolidated mines and works, twenty-three miles southwest of Helena, are operated by a company of which H. W. Childs, of Helena, is general manager, and Jesse W. Lilienthal, of New York, president. The capital stock of $3,000,000 is in 300,000 shares of $10 each. There are two shafts of 1,000 feet apart, each about 700 feet deep. The low grade ore, mainly produced, dresses 35 per cent. lead, $20 gold, and from 40 to 150 ounces in silver. The pay ore vein varies from 6 to 14 feet in depth between granite walls. In the smelting works are reverberatory furnaces, through which the concentrates are put and then reduced to bullion assaying out $350 per ton. In June, 1885, the work of progress was carried on—new hoisting works are going up. A 175-horse-power engine is on the ground, and two boilers are already in position for operating a new 600-foot three-compartment shaft, lately contracted for at $20 per foot. Three levels are being run from the old workings, and the new shaft pushed to completion from below, as well as above.

Elkhorn Mining Company, capital stock $500,000, monthly dividends of $5,000, is the property of citizens of Helena. A. M. Holter is president; C. L. Vawter, secretary and manager, and George O. Kilbourne, superintendent. A 400 feet incline shaft, with levels 150 feet long, mark the plan of the mine. The pay ore vein is from 6 to 16 feet wide, producing 25 tons of ore daily, or $25,000 per month—the bullion being 700 fine silver, with a little gold and copper alloy. Up to a year ago the old 5-stamp mill, which produced $4,285.03 in silver during the year 1882, was converted into a 10-stamp mill. While writing it is reported that a marvelously rich strike was made in the 500-foot level of the Elkhorn, and A. M. Holter says there is not enough money in Montana to buy the mine now.

In the following review the leading mines of the county, outside the greater mining enterprises, are noticed: Eureka, the property of A. M. Esler & Co., a few hundred feet west of the H. M. & R. Co.'s works, has a shaft of 200 feet deep, and a tunnel on the vein 500 feet in length. The vein is one and one-half to two feet in width, carrying smelting and concentrating silver ore, some of which assays well up in the hundreds of ounces per ton. Rocky Bar joins the Eureka on the north, has a shaft 50 feet deep and a tunnel 450 feet, 250 feet of which is on the vein, which is four feet wide, carrying silver ore, some of which assays from 50 to 300 ounces per ton. Owned by Wilson & Co. Relief, located a quarter of a mile northeast of the Elkhorn mill, is a recent discovery, has a shaft 20 feet deep. Vein 12 feet wide, improving in depth both in width and quality. Carrying siver ore which gives assays of 50 to 100 ounces silver per ton. Owners, Spraggins & Crum. Homestake is about three-quarters of a mile northwest from the Elkhorn mill, has a shaft 45 feet in depth. Vein four feet wide; ore assays up to 200 ounces per ton. Owners, M. Murphy & Co. Union, about a mile northwest from Elkhorn mill; shaft 80 feet, tunnel 240 feet; both well timbered. Ore yield assays from 80 to 350 ounces per ton. Owners, Hahn & Jamieson. Paymaster, located about 400 yards north of the Elkhorn mill, has two shafts 20 feet deep. Vein four to five feet in slate and dolomite. Ore assays as high as 125 ounces silver per ton and 35 per cent. lead. Owned by Hahn & Jamieson. C. & D., about a mile northeast of the Elkhorn mill; shaft 40 feet in depth, with a tunnel 38 feet. Vein 12 feet wide in a limestone formation; yields concentrating ores, and some assaying up to 125 ounces silver per ton. Owned by F. W. Crum & Co. Dunston, about 600 yards northeast of the Elkhorn mill, on the east hillside; shaft now 38 feet in depth. Vein five feet wide; improving in depth both as to width and quality. Hanging and foot walls in dolomite. Concentrating ore, some assaying up to 200 ounces silver. Owners, Dunston & Crum. James R. Keene, about 300 yards north of the Elkhorn mill, adjoining the "A. M. Holter," has a shaft 90 feet deep, with a drift 42 feet in length. Yielding ores that give high assays of both gold and silver. Hanging wall slate, foot wall dolomite. Owned by Jamieson & Nicholson. Monte Christo, about 1,000 yards west of the Elkhorn mill; shaft 46 feet deep. Vein 10 feet wide in slate and granite formation. Ore carries 35 to 40 per cent. copper. Owned by Spraggins & Morrow. Sophia, adjoining the Elkhorn mine on the southwest; two shafts, 35 and 18 feet. Width of vein 15 feet, in dolomite; concentrating and milling ore, some assaying 50 to 90 ounces silver per ton. Owners, Whitlach, Bright & Co. J. H. Shoeber, joining the A. M. Holter lode on the south; shaft 50 feet deep, with an incline from same 50 feet deeper to intersect the vein, which is three feet wide. Ore carries both gold and silver. Vein in slate and dolomite. Owned by T. T. Nicholson. Mountain View, about a mile and a half north of the Elkhorn mill, has a tunnel run 30 feet on the vein, but no shaft. Width of vein 3½ feet. Some of the ore carries 75 to 80 ounces silver and 32 to 40 per cent. lead. Vein in slate and syenite. Owned by Peter Thompson. Luxemburg, about half a mile south of the Elkhorn mill; shaft 35 feet. Vein six feet wide, in granite. Ore carries gold, silver, copper and lead, some assays showing as high as $600 to $800 in gold. Owned by Scheyer & Co. Mohawk, on Cataract creek, about two miles from its mouth, has five shafts varying from fifteen to forty feet in depth, all showing the same character of ore. Vein in granite and eight feet wide. Ore carries silver and lead in paying quantities. Owned by Elder, Poor & Thompson. Maud Thompson, about two miles west of the Comet and Rumley mines, and supposed a continuation of the same. Two shafts fifty and twenty feet deep. Only one wall (granite) found so far. Drift run fifteen feet from foot-wall across vein. Ore assays 30 to 230 ounces silver per ton, and carries some gold. Owned by Thompson, Poor & Co. Minah, about a mile and a half northwest from Wickes. Three shafts 118, 65 and 35 feet deep, with drift from shaft to shaft. Vein in granite and five to six feet wide. Silver ore, also carrying considerable gold. Owned by C. Merriman & Co. Solo, Monte Christo and Standard lodes are situated on Valparaiso Mountain, in an easterly direction from the Banner and Gregory mines. They carry silver, lead and copper, with some gold, and are developed by tunnels run to the vein, which they cut at depths varying from 150 to 500 feet; also by shafts, varying from 12 to 50 feet in depth. The country rock is porphyry, granite and quartzite. Assays have been got from some of the ore as high as $1,600 in silver, and as high as $21 in gold, while the lead ores run as high as 54 per cent. Owned by C. Y. Anderson. Washington, located about eight miles southeast of Helena, to the north of the mouth of Lump creek, and shows a vein of ore about four feet wide bearing galena and silver. This ore is worth about $100 per ton. The vein is opened for a distance of about 9,000 feet. The Tycoon, one of the locations on this vein, shows about six feet wide at the bottom of a 40 foot shaft. The Hennepin, Glasgow and Liverpool are all locations on the same vein, all showing ore with pay from $60 to $400 per ton. Timber and water are plenty and convenient, and the vein, crosses the Helena and Jefferson county branch of the N. P. R. R. Beaver Creek. These mines are located about three miles east of Beaver creek, and about the same distance south of the Northern Pacific Railroad. The ore is an iron-stained quartz, carrying free gold in good paying quantities. The vein is opened to the depth of 350 feet, and there is over 1,000 tons of ore on the dump. To the northwest of this mine, about 2,000 feet, is a vein about five feet in width, carrying carbonates of lead and silver, which is opened for several thousand feet, on which are the Cleveland, Freeman and other locations. W. T. McClintock is the owner of the Iron Age, and also of the Eclipse and Aurora. The Bald Mountain District is in the northwestern corner of Jefferson county, and is the source of Basin and Cataract creeks, which flow southerly into the Boulder river; also of Clancy and Lump creeks, which flow easterly into Prickly Pear; also Ten Mile creek, flowing northerly. This district is about ten miles west of the Gregory mine and works. The principal quartz veins in it, commencing at the north of Bald Mountain, is the Little Jennie, from which large shipments of ore have been made abroad, some of it yielding as high as $1,100 per ton. The ore contains galena, zinc and gray copper, and the width of the vein between the walls is in some places, where it has been cross-cut, over 30 feet. In 1882 C. E. Kemp and James H. Conley had the Highland mine worked. To the eastward, about one-half mile, is the General Garfield lode, the ore of which contains gold and iron pyrites. At the surface there are several thousand tons of free milling ore, mostly low grade. Further up, near the summit of the mountain, is the Lucky Jim lode, carrying gold. Some of this ore is very rich, assaying as high as $20,000 to the ton. About 80 feet from this vein, and running nearly parallel with it, is a silver vein of comparatively low grade ore. Both of these are strong, from 5 to 10 feet in width. Passing to the east side of the mountain, at the head of Cataract creek, is the Climax lode, a gold bearing vein about three feet in width, carrying rich ore. In 1882 Mr. Naye erected the gold mill on the Amazon property. About 1,000 feet southerly is the Buckeye lode, carrying both gold and silver. The vein is from five to six feet wide, the ore containing about $100 per ton. In 1882 C. K. Riale made a 100 feet shaft here. On the south side of the mountain is the Sabine, Silver Gray and Little Etta, all containing good concentrating ore, and showing beds from 4 to 10 feet wide. The Athens and Corinth claims, two miles east of the summit of Bald mountain, show rich leads about five feet wide. East of this is the Argentine mine with a lead seven feet wide, carrying arsenical iron and galena, with both gold and silver.

The Clancy Creek Mining Company, with a capital stock of $2,500,000, in shares of $25 each, was organized early in 1884. Incorporators:—Samuel H. Baker, W. H. Eastman, Samuel P. Snyder, of Minneapolis, A. J. Wrampler, of St. Paul, and T. G. Merrill, of Helena. The Bald Mountain Mining Company, with a capital stock of $2,500,000, non-assessable, was organized in the spring of 1884. The incorporators are:—R. S. Inness, R. D. Russell, George P. Kirkbride and Samuel P. Snyder, of Minneapolis, and T. G. Merrill, of Helena. The Crown Point Mining Company, with a capital stock of $2,500,000, was organized in 1884. The incorporators are:—Robert S. Inness, Alex. J. Trimble, S. P. Snyder, of Minneapolis, and T. G. Merrill, of Helena.

Cataract district is situated almost north of Basin City along the Cataract creek, which flows into the Boulder at this point. The district is full of quartz discoveries. The majority of them, however, are undeveloped, except by such annual work as was required in representing. Some of the properties on which considerable development has been done, show good bodies of pay ore. The Boulder district include the mines at the head of Boulder valley, those surrounding the upper Boulder basin, and those of the Cataract district. With the exception of the Amazon works, this section is without means for working its ores or even concentrating them. The mines include both milling and smelting silver-bearing ore and also gold-bearing ore. There are besides several gulches, which have been worked profitably for placer gold. The quartz mines are situated in the various ranges surrounding on three sides the valley in which Boulder City is situated.

This small old county of Montana embraces within its boundaries as much mineral wealth as any district of the same area in the known world. Though in the heart of the old settlements of the Territory, there are many sections of it which may be classed as inaccessible, and for this reason, its development has been postponed. In the near future new men and new enterprises will come to draw forth all its resources.

CHAPTER XXV.

LEWIS AND CLARKE COUNTY.

THIS division of the Territory was named in honor of Lewis and Clarke (the first explorers of this region after it fell into the possession of the United States), by Governor Edgerton. The beginning of settlement dates back to 1862–3, when the Prickly Pear Bars were discovered by Hurlburt August 18, 1862, and the placer miners found the golden treasures of Silver Creek, which last discovery led in a few months to the building up of Silver City, the first seat of justice of the county. There Constans & Jurgens opened their store about the time settlement showed signs of permanency, April 1, 1864. On the discovery of the richer placers along Silver Creek, May 1, 1864, other traders came in, so that before Last Chance was organized, the little village of Silver City was the political and commercial centre of Lewis and Clarke county.

The county was organized under authority of an act passed by the first legislature, and approved February 2, 1865. All that portion of the territory lying within the following boundaries was set off as a separate district, to be known as Edgerton county, viz.:—Commencing at the northeast corner of Jefferson county, on the Missouri river; thence down said Missouri river to the mouth of Sun river; thence up said Sun river to the eastern boundary of Deer Lodge county; thence south along the eastern boundary of Deer Lodge county to the northern boundary line of Jefferson county; thence easterly along said boundary line to the place of beginning. Changes have recently been made, references to which are found in the history of Deer Lodge. The county seat was located at Silver City. The Board of Commissioners was appointed by the Governor, and under the supervision of this Board the first elections were held. The first record is dated Silver City, Monday, February 27, 1865, and is a mere notice of the organization of the Board. The following is a copy:—

"Pursuant to agreement and legal notice, the Board of County Commissioners met at the storeroom of Jacob Smith, in Silver City, Edgerton county, Montana Territory, to hold a special meeting of the Board. There were present, Commissioners John W. Rhodes and A. J. Wells. The oath of office of said Commissioners was administered by J. B. Stewart, Judge of Probate of said county. A. J. Wells was chosen chairman of the Board. Malcolm Clark was not present. On motion, N. Hilger (who had been appointed by H. H. Eastman, County Recorder, as his deputy) was appointed clerk of the Board, and also qualified before J. B. Stewart aforesaid."

The first election was held at Helena and Silver City, October 1864, when a total vote of about 200 was polled, made up principally of men who came in Capt. Fisk's and T. A. Holmes' party, the latter part of September. The vote was decidedly republican. At Silver City the vote was democratic. The record of elections from 1865 to 1884 is given in the following pages:—

ELECTIONS.

The officers for 1882-3 are named in the following list: W. L. Milligan, J. J. Ellis and D. H. Cuthbert, county commissioners; S. C. Gilpatrick, sheriff; H. H. Guthrie, assessor; W. K. Roberts, treasurer; Miss Helen P. Clark, superintendent of schools; F. P. Sterling, probate judge; O. B. Totten, county clerk and recorder; W. L. Steele, coroner; B. F. Marsh, county surveyor. The vote recorded in November, 1882, for delegate to congress, in this county varies largely from that for county officials. In the first case A. C. Botkin received a decided majority over his democratic opponent, Delegate Maginnis; while in the second, the democratic county officials received majorities. Following is the vote given in the congressional election of 1882: M. Maginnis, D., 1,058; A. C. Botkin, R., 1,444; total vote, 2,502.

Year.	Total Assessment.	Total Tax.
1878	2,916,275	16,042 37
1879	3,040,285	17,220 12
1880	3,354,825	20,046 30
1881	3,709,387	14,821 00
1882	4,504,187	15,857 98
1883	6,588,551

The tax-list for 1884–5 shows that the total assessment is $6,991,860, an excess of $453,309 over last year. Below is a list of the property, with the number and value of each class:

Acres land	54,593	$609,580	Wagons	1,271	77,718
Improvements		243,915	Money		736,910
Town lots	4,766	1,364,995	Credits		96,925
Improvements		1,099,780	Watches	417	14,995
Merchandise		736,600	Clocks	81	455
Manufactures		43,150	Pieces jewelry	218	21,220
Sheep	27,297	74,870	Musical instruments	177	20,615
Horses	8,364	336,995	Household furniture		47,570
Mules	225	11,950	Stocks		848,860
Cows and stock cattle	14,690	346,142	Harness		21,180
Oxen	205	8,955	Other property		217,010
Hogs	1,155	9,340

The supplemental list, which is yet to be made out, will, it is expected, increase the total to $8,000,000—an increase for the year of about a million and a half of dollars.

In 1881 there were twenty-nine mines in operation which produced gold and silver valued at a half million of dollars, against $156,781 in 1880. The valuation for 1881 includes the baser metals extracted. In 1882 the gold and silver product was valued at $425,000. The increase in the value of ore product in 1883 was estimated at 50 per cent, and in 1884 a point over the increase of 1883.

Court House.—Under the act to provide for the building of a new court-house, bonds to the amount of $150,000 were authorized. In April, 1885, the property on Broadway was condemned, the sum awarded to the owner, Mr. Ryan, being $9,000. Opposite on Ewing street is the Cavanaugh property, which is also condemned. The new building is to be erected immediately south of the present court-house, is to have a north front overlooking the valley, with entrances both on the north and south sides. The old court-house will be left standing until the new one is completed, when it will be torn down. A reference to this old building will be found in the history of Helena.

Schools.—The annual report of the superintendent of county schools for 1882 shows the condition of schools at the beginning of 1883 to be as follows: Number of organized districts, 16; number of white persons between 4 and 21, 1,638; number of African descent, 4 to 21, 19; number of pupils attending school during the year, 927; number attending private school, 90; number not attending school, 638; number of male teachers employed, 7; number of female teachers employed, 22; total number of teachers, 29; average length of school in days, 113; number of brick school-houses, 3; number of frame school houses, 6; number of log school-houses, 4; number of graded schools, 1; number of ungraded schools, 15; total number of schools, 16; rate of county tax for school purposes, in mills, 5; amount per capita of school census children $10.75; amount raised by county tax for schools, $17,612.37; total amount from all sources apportioned during year, 17,608.50. The increase in number of children of school age since 1883 is phenomenal; Helena alone showing a number almost equal to the whole number recorded in the report for 1882. The

"	9	Spokane	426 13
"	11	South Fork	1,129 74	Total			$21,043 71

District No. 10 is discontinued, and the $47.90 in the treasury belonging to that district was transferred to the general school fund.

Settlements.—Scattered throughout the county are a number of small settlements. The camps and settlements of Dry Gulch, Tucker, Holmes, Oro Fino, are almost cotemporary with Helena. Nelson was discovered on Christmas day, 1864. It is fair to presume that there was a large number of other settlers in 1864–5 who scattered themselves about in different parts of the county. Some of them, perhaps, are still living on the lands upon which they filed their claims, which were perfected by deeds from Uncle Sam. And there is no doubt that many others, in a few years, when settlements got too thick for their notions of ease, comfort and freedom, sold out their possessions, "pulled up stakes," and moved on after the Indians. Others, again, no doubt, paid the debt of nature and found a last resting-place near the homes they founded in the wilderness. And thus, one by one, of those who were well known when they first came, dropped out of sight and out of memory, except the more prominent ones who were spared to make their mark in their respective neighborhoods, or write their names in the old settlers' record. It is not to be supposed that, in the absence of written records, every one who was here in 1865 can be identified and located by the few survivors of that period. It would be a remarkable memory that could do this—that could keep pace with the changes which twenty years bring in the history of any community, particularly in a pioneer community, many of whom are of a restless, roving, discontented nature. Together with the camps mentioned above are Grizzly Gulch, Blue Cloud gulch, Big Indian, Green Horn and Quartz gulches, Skelly's Bar, Jeff. Davis and Saint Louis gulches, Silver Creek, Ottaway, Trinity, Piegan, Canyon Creek and McClellan gulches, French and Prickly Pear Bars, including the gold quartz mines at Unionville and the Park, and the recent gold quartz mines of the Stemple district, in which are located the extensions of the celebrated Snow Drift. Mount Pleasant is the name given to the vicinity of the Blue Bird and Hickey lodes and Mt. Pleasant mine. The place is situate twenty-two miles from Helena. Park City claims its quartz mines since 1866, which have produced mineral valued at near $2,000,000. This settlement is five miles southwest of Helena via Oro Fino gulch. Silver City, twelve miles from Helena, on the Benton road, was the first seat of justice. Unionville, settled in 1866, is four miles south of Helena, the center of a rich mining district.

Jacob Fournais, said to be the first settler in Lewis and Clarke county, died in July, 1869, aged 134 years. He was working near Quebec when that citadel was assaulted by the troops under Wolfe: he was refused admission into General Jackson's division of the army during the occupation of Orleans, 1814, on account of being too old; although his record while with Lewis and Clarke's expedition, 1803–7, pointed out his utility. On returning north from New Orleans he entered the service of the Fur Company in the employ of Major Andrew Dripps, making Montana his home until 1833.

HELENA.

This city, the capital of the Territory, claims an age of little over twenty years, and is to-day a town approaching, in social forms, government and commerce, the larger cities of the old states. At the time of its first settlement the northern Pacific coast was young in the enterprises which have since built it up. The confines of civilization were then limited to the towns and settlements contiguous to the lakes on the west, and he who struck out for a home in the Territories was regarded as an adventurous soldier of fortune, whose return was a question of chance rather than probability. There was little to attract save the intrinsic merit of the location and surroundings, which, combined with the hopes of a future, were sufficient to direct the residents of southern and eastern States to this Territory. To those at home who were independent, the country furnished inducements that would enable men of means to add to their accumulations; to the imprudent or impoverished, pulling with steady stroke against the current of adversity, both pitiless and uncompromising, a hope for better days; to the speculator it afforded a field of operations incalculably valuable; to the scientist, an opportunity for discovery; to the scholar, the Christian and the husbandman, the occasion for labors that have since returned to bless their inventors. As a result of all this, the people who established themselves at Last Chance or Helena, and have been identified with its growth and the development of its wealth, are men of rare excellence—earnest, frank and kind, they make all men friends by being the friends of all men. And so, too, the pioneer women, those who braved the absence of home, friends and congenial associations to accompany their fathers, husbands and sons into the trackless waste of the northwest.

The discovery of Last Chance, in 1864, and the chain of circumstances which led to it, are related in the reminiscences of R. Stanley, contributed to the Herald, December 28, 1882.

"It was in the spring of 1864 that the Kootenai stampede from Alder gulch took place. During the winter extraordinary reports of the "big thing at Kootenai" reached the camps, and each particular miner not the happy possessor of ground in Alder gulch, was in a fever of excitement to reach the new Eldorado, the land of rushing torrents and large nuggets. Among these, allured by the northern will-o'-the wisp, were four miners—Cowan, Crab, Miller and Stanley—afterward known as the discoverers of Last Chance diggings, and at the time our story commences they were encamped in one of the valleys of the Hell Gate river, on the Kootenai trail. Encamped beside them was a certain Jim Coleman and party, whom they had that evening run against, bearing the unwelcome news that "Kootenai was played out," and that they were on their way back to Alder gulch. Still the idea of returning to Alder gulch with three months' flour and bacon in their pan-fleshes could not be entertained, and the advice of one of the party, who had crossed the range with Captain Fisk's party the previous summer, to try on the Little Blackfoot (where they had found gold in small quantities), and failing there, to cross the range and prospect the gulches on the eastern slope running toward the Missouri river, was readily accepted. Next morning, bidding Coleman's party farewell, they took their course eastward up the Hell Gate river. They were accompanied on the start by an individual named Moore, who left the party to join some friends prospecting on Silver Creek, before the discovery of Last Chance was made. They tried the Little Blackfoot well, but could find nothing better than a good color. Following up the stream through an amphitheatre of circling mountains, they turned southward up the stream, and as they began to rise rapidly into the mountains, each vista that opened before them was a scene of loveliness, the river for some distance being a succession of magnificent cascades. Nearing the summit of the gulch the trail, which they had found so useful, became more and more indistinct, and eventually faded out altogether. The second day, not bringing relief, found the party rather demoralized, but still pegging away; but a few yards before them was all they could see, and the advisability of returning on their trail before they became further involved was more than once mooted. Fortunately toward evening the weather cleared up, and above the tops of the small pines by which they were enveloped, a rocky point was seen to tower, and toward this, when the camp was made, one of the travelers proceed to climb. The view that met his gaze from its rocky summit was one long to be remembered, and well repaid the exertions he had used to obtain it. It was like a pass into fairy land. Across the intervening mountain tops lay stretched a lovely valley, through which several streams were seen to wind, and away in the distance the blue mountains of another range were plainly visible, while between the course of an important river could be traced, which he rightly concluded was none other than the mighty Missouri itself. The good news greatly revived the spirits of the party, and banished the inclination to take the back trail through the detestable pine thickets; though some skepticism as to the whereabouts of the Missouri was still expressed, which the offer to bet a pony he could reach it in a day's journey from where they stood, soon put a stop to. Next morning the descent began; at first rather steep, but they soon found a game trail in a small gulch, which made traveling easy. The difficulties of crossing the range were over, and as fresh scenes of enchantment opened before them, they fully experienced the joy of those who tread the unknown and unexplored. Though the range had been crossed for years at other points not far distant, as far as white men were concerned, they claimed to be the first to have crossed it from the Little Blackfoot gulch. Game abounded on every hand, and was so unreasonably tame, as scarcely to offer decent sport in killing when required for food. Proceeding down the gulch, a stately elk bounded out, and stood at short range surveying the strange party who had thus been the first to invade his domain, necessitating a camp, in what the writer believes was called Seven-Mile gulch; at any rate it was the first gulch north of what was afterward known as Last Chance gulch. Here they remained prospecting for some time, but, like on the Little Blackfoot, they could find nothing more than a good color. Following down the gulch they descended into the valley of the Prickly Pear, and turning to the right they camped for dinner on the banks of Last Chance creek. The valley seemed literally a hunter's paradise: immense droves of antelope were feeding on the plain, and along the margin of the stream the white-tail deer were seen to be plentiful. On their first appearance in the valley, between Seven-Mile and Last Chance, they were reconnoitered by a small band of the former animals, which careered around them until their curiosity was cruelly satisfied by the crack of a rifle, which laid one of their number low. Dinner over, the travelers reclined under the shade of some small trees and discussed the situation, with the result that they would take their course northward along the range, and prospect the gulch, at the mouth of which they were encamped on their return, if nothing better turned up in the mountains. However, before saddling up, two of the party strolled to the creek side, just to try a superficial pan of dirt. Scratching a hole to the rim rock of a small bar, to their surprise a first-rate color was obtained, which induced them to make further and more systematic trials, but all ended in the same result—colors continually—until they began to think the whole country was nothing but colors, and, almost in vexation at their tantalizing luck, they decided to pack up and go. No discovery had yet been made in Last Chance gulch.

"Northward they went, digging holes innumerable—here, there and everywhere—but finding nothing to stick to. Up the Dearborn on to the head waters of the Teton and Maria's rivers, where they found an excellent prospect of grizzlies, but none of gold. The further northward they went the more unlikely it looked—flat, table-topped mountains, showing the action of water more than fire, took the place of the volcanic range they had lately crossed. Their stock of provisions was fast diminishing. With the exception of grizzlies game was very scarce, and the former they were not in search of. One of their friends the previous winter in Nevada camp, as he lay with his cheek bone torn out by the bite of a grizzly, had given them some good advice. 'Boys,' he said, 'I've not lost any grizzlies, and I ain't a hunting for them any more.' But, notwithstanding, the temptation to take a pot shot was too strong one day. The grizzly, almost the size of a two years' old elephant, was badly wounded, and made a charge within a stone's throw of the camp, greatly alarming the cook and his two companions. He was allowed to go on his way without any further molestation. Turning southward, as they took their course for Alder gulch, their daily remark was, 'That little gulch on the Prickly Pear is our last chance; if we don't find pay there we streak it straight for camp.' And so it became known as Last Chance gulch before the discovery was made. They reached the spot again one afternoon, on or about the 15th of July, and made their camp a short distance up the gulch, near to where the First National Bank was built in 1866. That evening they put two good holes down to the bed-rock, one on each side of the creek. When the rock was reached, the hole on the north side was found to prospect well. Several flat pieces of gold that would weigh quite half a dollar, were taken out; there was no mistake about it—the little nuggets fell into the ringing pan with a music particularly their own, a sound grateful to the ears of our four wanderers. The gravel prospected to the top of the ground, and they were experienced enough to know that at last Dame Fortune had kindly smiled upon them. Long into the night they sat around the fire, too pleased to turn in. Within each bosom had bloomed the hope of making the home-stake, and seeing friends and kindred once again; and when they slept it was to dream of civilization and of enjoying a good square meal."

In a letter to the New North-West, written in May, 1885, E. W. McNeal credits E. M. Dunphy, of this city, with being upon the ground where Helena now stands in September, 1862.

First Meeting at Last Chance.—At a meeting held on Last Chance Creek, July 20, 1864, the following laws and regulations were adopted:

"That the Gulch be named Last Chance Gulch, and the district, in which the discovery is made, be named Rattle Snake District, to extend down three miles, and up to the mouth of the cañon, and across from summit to summit. That mining claims in this district extend for two hundred feet up and down the gulch, and from summit to summit. That no person be allowed to hold more than one claim by pre-emption, and one by purchase, except as regards the discovery claims. That each member of the discovery party be entitled to hold, in addition to 200 feet by pre-emption, 100 feet for a discovery claim. That the discovery party shall have the prior right to the use of the gulch water. That claims, when pre-empted, be staked and recorded." The supplementary regulations adopted August 3, 1864, were: "That any person, besides his own claim, be allowed to record one for his actual partner, and one only, and that he can represent both; but if a partner be so recorded for, it must be specified, and the name given in full. That all claims must be recorded within three days of location." At a meeting held December 10, 1865, the following resolution was adopted: "That all claims in Rattle Snake District, Last Chance Gulch, be laid over from this date until April 15, 1866."

JOHN D. LUDWIG.

In July, 1864, mining was commenced on the bar, on the west side of the gulch, nearly opposite where Taylor & Thompson's store stood in 1867, and the five men who worked there made each a fortune of $50,000 in two years. The first cabin of one room was erected in the middle of September, 1864, in rear of the site of the St. Louis drug store, subsequently opened by John S. Cowan. The second cabin was built above it by Reginald (Bob) Stanley, and the third by G. J. Wood, where Gans & Klien built their stone warehouse. By October 1, 1864, there were five cabins in the town. About this time Capt. James L. Fisk's party or Minnesota train arrived in the Prickly Pear valley, also Capt. Holmes' party. Capt. G. J. Wood induced a number of both parties to stay at Last Chance, and many of those who went into the Prickly Pear returned shortly to this point. In October, 1864, the first election of members of the Legislature was held here, when 200 votes were cast. Capt. G. J. Wood discovered the minutes of the miners' meeting, held at Last Chance Gulch. October 30, 1864, Mr. Wood was chairman and T. E. Cooper secretary. Three commissioners—Capt. Wood, H. Bruce and C. L. Cutler—were chosen to lay out the town, and adopt rules respecting pre-emption and occupancy. During the following winter there were 115 cabins erected in the gulch, and in February, 1865, Scott's addition to the town plat was surveyed east of Main, north of Broadway, and extending beyond Rodney streets.

*Second Meeting.—A meeting was held within the cabin of Geo. J. Wood, October 30, 1864, for the purpose of appointing commissioners to lay out a town, as well as to adopt a name for the settlement. The light-hearted disposition of the meeting is evidenced by the propositions then made to name the location. Pumkinville, Squashtown, Tomahawk, Tomah, and sundry other mirth-provoking titles were suggested; but at length the name St. Helena was proposed by John Somerville, and to this and Tomah the meeting confined its attention, the proposition of Somerville, in its amended form, Helena, being carried by one or two votes. John Somerville is numbered among the dead; John Cowan, a native of Georgia, returned thither; but after a few years revisited the West, and was one of the pioneers of the Black Hills. D. J. Miller, a California miner of 1850 or 1851, was one of the four who discovered Last Chance. He went to Philadelphia with John Dempsey, and is now a citizen of Alabama. John Crab, the fourth of the party, sold his interest in Last Chance and took up a claim in Nelson Gulch, which proving unprofitable, he left for the East the following winter.

*The account of the naming of the city of Helena, as given by Thos. E. Cooper, of Grafton, Dakota, is as follows: "Thomas Cowan, from Georgia, in 1864, had a sluice, and was mining in Last Chance. On September 24, 1864, Mr. Cooper and company of prospectors and Captain Wood built a cabin, where the heart of the city now is. A meeting was called to organize the mining district, and John Somerville was chosen chairman, and Thomas E. Cooper secretary. The question of naming the town came up, and there being a great diversity of opinion as to the name the town should bear, and not being able to agree, the chairman, Somerville, got up and stated as follows: "That he belonged to the best country in the world, and lived in the best State in that country, and in the best county (Scott) of that State, and the best town (Helena) in that county, and by the eternal this town shall bear that name."—*Letter to J. HELENA

From Mr. Wellington E. Wood, who was one of the earliest settlers in the camp, who still lives among us, who, with his brother, Captain George J. Wood, erected the third cabin in the camp, which stood where the Independent office now stands, we have secured a copy of the minutes of the original meeting at which the town was named. There was a scarcity of writing materials in those days, and the minutes were only recorded in pencil in a blank book of Captain Wood. The meeting was held at the cabin of Mr. Wood and his father in-law, Orison Miles, of Bozeman. From each of these parties, and others who participated in that original meeting, the writer has heard the same story oft repeated, and the minutes of that meeting were made also by the writer hereof from what were the original documents. Though there is other matter besides that which pertains to the name alone, we will give the whole, for it will possess interest for other reasons:

"HELENA, October 30, 1864.

"At a meeting of the citizens of Last Chance gulch for the purpose of naming the town and electing commissioners, etc. On motion, G. J. Wood was elected chairman and T. E. Cooper, secretary. After several motions and balloting, the name of Helena was given to the town, and G. J. Wood, H. Bruce and C. L. Cutler were elected town commissioners, and ordered to lay out the town and get their pay for the work by recording the lots at two dollars each, the proceeds to go to the commissioners for their labor and trouble. They were further authorized to make such laws and regulations as may be deemed necessary, to regulate the location and size of lots, streets, alleys, etc. At a meeting of the commissioners it was decided that the lots should be thirty feet front by sixty feet deep, and that any person might preempt a lot by laying a foundation on the lot, which foundation should hold the lot ten days, and if a person record his lot at the time of laying the foundation, then the foundation should hold good for twenty days. And it was decided that if there were no improvements made on the lots at the expiration of the ten or twenty days, the lots should be jumpable; but all persons should record their lots. G. J. Wood was elected recorder of the town. All disputes to be settled by the commissioners or an arbitration, until civil law is established."*

As Mr. Wood informs us, there were present at the meeting all that the cabin would hold, probably thirty or more, among whom he gives the names of the following, who will all be remembered by the early settlers. Besides Messrs. Wood and Miles, already named, there were Abraham Mast, A. Peck, John Cowan, Robert Stanley, T. E. Cooper, C. L. Cutler, John Clore, Dr. Sales, John Somerville, H. Bruce, —— Folsom, ——Wilder, O. D. Keep, Scannell, now living in town, with others who came through in Captain Allensworth's train. It will be seen that the date when the meeting was held was October 30, 1864, at which time there were not a great many at the mines, which had only been first discovered by Cowan and Stanley in July. The Woods, who came across in Bridger's train that season, came here in September, and most of the other early residents came in from Minnesota, in the fall of 1864. At that time Silver City was already quite a settlement, and on the other side Montana City, of which only a single house survives, was the chief business center, where Constans & Jurgens had a store before starting the first one in Helena. In regard to the name "Helena," it will be seen that it was only adopted "after several motions and ballotings." It was proposed to call it after Cowan, Stanley and Wood, but neither proposition commanded a majority. Then it was that John Somerville proposed the name of Helena, and, as Mr. Wood remembers, told the company, among other things, that it meant "a place far in the interior of the country." At any rate, that was the time, place and manner that the name was selected, and upon the suggestion of John Somerville, a tall, hardy, jovial frontiersman, from Minnesota, who had his wife with him. On the discovery of Nelson gulch, he moved up there and lived until he returned to Minnesota. He was appointed by Governor Edgerton first treasurer of Edgerton county. In this connection, and as a historical fact worth preserving, it may be stated that W. E. Wood was the first person in the camp or in Edgerton county who received a commission as a legal officer. He was appointed notary public in 1864, and had some notarial stamps printed at Virginia City at a cost of $20 per hundred.

Helena Town-site.—In 1868-9 the important case of the entry of the town-site of Helena was before the United States Land Receiver. In this case fifteen Last Chance miners protested against the entry, and were represented by Judges Williams and Chadwick. The question was settled January 14, 1869, by Judge M. Truitt's judgment granting the right of entry, but protecting the rights of miners in the gulches. In November, 1869, the town-plat showed about 2,800 lots, of which 1,315 formed the total number filed upon, single and double. The city of Helena, it is well known, has been for many years without any established survey. The Wheaton survey being the only one of record has always been regarded as official, but as this was largely a paper survey no one has ever been able to find its monuments or locations, therefore the Legislature of 1883 enacted a law providing for a resurvey of Helena. The Board of County Commissioners accordingly let a contract to J. D. McIntyre, of this city, to make the survey, and from time to time, as the work progressed, the board approved parts of it until now there only remain two blocks to be approved.

In April, 1885, the cause of Richard Lockey, William A. Chessman, Silas H. Crounse, Edward M. Hoyt, Israel L. Israel, plaintiffs, versus the Board of County Commissioners of the county of Lewis and Clarke, composed of Francis Hope, David H. Cuthbert and John J. Ellis was heard before Judge Wade, who decreed that all acts and proceedings of the Board of County Commissioners, whereby the board has heretofore approved any plat or plats of what is known as the McIntyre survey of the townsite of Helena be set aside and the board directed to cancel all certificates of their approval of plats and each thereof. The board was also restrained from approving plats or issuing warrants in payment of the McIntyre survey, unless such survey be made to conform to the directions of the decree, and as near as possible to the respective rights of the owners of the townsite.

City Charter and Organizations.—The question of granting a city charter was defeated January 20, 1868. The charter under which the organization of Helena City was effected received the approval of the Executive February 22, 1881. The question of city government was submitted to the people of Helena March 7, 1881, when 620 votes were in favor of the establishment of a city government, and 262 votes contra. The first election under the charter was held April 4, 1881, with the following results: Mayor, John Kenna; Treasurer, R. C. Wallace; Police Magistrate, Joseph Davis; Aldermen, John Horsky, August Foller, Henry Klein, C. L. Vawter, Christian Kenck, W. H. Gebauer, August Weisenhorn, Anton M. Holter, John B. Sandford, John H. Ming.

The first regular meeting of the council was held April 14, 1881, when A. M. Holter was declared elected chairman, having received eight votes, while H. Klein received two votes. Cornelius Hedges received eight votes for City Clerk. William F. Wheeler received five votes and his election opposed by five members of the council. This tie vote was decided by the Mayor voting Yes. The election of L. F. Evans as Street Commissioner was carried in precisely the same manner as that of Col. Wheeler. The contest on the election of policeman resulted in the choice of William McCormick, who received seven votes. Captain Thomas Sullivan received two votes and James A. Thom five votes. In the latter case, which was a tie, the Mayor abstained from voting. James Hummel was elected night watchman by the casting vote of the Mayor; J. C. Johnston was chosen night watchman on a majority vote of four. The election of George B. Foote, City Surveyor and Engineer, was carried by a vote of eight ayes against two negative votes.

The election of April, 1882, resulted in the choice of E. W. Knight, mayor; W. D. Smith, police magistrate; Jacob Loeb, treasurer, assessor and collector. The aldermen elected were: C. A. Blackburn, C. L. Vawter, Charles D. Curtis, Moses Morris and Robert S. Hamilton; attorney and clerk, Massena Bullard; marshal and street commissioner, John C. Major; engineer, George B. Foote; board of health, William R. Bullard, Theodore H. Kleinschmidt, Thomas P. Fuller; wood measurer, Ed. Colston; chief fire marshals, James L. Davis, Charles D. Curtis; policeman, William McCormick; night watchmen, Milton Witter, George Boshaw, George W. Gibbs.

The elections of 1883 resulted as follows: For mayor, E. W. Knight, Dem., 345; T. H. Kleinschmidt, Rep., 699; majority, 354. For assessor and treasurer, H. H. Guthrie, Rep., 459; Jacob Loeb, Dem., 577; majority 118. For police magistrate, W. D. Smith, Dem., 452; John W. Eddy, Rep., 582; majority 130. John Horsky, Henry Klein, Homer Hewins, and C. K. Cole were elected aldermen. In the fifth ward there was a tie vote between Chas. M. Jeffries, Rep., and C. L. Payne, Dem. The latter was declared elected: Attorney and clerk, Massena Bullard; chief fire marshal, Chas. D. Curtis; marshal, Ross Deegan; street commissioner, John C. Major; policeman, Wm. McCormick; watchmen, Geo. W. Gibbs and Geo. Bashaw; engineer, W. W. De Lacey; wood measurers, Ed. Colston and H. Richter; board of health, W. R. Bullard, T. P. Fuller, and W. G. Bailey.

In 1884 the clerk and attorney, chief fire marshal, engineer, treasurer, were reelected, with mayor, Hundley; marshal, A. J. Weikert; police magistrate, L. N. Smith; street commissioner, L. F. Evans; board of health, Dr. Atchison; tower watchman, O. S. Hinds; aldermen, John Horsky, H. Hewins, James Sullivan, C. K. Cole, C. Muth, and H. Klein.

The elections of 1885 resulted as follows: Mayor, James Sullivan, Dem., 924 votes, T. H. Kleinschmidt, Rep., 922; treasurer and assessor, John S. M. Neill, Dem., 770, T. H. Clewell, Rep., 1071; magistrate, H. W. English, Dem., 1,152, R. Von Tobel, Rep., 690; aldermen, first ward, Charles A. DeWitt, Rep., 198, Joseph O'Neill, Dem., 182, DeWitt's majority 6; second ward, John R. Watson, Rep., 228, Tom Mackaness, Dem., 206, Watson's majority 22; third ward, P. J. Connor, Dem., 136, Henry Yergy, Rep., 133, Connor's majority 3; fourth ward, Shelton Duff, Dem., 196, W. W. Brown, Rep., 119, Duff's majority 77; fifth ward, W. J. Bickett, Dem., 138, Geo. E. Boos, Rep., 94, Bickett's majority 44; sixth ward, J. C. Stubbs, Dem., 19, L. T. Mead, Dem., 86, J. A. McDougald, Rep., 76, Thomas Dingnan, Rep., 66, Mead, Dem., and McDougald, Rep., elected.

A few of these members have borne a full part in the administration of citizen law, which gave to the Territory in early days a protection that the law was unable to afford. They were also known in the courts of early days. Esquire Orison Miles, who was the first to bear Governor Edgerton's commission as justice of the peace for Helena, in 1865, visited the city July 4, 1883. 'Squire Miles used to hold court in the cabin where he lived, cooked and slept, and many a celebrated case of those early booming times came under his judicial cognizance. As we understand it, the first formal trial under 'Squire Miles was over the jumping of a town lot. Neither the law nor evidence was very clear in those days, and while the 'Squire was endeavoring to reconcile law with evidence and the latter with itself, the litigants got together and gave the property in dispute to the lawyers, who sold it and divided the proceeds. It was this 'Squire who performed the first marriage ceremony at Helena, in joining a runaway couple from the Boulder Valley in the holy bands, May 4, 1865.

Government by Merchants.—From the establishment of the village of Helena to the organization of the city government the merchants and bankers of Helena directed local affairs, and indeed placed themselves at the head of every movement which gave promise of resulting beneficially to the entire Territory. The first meeting held by them was protective in its objects. It was held January 21, 1866, to consider the course to be pursued in the matter of the seizure and threatened confiscation of goods consigned to them. J. R. Upson presided, with E. B. Waterbury, secretary. The speakers were, T. E. Tutt, J. H. Shober, W. Chumasero, R. B. Parrott, E. W. Toole, C. B. Stephenson, J. S. Beggs, N. B. Warner and James King. On January 22, 1866, a still larger meeting was held, with C. B. Stephenson presiding, which was addressed by A. M. Wooffolk, Colonel Vinton, W. Y. Pemberton, J. F. Shober and T. E. Tutt. Resolutions were adopted protesting against resisting the revenue law as interpreted by Mr. Langford; but approving of an appeal to Judge Munson for the return of goods seized, the consignees giving bonds to be responsible. At the desire of the merchants the wholesale markets were published weekly—the first list being corrected every week by Gaston, Simpson & Co., and money markets by Allen & Millard in 1866.

HELENA CITY, March 17, 1866.

We have no material change to note this week in money matters. Gold in New York was declining last advices, quoted March 2, $1.35. We quote to-day:

Gold coin buying at 120 for currency.

Gold coin buying at 5 per cent premium for gold dust.

Treasury notes and exchange selling for dust at 85 to 90 cents, according to quality of dust.

Currency exchange on New York selling at 3 per cent premium.

Coin exchange on New York selling at 6 per ct. prem.

Coin exchange on San Francisco selling at 5 per cent premium.

Currency exchange on Salt Lake and Denver at 5 per cent premium.

Gold dust buying for treasury notes and treasury note exchange at $20 to $21 per oz.

Cold dust buying for coin and coin exchange at $15 to $16 per oz., according to quality of dust.

Drafts on Europe 10 per cent premium, payable in coin.

All transactions are understood to be in strictly clean bankable gold dust, unless otherwise specified.

In the latter part of 1866 the value attached to gold dust varied so much that great dissatisfaction existed. Meetings were held to determine values, and in February, 1867, a decisive stand was made by the mercantile body, and the following preamble and resolutions adopted:

Whereas, At a meeting of the citizens of Helena at the court house, held on Monday, the 11th day of February, 1867, for the purpose of considering the necessity of fixing a value upon certain gold dust now circulating in the community at a value of eighteen dollars per ounce, and which is worth much less than said value, the undersigned were appointed a committee to consider the matter, and were instructed to report at an adjourned meeting of the citizens, to be held at the court house in Helena, on Monday evening, February 18, 1867. Now, therefore, we the undersigned committeemen do make this our report, and move the adoption of the same: Resolved, That the article of dust known as first quality mill retort, be received and paid out by this community at a value of sixteen (16) dollars per ounce. Resolved, That the article of dust known as Silver Bow dust be received and paid out by this community at the value of sixteen (16) dollars per ounce. Resolved, That clean gulch gold dust, free from rock and sand, and other impurities, be received and paid out as heretofore, at eighteen (18) dollars per ounce, save and excepting Silver Bow and Boise dust. Resolved, That all gold dust received or paid out by this community shall be free from rock, black sand and other impurities to be of the value above mentioned. Resolved, That this agreement shall take effect on and after the first day of March, 1867. Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by this meeting to secure the signatures of the business men, and others of this community, to these resolutions. From such meetings sprang the Board of Trade, a society which virtually governed Helena for years, and whose voice is still powerful in municipal affairs.

Board of Trade.—The organization of the Board in 1877, at a time when all the country east of the Rocky mountains, from the great lakes to the Gulf of Mexico was plunged in all the miseries which the panic entailed, forms a testimonial to the natural self-supporting power and confidence which belong to the city. Major Walker, secretary of the Board since organization, published a historical sketch in the annual report for 1878, of which the following is a summary:

The first meeting held for the purpose of organizing a Board of Trade was that of November 17, 1877, under a call issued by twenty-two citizens.

At this meeting the Helena Board of Trade was organized, with H. M. Parchen, president; C. W. Cannon, vice-president; Geo. W. Fox, treasurer, and Major Robert C. Walker, secretary. The names of directors appointed at this meeting are embraced in the above list, an asterisk denoting the names. The first important business transacted by the Board was the adoption of a protest against the heavy tax imposed by government officials for timber or wood cut in the Territory. On December 6, a telegram of two hundred and thirty-eight words was addressed to the Secretary of the Interior, through delegate Maginnis, giving expression to this protest. On the 7th a circular letter was mailed to Boards of Trade and Commerce throughout the country suggesting an exchange of reports, documents, etc., etc. On January 4, 1878, measures were first taken to build a wagon road between Butte and Helena. On the same date the remonstrance against the wood and timber tax was published. This remonstrance was published in the Congressional Record as part of the proceedings of the United States' Senate, and was embodied and became a part of the speech of the Hon. James G. Blaine when indorsing the action of the people of Montana and pleading in their behalf. Correspondence with Jay Gould, president of the Utah and Northern railroad, ordered January 18, 1878. Nick Kessler and John C. Curtin, directors, resigned January 18, 1878. Photo-engraved map with relative distances of Helena to the other towns, forts and camps in the Territory ordered January 18, 1878. Monster remonstrance, eighty feet in length, sent by registered package to Congress February 14, 1878. Preamble and resolutions sent to Congress relative to the Northern Pacific railroad February 15, 1878. Committee appointed to confer with the President of the United States Associated Press February 15, 1878. Executive Committee, consisting of the officers and five directors, elected April 5, 1878. Resolution to ascertain the cost of twenty acres of land adjoining the present town site, to be used for college purposes, and to become an addition to Helena, adopted April 5, 1878. Authority for the Board of Trade, through its secretary, to send Associated Press dispatches, obtained April 19, 1878. Action of the Executive Committee relative to the Helena Assay Office in the bullion certificate bill, pending in Congress, telegraphed to Hon. Martin Maginnis April 10, 1878. First report of route viewed for the Butte road made by E. M. Hoyt May 9, 1878. First telegram by the Board sent to the Associated Press May 9, 1878. Committee to confer with the Western Union Telegraph Company appointed June 20, 1878. Committee to prepare matter for a circular letter, and have it printed with a map of Montana, appointed June 20, 1878. Matter of circular letter approved and ordered printed July 5, 1878. Four hundred and eighty copies of this letter and accompanying map were printed for the use of the members, and for exchange with other Boards. Auditor appointed July 5, 1878. Secretary's report of warrants drawn to June 30, 1878, and Treasurer's disbursements to same date made July 5, 1878. Contract between the Executive Committee of the Helena Board of Trade and L. M. Black for the construction of the Butte road entered into July 15, 878. Consideration, $2,700. Committee to confer with the Postoffice Department relative to the delays and irregularity of the mails at the railroad terminus and en route by overland stage appointed July 5, 1878. Treasurer's certificates of membership authorized July 5, 1878. Committee appointed to send aid to the sufferers from yellow fever in the South reported $380 sent by telegraph

*First Directors of the Board.

September 7, 1878. Committee on the subject of artesian wells appointed October 4, 1878. On November 1, a notice was received from the contractor, L. M. Black, that the Butte road was completed according to conditions, and was ready for acceptance by the Board. Thus in less than ten months from the time of its first projection (January 4, 1878), the Butte road, by a short and practicable route between the two largest towns in the Territory, over which general travel by stage and freight teams has commenced, has been completed, at a cost of over five thousand dollars, under the auspices of this Board and by liberal contributions of money from the citizens of Helena, Butte and Benton. Such was the work accomplished by this mercantile society in one year. The officers of the Board from 1879 to 1884 are named in the following list:

In 1879, A. J. Davidson, president; W. S. Paynter, vice-president; T. H. Kleinschmidt, treasurer, and Major R. C. Walker, secretary. These gentlemen were re-elected in 1880, and again in 1881. In 1882 Abram Sands was elected president, and A. M. Holter, vice-president. The treasurer and secretary were re-elected. In 1883 A. J. Davidson was elected president, and A. M. Holter, vice-president, with the same treasurer and secretary. The officers for 1884–5 are: A. J. Davidson, president; A. M. Holter, vice-president; T. H. Kleinschmidt, treasurer; Robert C. Walker, secretary; T. C. Power, R. C. Wallace, John M. Sweeney, Henry Klein, H. M. Parchen, John R. Watson, E. M. Hoyt, C. W. Cannon, Richard Lockey, Charles D. Curtis, Samuel T. Hauser, John B. Sanford, D. W. Fisk, E. W. Knight, E. D. Edgerton, Aaron Hershfield, Charles F. Ellis, Eben Sharpe, C. A. Broadwater, John B. Wilson and Louis Stadtler, directors.

The Montana Club is an incorporated association, whose entire management is under the direction of nine managers. The first regular election was held April 13, 1885, and the managers were elected as follows: A. J. Davidson, president; John S. Tooker, first vice-president; Joseph P. Woolman, second vice-president; George H. Hill, treasurer; James B. Wells, secretary; E. D. Weed, A. F. Foote, A. J. Seligman and A. J. Fisk. The original membership numbers over 100. The elegant quarters of the club in the Parchen Block tell at once the character of this association. The club was organized January, 1885, when the following named officers were elected and committees appointed: President, A. J. Fisk; secretary, J. B. Wells; treasurer, I. Salhinger. Committee on rooms and furniture: W. N. Baldwin, S. S. Huntley, H. B. Wilkins, S. C. Gilpatrick, I. Salhinger. Committee on finance: J. B. Wells, William Muth, H. P. Kennett. Committee on steward: W. C. Humbert, C. C. Vawter, W. C. Morris. Committee on constitution and by-laws: J. P. Woolman, W. H. Garrison, C. K. Cole, E. D. Weed, B. H. Tatem.

Telegraph and Telephone Lines.—The telegraph first gave Helena instant connection with the outside world in September, 1867. She now has four lines; one the original line via Salt Lake City, and to east and west; a government line to Bozeman, and so down the Yellowstone valley to forts Custer and Keogh, via Fort Buford at the mouth of the Yellowstone, and down the Missouri to Bismarck. One to Fort Benton and Fort Assiniboine on the Milk river, the latter built in 1879, and the Montana Central company's line to Butte. Private messages are admitted on the government lines where there are no other, at merely nominal rates. From Fort Keogh on the Yellowstone, at the mouth of Tongue river, the government has a line to the Black Hills. The new telegraph line between Deer Lodge and Helena was completed November 25, 1882. There was a telegraph line to Benton, but the buffalo rubbed the posts down, tangled up, broke and carried off the wire. As no buffalo have been seen along that route for years, the line recently constructed will probably remain. The railroad company's lines were added in 1883.

Stages.—There are three firms running stage lines from this great center of territorial travel. Rowe's line runs to Fort Benton, 140 miles, and thence to Fort Assiniboine on the Milk river, 65 miles. Another line is run to Butte and Deer Lodge, about 130 miles. Then comes the great firm of Gilmer, Saulsbury & Co., who succeeded Wells, Fargo & Co. in 1869, and who run most of the other territorial lines. They run stages in this and adjoining territories over some six thousand miles. They are to-day the largest stage firm on the continent. Stage fare averages twelve cents per mile. On June 20, 1883, the last coach over the Bozeman and Helena route drew up at Gilmer and Saulsbury's office, Helena. The coach, six-horse team, and driver were all decorated with red, white and blue, and with flags and evergreens, the young ladies of Bedford having bidden them a final farewell and sent them away decked in holiday attire. John T. Bingham was driver. Cars over the Northern Pacific Railroad began running into Helena from the east June 15, 1883, and from the west in September.

An Ancient Hack.—Its history is that it was brought up the river on a steamboat to Fort Benton, by Higgins, Travis & Bro., in 1867, and by them brought to Helena. It has been at various times owned by nearly every livery stable man in Helena. It fell into the hands of Piatt & McComis, John A. Zeigler, and others. It was purchased by one Bigalow, who drove it during the time of Dan Castello's circus, who tipped it over and smashed it up. It then fell into the hands of Brown & Weisenhorn and was made as good as new. To-day it is performing equal duty with others as a closed hack and is driven through Helena by Charles H. Brown.

National Celebrations.—The old flag for the first time at Helena was floated to the breeze from a pole erected in front of Perkins & Hughes' store, on Main street, on the 25th of April, 1865, upon receipt of the news of Lee's surrender. This flag was the work of a few ladies, who presented it to be used on the occasion. First 4th of July at Helena was celebrated at Owyhe Park, 1865. George M. Pinney delivered the oration. The one hundredth anniversary of national independence was celebrated at Helena, Thursday, July 4, 1876, with all the appropriate honors due to the occasion, and was the finest ever witnessed in Helena. Colonel Woolfolk delivered the oration. Wm. F. Wheeler was chief marshal, with Henry Wyttenbach and Charles D. Curtis as aids, and Seth Bullock, Jas. M. Ryan, E. Frank, F. P. Sterling, Ben R. Dittes, John O'Meara, and E. T. Johnson, as assistant marshals. The chaplain of the day was the Rev. E. L. Toy.

Fourth of July, 1883, and the New Railroad.—This was the greatest gala day ever witnessed in Montana. The people were called to celebrate the national fete day, to welcome the first regular train which entered the city, and to witness the departure of the first "Bullion Train" over the Union Pacific railroad. The preparations made for the celebration were elaborate. On June 15 invitations were sent out signed by the following members of the committee:—A. J. Davidson, T. H. Kleinschmidt, D. S. Wade, S. T. Hauser, A. M. Woolfolk, R. B. Harrison, H. M. Parchen, Henry Klein, Cornelius Hedges, Robert E. Fisk, John Kinna, C. W. Cannon, L. H. Hershfield, T. C. Power, Robert C. Walker, C. A. Broadwater. The other committees also entered upon their duties. The committee on reception comprised the following members:—Wilbur F. Sanders, B. F. Potts, J. K. Toole, John M. Sweeney, Albert G. Clarke, John H. Ming, John T. Murphy, Isaac Greenhood, W. S. Paynter, Charles Lehman, Thomas Cruse, Francis Pope, B. H. Tatem, Wm. B. Raleigh, Hon. W. A. Chessman, W. C. Child, C. L. Vawter. The members of the committee of arrangements were:—Richard Lockey, F. P. Sterling, Charles D. Curtis, E. D. Edgerton, H. Brady Wilkins, Jr. The finance committee comprised:—A. M. Holter, John R. Watson, W. E. Cullen, R. S. Hale, Albert Kleinschmidt, S. C. Ashby, S. H. Crounse, and the committee on decoration:—M. A. Meyendorff, James B. Wells, Morris Sands, Frank L. Sizer, Samuel Kennett, W. F. Parker, E. Blaine Walker.

The officers of the day were: E. W. Knight, president; A. C. Botkin, orator; Thomas P. Fuller, marshall, and Clay McCauley reader of the declaration. According to the programme, the procession was formed on upper Main street, under the direction of Chief Marshal Thomas P. Fuller and his aides. City Marshal Deegan and his police, mounted and in uniform, and the Helena silver cornet band, formed the head of the column, which rested at Broadway. Promptly at the first stroke of ten Marshal Fuller gave the command to forward march. In a moment more the whole cavalcade, reaching far above the head of Main to Bridge street, was in motion to the stirring strains of fine music, in the following order: Helena Fire Department, under chief engineer, Charles D. Curtis and James Sullivan, assistant, consisting of the two steam fire engines "Rescue" and "City of Helena;" Helena hose company, George Conrad, foreman; hook and ladder company, George H. Booker, foreman, the Salvage corps, with fire extinguishers, wagon and apparatus. The decorations of the wagons and apparatus of the fire department were most elaborate and beautiful, especially the hook and ladder company with the "Child of the Department" enthroned under a canopy, dressed and wreathed in white and blue, which surpassed them all. Mayor and aldermen of the city in Ziegler's four-horse open omnibus. The president, officers and directors of the Helena Board of Trade, in Ziegler's new omnibus; then the president of the day, orator, reader, chaplain and invited guests in carriages; the Apollo Club, United States, Territorial and county officials in carriages constituted the right grand division. Castello's silver cornet band and wagon, with members of his company mounted and in costume, the industries of Helena, among which the following were the most conspicuous represented on wheels and in the line of procession came next: George E. Boose, printing press in operation, throwing off dodgers and advertisements, showing a large display of blank books, etc.; A. J. Davidson, display of saddles, harness, bridles and saddlery outfits; C. L. Vawter, wagons and agricultural implements; Kleinsohmidt Brother & Co., Groceries, family supplies, teas and tobacco; Horsky & Kenck—wagon and span of delivery horses, with Montana bottled beer in cases for shipment and in barrels for draught; Clarke, Conrad & Curtin—a large portable shop with a great variety of industry, represented by a jolly crew of tinsmiths, iron workers, strikers, clerks and stove men; Sturrock & Lang—wagon with all manner of plumbing supplies, water supplies, water sinks, hydrants, conductors, sprinklers, stoves, etc.; Nick Millen—wagon with display of rubber boots on a defunct pigmy, with variety of boots and shoes; Meyer & Co.—wagon and display of Montana soda water; A. M. Holter & Co—wagon with display of moldings, sash, doors and finishings; J. M. Lowell's wagon Company; Kirkendall & Co.—transfer teams and outfits; O'Neill & Foxall—large four-horse transfer omnibus, "Montana"; Chris. Vassube—beautiful transfer omnibus, "Helena," drawn by the heavy weight four black horses; Boys' Light Brigade, under the marshalship of Major George Booker; citizens in carriages and on horseback, and Potts & Harrison's thoroughbred horses constituted the center grand division. The Helena Light Battery, emigrant train, Cowden's bull train, Clarence Cusker (a cowboy), with raw-hide lariat, brace of revolvers, sombrero, buffalo overalls, and a cayuse—a genuine character and a true representative of the cattle herder of the olden time and the present day; Frank LaRue, with his mining wagon load of quartz and wheelbarrow; John J. Rohrbaugh, with stage coach and jerkey; John A. Zeigler's donkey, representing the meek and submissive pack animal, constituted the left grand division.

The Northern Pacific was represented at this celebration by Superintendent Ainsley, chief of the Yellowstone and Rocky mountain division of the road, by General Agent Fulton and Land Agent Stone. They witnessed there the enthusiastic welcome of assembled thousands to the railroad, and beheld with pride the grandest spectacle of the day—the departure from Helena of the Northern Pacific's first bullion train, carrying a million pounds of the silver product of Montana silver mines. The train was composed of thirty-six new box cars, labeled with large colored placards, inscribed "N. P. R. R.—1,000,000 pounds Gregory Bullion, from Helena, M. T." Two ponderous engines, gaily decorated with bunting, drew the long line of richly freighted cars, the "send-of" being greeted by the firing of cannon, the sounding of locomotive whistles, the piping of fire engines, the music of bands and the shouts of the people. S. G. Fulton, formerly general agent at Helena, was promoted in June, 1885, to be A. G. F. A. of the Portland division, Northern Pacific railroad, and A. L. Stokes appointed general agent at Helena.

Conflagrations at Helena.—The first great fire at Helena occurred April 28, 1869. This fire destroyed the greater number of business houses in the village. It originated in a Chinese gambling house at the corner of West Main and Bridge streets. This account of the fire of 1869 is summarized from the report given in the Gazette, November 9:

"The alarm of fire was given from the bells of the Catholic church and the district school house, on Rodney street, on November 7, 1869, when hundreds of people rushed to the scene of conflagration, which proved to be the Helena theater, on Wood street. The wind was blowing a hurricane. The building being composed of very combustible material, made a terrible fire, and very soon, in spite of great exertions to prevent it, spread to the adjoining buildings on the east and south, which caught from the heat of the flames, and were soon consumed. At the old houses, belonging to General Dorris, on Bridge street, the fire was arrested, where it was stopped during the fire in May. Vivion's old stone house stopped its spread down Wood street, or at least retarded its progress until some frame buildings were torn down, on Bridge, in its rear, just before the fire was ready to take hold of them. This, and the fact that the wind blew in a favorable direction, saved the city from total destruction. There was burnt on each side of Wood street, in the neighborhood of the theatre, eight or nine houses. No families were by this disaster left houseless. The loss fell most heavily on Mr. Boulon and the theatrical corps, just from San Francisco, who had commenced a very successful engagement. The members of this company lost everything, including clothing and wardrobe, worth $2,000. The musical instruments of the band which played at this theater were entirely consumed. The theater building was owned by Boulon & Tessier. The building cost about $6,000; and besides this the scenery, wardrobe, etc., of the whole company. Paul Boulon lost all his instruments, music and clothes, and was terribly burned in trying to save his music and his violin—making total loss about $9,000. Above the theater David Bently lost a house; and a corrall was burned worth probably $2,000. Lou Cassell, the owner of the Bon Ton, had two buildings burned; loss $3,000. Kate Smith lost her house; loss about $1,000. Mrs. Zipp had two houses burned; loss $2,000. Kate Buchanan's house was torn down to stop the fire; loss $2,000. Mrs. Kelly lost by damage. The Kan-Kan, the Kiyus, the Senate, and indeed every building on Wood street, below and opposite Boulder block, moved their effects. Bob Lemon moved everything into his fire-proof, building and suffered to the amount of $400 Henry Hitchings, whose building may now be denominated the "Salamander," lost $300. Mike Renig's loss from moving was very heavy; estimated at $1,000. The total loss by this fire could not have been less than $20,000, on none of which was there any insurance. The origin of the fire is unknown. The members of the troupe claim that they had no fire in the dressing room where it first burst out."

The fire, which occurred in May, was attended with very heavy losses. The fire of October 1, 1871, left a large portion of Main street in ruins. The Herald office and all its contents were destroyed. The fire-proof building of Gans & Klein stopped the progress of the fire in that direction, and the firm suffered but a trifling loss. Henry M. Murphy, Magnolia hotel, post office, Word's store, the Helena brewery, and many other valuable properties, were destroyed. The fire of August 23, 1872, destroyed about $140,000 worth of property. The few blocks bounded by Main and Ewing streets and Broadway and Breckenridge streets were swept away, together with one block between Breckenridge and Grand streets, and one north of Broadway, between Warren and Jackson street. The property destroyed comprised the North Pacific hotel, Occidental saloon, Taylor's building, McCormick building, Whitelatch, owned by Col. Woolfolk; Gazette office and building, Ellis residence, Roddy's building, "Twin Halls," old post office, Masonic hall, U. S. assessor's office, Ewing's stables, old U. S. collector's office, the Planters' house, C. W. Cannon's buildings, U. S. Marshal's office, Dr. Bullard's residence, Judge Orr's houses, Dr. Curtiss' residence, and other houses. On August 25, 1872, a number of citizens subscribed the sum of $3,157.50 toward providing apparatus for a fire company, and about the same time began rebuilding.

The fire of January 9, 1874, originated in a Chinese restaurant in rear of a gambling house, precisely where the fire of 1869 began, and entailed the losses given in the following list:

Conrad Knipper was burned to death while trying to escape from the International hotel. The office of the Superintendent of Public Instruction was destroyed with all its records. The records of the Masonic Grand Lodge were also destroyed. In the case of Colonel Sanders' library, both the legal and miscellaneous departments were burned, leaving nothing of the immense number of manuscripts, books and pamphlets which he had collected in connection with the history of the Territory. The fires since this time have been checked by the department.

Early Justice, Hangman's Tree and First Death.—The first murder at Helena was that of Harry Slater by John Keene, both notorious fellows, on May 7, 1867, at the door of Sammy Green's saloon. Keene was captured by Colonel Robert Lawrence (Local History, Herald, October 31, 1867), interned in Sheriff Wood's original house on Main street, and tried for murder by the citizens, the lumber yard where Gans & Klien built their store being the court room. He was hanged in Dry gulch on the day of his trial. The last trial and execution in the city by the Committee of Safety was the hanging of Joseph Wilson and Arthur L. Compton (for their attempt to murder and rob George Lenhart, April 26), April 30, 1870. Hangman's Tree, which stood in the gulch below the convent, was cut down by Mr. Shippen, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, May 17, 1876. The first death in the city was that of Dr. S. Rodney Pococke, who died in March, 1865.

Chinese Funerals.—Chinese Mary, who was murdered for her gold, on September 16, 1867, was buried the following day with all the ceremony attendant on a Chinese funeral. She was the first Celestial known to have been buried at Helena. The cloudburst at Corbin, June 25, 1884, resulted in flooding the Prickly Pear valley, and drowning Ya Louie, Hay Wah and Lee Dew—aged about 40, 32 and 30 respectively. The waters overran the whole width of the valley, where in some places it ran six feet deep. On the 26th a genuine Chinese funeral was given to one of the deceased, who was a member of the Chinese secret society, in the evening, while the other was interred without ceremony. The funeral rites were begun in Chinatown with the firing of bombs and exhibitions of colored lights. A large space in the middle of the street near to the shacks of the dead Chinaman was occupied by the funeral rites of some secret order, where some thirty or more participated, all dressed in white and colored overshirts, carrying flags, transparencies and banners. Two large tables were spread in the street and loaded with roasted hog, a dressed kid and a variety of sweetmeats and table ornaments. Around this festive board the knights of the flowery kingdom marched and countermarched, knelt, prayed and sang. The remains, already coffined in two coffins, were placed in a hearse and a wagon, headed by the Turnverein band, and followed by a wagon loaded with tea, rice and other eatables, to be laid on the graves, and a large number of members of the secret society and many Chinamen on foot.

Churches.—The first M. E. Church in the Territory was founded at Helena in 1865, when a log house of worship was erected in the gulch, between Wood and Bridge streets, by Rev. Mr. McLaughlin. Rev. A. M. Hough was the first pastor. The second church building, a frame house, was erected during his pastorate on the site of the present church. Rev. E. T. McLaughlin preached the first sermon at Last Chance, March 26, 1865, at the extreme northwest end of Cutler street. On April, 16, 1865, Rev. McLaughlin organized the first Sunday school. On December 24, 1866, the sum of $217 was subscribed toward obtaining books for the M. E. Church Sabbath school. The corner stone of the M. E. Church of Helena, on Broad street, was laid September 11, 1867, by Rev. Mr. Hough. The pastors of the Church at Helena since 1865 were:—Revs. McLaughlin, 1865; Hough, 1865–9; George Comfort, 1869–71; S. G. Lathrop, 1871; J. E. Van Anda, Mr. Shippen, Clark Wright, John Armstrong, Mr. Longstreet. S. E. Winger, appointed in July 23, 1881, was succeeded by Revs. J. Jay Garvin and E. J. Bicknell. The present membership is about 100. The trustees are:—Fred. Gamer, Gottlieb Kinzle, Calvin Beach, James Fryatt, Jacob Heberling; A. H. Priest, secretary; Fred. Gamer, treasurer. The Sabbath school averages 110 members; Dr. R. F. Clark, superintendent. The value of the M. E. church property is estimated at about $10,000, corner of Broadway and Ewing street. (Vide General History.)

The Catholic Church was established at Helena in the summer of 1866, by Rev. Francis Kuppens, S. J. Previous to this time, however, Rev. Joseph Giorda visited Last Chance gulch, and offered the services of the church in the cabin of Charles Leath, then living where O'Donnell's bookstore is now situate. It is stated even before this, that while on his way from Virginia City, he offered the mass in a small house, then standing close to the present warehouse of Murphy & Neil, on Wood street. Services were also held in a house on Water street in 1864. The first church, a plain frame structure, was built in the summer of 1866, at a cost of about $2,500, on the site of the present church, between Warren and Ewing and Broadway and Wood streets, on lands purchased from the Town Site Co. through the probate court. Father Kuppens remained in charge of the mission until the spring of 1868, assisted by Rev. Jerome D'Aste. The old church was dedicated November 1, 1866, by Rev. Kuppens, assisted by Revs. J. D'Aste and Rev. J. Vanzina, who was en route to Virginia to assist Rev. Van Gorp, pastor of the church at Virginia City. The building was erected by John Sweeney. Among the persons present at the dedication services were L. F. Lacroix, J. H. Curtiss, P. J. McCarthy, J. J. Kennedy, John McGormick, H. S. Norcum, M. D., P. C. Hovaker, M. D., J. Kingsley, J. P. Tiernan, M. D., J. Mundy, J. R. Drew, J. T. Sullivan, F. Abt, J. M. Sweeney, Cornelius Sullivan, R. P. Leahy, J. C. Spangles, J. G. Hughes, J. M. Cavanaugh, J. C. Curtin, J. Sheehan, J. P. Walsh, Jos. Kulinarth, E. R. Birmingham, H. Keon, Lewis Gray, Mrs. Jane Woodruff, J. J. Blake, P. Howard, M. Howard, W. Bardwell, W. F. Powers, J. M. Hayes, R. Druillett, Wm. Moore, P. Harlin, E. H. Pasey, and many others. The persons whose names are given above signed a petition October 10, 1866, to very Rev. Father Grasse, asking for the appointment of two priests to this mission. At a meeting of the congregation held at Helena November 4, 1866, it was resolved to convey all right and title in the church buildings and lands, then in their possession, to the Society of Jesuits, to be under their charge forever. L. F. Lacroix was president, and John H. Curtis, secretary, of this meeting. The priests of the mission from 1866 to 1874, when the new church building was begun, were Revs. Messrs. Kuppens, 1866–8; Jerome D'Aste, 1866–7; C. Imoda, 1867–74; Leo. Van Gorp, 1868–73; L. B. Palladino, 1873. The present Church of the Sacred Heart was projected by Father Palladino in 1874, and the corner stone of the structure laid September 20, 1874, by Rev. Superior Giorda. The stone work was done gratuitously by Henry Miller and Mr. Tam, two German masons; the brick work by Griffin & Patton, for a consideration of $4,275; the wood work by Lynch & Black, for $1,372.45; the plastering by J. English, for $1,137.90; the cornicing by M. McNamara, for 1,137.90; and roofing by W. Bell, the pay for which was included in the bricklayer's contract; the painting by Benj. Daly, for $1,157.88; the cut stone by McBirney & La Pierre, for $1,129.10. The building committee supplied material to many of those contractors, so that the figures given merely represented the cost of labor. The total cost of the church, as completed, was estimated at $28,413.22. To this must be added the iron roof, costing $813, furniture valued at about $1,000, the organ, $1,250, and the 2,000-pound bell, $846. The indebtedness of the congregation was discharged in January, 1883. The total outlay of the mission from September, 1874, to January, 1883, was $35,669, a large portion of which sum was contributed by persons of other religious denominations. Rev. L. B. Palladino was in charge of the church from 1873 to the close of 1883. His assistants since 1874 were Rev. Jos. Menetrey, 1874–6; Rev. Jos. Guidi, 1876–80; Rev. J. J. Vennemon, 1879–81; Rev. P. Barcalo, 1880, who was assistant priest of the mission in 1883–4. By Apostolic letters dated Rome, March 7, 1884, the Vicariate of Montana was erected into a Diocese, whose Episcopal See was established at Helena, and the Church of the Sacred Heart was raised to the rank of a cathedral. Rev. L. B. Palladino was transferred to St.

Ignatius, and Revs. C. Imoda, J. Guida and C. Barcalo attached to the cathedral church. The congregation is said to be about 3,000.

The Protestant Episcopal church was founded at Helena by Bishop Tuttle, assisted by Rev. E. N. Goddard, August 11, 1867, in the old school-house on Rodney street. Mr. Goddard took charge of the mission until October 28, 1867. In July, 1868, Rev. W. F. Floyd took charge, and was succeeded in July, 1870, by Rev. Morrell Fowler, who arrived in August of that year. Mr. Fowler resigned in December, 1870, and the parish was without a pastor until May, 1875, when Rev. E. L. Toy took charge. He remained until November, 1877. The church was again without a pastor until March, 1878, when Rev. M. N. Gilbert, of Deer Lodge, was appointed, he taking up his duties July 14, 1878. Under Mr. Gilbert the corner stone of the present stone church building was laid, May 3, 1879. Rev. F. T. Webb and Rev. S. D. Hooker, with Bishop Leigh R. Brewer, preside over the parish.

The Presbyterian church was organized in June, 1872, with Rev. J. R. Russell, pastor. He was succeeded in the fall of that year by Rev. W. C. Rommell, and during his administration the brick house of worship was erected at a cost of about $11,000. Rev. J. D. Hewitt succeeded Mr. Rommell, January 1, 1877. Rev. Geo. A. Smith arrived early in 1873, and he retiring after a stay of 15 months, the pulpit was supplied by Rev. W. Scott Stites. Rev. W. Reed succeeded Mr. Stites, he being installed November 30, 1881. During the administration of Mr. Smith the church became a self-supporting society, and continues to be such down to the present time. Rev. T. V. Moore succeeded Mr. Reed.

The Congregational church was established by Rev. R. B. Tobey. On October 2, 1883, Rev. Tobey arrived at Helena, having been sent by the Home Missionary Society to found a Congregational church here. He commenced his work at once, and on Sunday, October 14, the first preaching service was held in Milton Hall. November 14 the church was organized with nine members. Milton Hall being unsuitable for a place of worship, in December of the same year the church entered the chapel on Benton avenue, a little homely building made in Minneapolis and shipped to Helena in sections, which answered as a temporary home for the church. Worship was continued in the chapel until the attractive and comfortable new building was completed and furnished—the first Sunday in April, 1885. Rev. F. D. Kelsey succeeded Mr. Tobey, and was present at the ceremony of dedication. The treasurer made the following statement of the cost of the new church.

The plans were drawn by Shaffer & Welter, and the building erected by Geo. S. Appleton. The bell and mounting weighs 1,270 pounds, and was procured through the untiring efforts of several of the enterprising ladies of the west side, Mrs. R. S. Hamilton, Mrs. S. C. Gilpatrick, Mrs. E. N. Dunphy and Mrs. C. G. Evans.

Christian Church.—Since Rev. M. L. Streator's arrival in Helena, October 13, 1883, the Christian church, of which he is pastor, has more than doubled its membership. During this period 42 additions were made, raising the membership from 38 to 80 persons. Their new house of worship, the Gothic stone structure on the west side, corner of Benton avenue and Hemlock street, was completed and dedicated February 22, 1885, by Rev. Galen Wood, of Deer Lodge, assisted by Rev. J. L. Phoenix, of Anaconda. Since the morning of the dedication of their new house of worship they have received in cash for the building, $1,041.45; the Ladies' Aid Society has $63; amount of former collections, $9,510.03; grand total of money collected, $10,614.48.

The Baptist church, formed some years ago, is presided over by Rev. L. L. Wood.

The Methodist Church South has a society here, with a house of worship at the corner of Grand and Ewing streets. Spiritualists, Mormons, Adventists, Congregationalists, Unitarians, Universalists, Lutherans, Swedenborgians, and the hundred sects into which the Christian world is divided, have representatives within the city. The Synagogue claims a large representation in this city, and, it is said, propose to erect a house of worship.

Schools.—The first school was opened by Prof. Patch, January 1, 1865, with Prof. Patch principal, and J. W. Corum assistant. The first public school house was erected on Rodney street, in 1868, and the graded school house was built in 1875, under the direction of Trustees A. M. Holter, M. F. Sanders, D. C. Corbin, and A. Sands. This school was opened January 1, 1876, with Prof. Charles L. Wheeler principal. The number of census scholars in June, 1883, was 983. The enrollment shows a total of 316 boys and 298 girls. J. G. Sanders, of Helena school district No. 1, completed the school census for 1884, with the following enumerations: Total number between the ages of 4 and 21 years: Males, 574; females, 602; total, 1,176. Total number under 4 years: Males, 188; females, 156; total, 344, making a grand total of males, 762; females, 758; total, 1,520. Of this number 26 are colored and 6 Chinese. Increase over the year 1883, 152. Prof. Howey, in his historical sketch of the schools, says: "Helena has had public schools since 1866, but truth compels the admission that they amounted to but little prior to the adoption of the school laws of 1872. Since then their growth has been steady and comparatively satisfactory. The first school building owned by Helena school district was a frame building, recently torn down, on Rodney street, in 1868, capable of seating about seventy-five pupils. Our principal graded school building was erected in 1875, at a cost of $25,000, and opened in January, 1876. It contains, besides an assembly room, seven division rooms, with a seating capacity of about 400. In 1879 the growth of Helena and the convenience of scholars of the primary grades, compelled the erection of two other school buildings on the west and south sides, with additional seating capacity of 150, and at an additional cost of $6,000. All three of these school structures are of brick, and with the grounds connected, and furniture, are of the value of $40,000. Their utmost seating capacity is about 600. There remains only the bonded debt of $6,000, incurred for the building of the west and south side school houses, which by law are redeemable at the pleasure of the district, though not due till ten years from date. In 1876 the ten per cent. bonds of the district sold at ten per cent. discount, those of 1879 at one per cent." The Boys' School of St. Aloysius was established in 1869, and conducted by the Sisters. In 1875 Father Palladino took charge of this school and continued to teach therein until the appointment of Mr. Timlin as teacher in 1876. Since that time the elementary classes are conducted by the Sisters, while a staff of regularly qualified teachers preside over the higher classes. The elementary classes comprise about fifty pupils, and the higher classes about forty pupils. The schools are supported by direct tax on the parents of the pupils. There is in connection with the school a boarding department for the convenience of scholars whose homes are distant. The St. Vincent's academy was founded in the fall of 1869 by Rev. Father Van Gorp, who placed the Sisters of Charity from Leavenworth, Kan., in charge, with Sister Mary, principal, and five assistants. The academy buildings were erected the same year (on grounds purchased for the purpose, east side of Ewing street, near Broadway), at a cost of about $10,000. The community now (1884) comprises nine Sisters, and the academy thirty-five boarders and seventy-five day-scholars. The various branches of an English education, together with German, French and Latin, are taught. The music, drawing and painting departments are well conducted, while special attention is devoted to instruction in the science of domestic economy.

The Montana Seminary and Rocky Mountain Business Institute was established at Helena in November, 1869, by Rev. S. G. Lathrop, Prof. B. F. Marsh, and Prof. E. W. Stone.

The Helena Classical School was established in September, 1883, with John Schuyler Crosby, Alex. C. Botkin, Elizur Beach, John T. Murphy, S. T. Hauser, W. A. Chessman, Wm. Davenport, Decius S. Wade, E. Sharpe, Chas. W. Cannon, Thos. C. Power, Robert E. Fisk, W. G. Prenitt, Theo. H. Kleinschmidt, John E. Blaine, trustees, and Prof. W. H.

Garrison, principal. The object of this school is to place within reach of the youth of Montana many of the advantages which the colleges of the old States offer. The school rooms occupy the second floor of Ryan's building.

Helena Commercial College was established in the fall of 1883 by H. T. Englehorn and E. O. Railsback, with rooms in Blake's building on Broadway.

Banks.—The first National Bank of Helena was organized in 1866, by Samuel T. Hauser & Co. It is the pioneer banking house of the Territory, even as its stockholders are among the old residents. The condition of this great money-trading house on June 22, 1883, is shown in the following report to the comptroller of the currency:

The description of this house is taken from the Independent: "The building has a frontage of thirty-one feet on Main street and about one hundred and fifteen on Edwards street. It consists of three stories and a sub-basement. The first story is of rock-faced stone. The water tables and trimmings of this story will be of dressed stone. The second and third stories will be of red brick with dressed stone facings, and the whole building will be surmounted by a handsome roof of a unique design. The street corner of the building will be rounded by a tower resting upon a pillar of polished Montana marble. At each side of the stairway (at the south side of the building and opening on Main street), leading to the second and third floors, will be a similar pillar of polished marble. There will also be a stairway leading to these stories from Edwards street."

The Second National bank was organized with E. D. Edgerton, president; D. S. Wade, vice-president; A. E. Bunker, cashier; J. B. Sanford, C. K. Cole, John Kinna, Chris. Kenck, George Breck, and C. L. Vawter, directors.

Insurance.—A local board of directors for the Equitable Life Insurance Company was organized for Montana at a meeting held July 21, 1883, at the First National bank, Helena. The names of the directors are: E. W. Knight, B. H. Tatem, Henry Klein, E. D. Edgerton, C. L. Vawter, W. S. Paynter, Albert Kleinschmidt, W. A. Chessman, S. S. Huntly and R. H.
